Asked whether the probe reaches beyond contractors to public officials, Kaiser replied, "If I would tell you that out of a $15 billion project we're not looking into other areas, I'd be lying," he said. "I mean, the money went someplace."

Vigil Trial: Tape-recorded Conversations, Videotapes Involving Vigil Played For Jurors (AP)

By Tim Korte

DOJ_NMG_0062418

AP, September 13, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE (AP) - Jurors on Tuesday watched and listened to FBI videotapes showing California investment adviser Kent Nelson handing over thousands of dollars in cash to former state Treasurer Robert Vigil.

Vigil has pleaded not guilty to 24 extortion and racketeering counts in an alleged kickback scheme. Vigil's first federal trial ended May 22 in a mistrial.

Nelson, who testified at Vigil's first trial but has refused to reappear, is shown pulling out an envelope stuffed with cash during a May 22, 2005 meeting with Vigil. Nelson offers the cash to Vigil while asking Vigil to direct state business to him.

Prosecutors also played a videotape from Aug. 24, 2005 after Vigil picked Nelson up at the Albuquerque airport. Nelson offers Vigil an envelope and tells him it contains $5,000.

"That's too much," said Vigil, who then told Nelson to give him $2,000.

"I want you to write some checks to people," Vigil said.

The videos and tape-recorded telephone conversations _ some of them also were played for the jury _ are among the government's strongest evidence against Vigil.

Jurors donned headphones to listen while the evidence was played and the courtroom became still and silent during the parts of the video that depicted the cash handovers.

Jason Bowles, one of Vigil's attorneys, argued Monday against playing the tape recordings, saying it would violate Vigil's right to confront his accusers.

"I think everyone would agree this is a fairly unprecedented move by a state prosecuting authority in the middle of a federal case," Bowles said.

U.S. District Judge James Browning formally rejected the defense effort Tuesday. He had said Monday that Vigil's lawyers had the opportunity to cross-examine Nelson during the first trial.

He described to jurors on Monday how investigators served a search warrant at the state treasurer's office last September and seized many of the papers that now serve as foundational government evidence.

In December 2003, Secret Service agents investigated Leo Sandoval, a former treasurer's office employee who has been identified as a bagman in the alleged kickback scheme and is cooperating with prosecutors. The Secret Service investigation focused on counterfeiting money, birth certificates and driver's licenses.

At that time, Sandoval gave investigators binders that included information about the state's investment practices for flexible repurchase agreements _ documents that led to charges against Vigil.

Sandoval eventually received immunity from prosecution in the counterfeiting case in exchange for his agreement to testify against Vigil.

McCaskill said that he asked Sandoval if any of the documents or signatures linked to the Vigil investigations had been forged. The FBI agent said Sandoval told him there were none.

McCaskill also said that Vigil approved $2.5 billion in flexible repurchase agreements during his term as treasurer from 2003-2005, leading to $1.8 million in fees for Nelson and other investment advisers.

McCaskill also said Vigil, as deputy treasurer under Michael Montoya, fired Nelson in November 2000 after questions came up about Nelson's qualifications. Yet during the next six months, Nelson continued to receive work and earned $1.16 million in commissions.

"Did all of these transactions occur after Mr. Vigil signed a letter to Kent Nelson, telling him he was terminated?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathon Gerson asked.

"They did," McCaskill said.

Younger Brother Testifies In Gotti Trial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2006

John A. Gotti's younger brother took the witness stand Tuesday in Manhattan federal court and said he never collected any extortion cash or passed any messages to others on behalf of his sibling.

Peter Gotti said that, despite a testy relationship over the years with his brother, known by the sobriquet "Junior," he still kept in touch in the late 1990s and early part of this decade while John, 42, was under house arrest and later serving a federal prison sentence.

Peter Gotti testified as a defense witness in the trial of his brother, who is accused of various acts of racketeering while serving as a key captain in the Gambino crime family. Federal prosecutors claim John Gotti took part in the 1992 assault on radio talk show personality and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa. Prosecutors also have accused John "Junior" Gotti, the son of the late Gambino crime boss, with money laundering and other offenses. Summations could begin Thursday.

As a defense witness, Peter Gotti said he never collected, nor was he asked to collect, extortion money from Michael "Mickey Scars" DiLeonardo, a former Gambino member who turned government witness and testified earlier at the trial.

Even under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Peter Gotti denied ever collecting money on his brother's behalf. Hou then led Peter Gotti through a series of financial deals he had done in the past in which his brother invested in some of his businesses, a number of which were defunct. In some cases his brother didn't collect on the loans, was paid back or took a small loss in the investments, Peter Gotti said.

Hou brought up a real estate deal in South Carolina, in which Peter Gotti admitted he sought to get an overdue payment from the buyer. But Peter Gotti insisted it wasn't a cash deal and that he had appeared with attorneys to work out the late payments.

Hou then brought up a taped conversation Peter Gotti had with his brother at Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York talking about the Colombo crime family infighting of the 1990s. Hou was apparently using the conversation to cast doubt on Peter Gotti's claim that he never talked about mob business. But Peter Gotti pointed out that the conversation centered on a column that had appeared on the Web site Ganglandnews.com. Peter Gotti also denied passing messages for his brother beyond "social messages."

The defense is trying to show that John Gotti turned his back on mob life in 1999, a date that is outside the statute of limitations.

Jury Hears Jr.'s Hip-hop Hopes (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 13, 2006

Rappers like Irv Gotti or Yo Gotti may have taken the name - but Junior Gotti apparently had his own hip-hop dream.

The mob scion invested $20,000 into a failed hip-hop magazine that would have targeted prisoners by dispensing free legal advice beside photos of rapper babes.

But the Hottie Publishing venture never took off and Gotti ended up losing his dough, Gotti pal Steve Dobies told jurors yesterday at Gotti's racketeering trial in Manhattan Federal Court.

"Not too good," Dobies said when Gotti attorney Charles Carnesi asked him how it did.

For photos, the magazine would feature female hip-hop stars. And Gotti was counting on help from someone named Jamal in New York City who supposedly knew all the top names in the rap world.

"He knows Lil' Kim, too?" Gotti asked Dobies in a March 2003 prison chat intercepted by the feds and played for jurors yesterday.

Gotti even thought about roping big sister Victoria into the idea. But she wasn't biting.

"Vicki's idea about this thing is that your perspective on this is totally wrong," Gotti's attorney Richard Rehbock warns him. "It's not gonna sell."

Gotti was unconvinced, and on the tapes encourages Dobies to seize control of the magazine from Stephanie, the wife of a fellow inmate who first pitched him the idea while both were at a federal prison in upstate Ray Brook.

"He felt we could do a better job," Dobies said.

"I feel it has a lot of potential if it's done right," Gotti says on the tape. "I still feel that way. The kid [Jamal] I sent home knows all these people. He's in with all these rappers. He feels it. He loves it. I mean I don't think that she's the person for it. That's the problem."

Dobies told Gotti that he was having trouble getting in touch with Stephanie to discuss moving the business from Binghamton to the city.

"We're gonna hold her to it," Gotti said. "We'll do it someplace else with somebody else."

Dobies was called by defense attorneys to counter prosecution claims that he regularly visited Gotti at the federal prison so he could relay Mafia messages back to the street. Gotti was serving a nearly six-year prison hitch after pleading guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges and renouncing his ties to the mob.

Also yesterday, Gotti's brother Peter took the witness stand and denied ever picking up $50,000 in mob money from former Gambino capo Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo, as DiLeonardo testified last week.

"[John A. (Junior) Gotti] wouldn't allow me to do anything for him," Peter Gotti said.

"You're here today," prosecutor Victor Hou pointed out.

"Absolutely. It's the right thing to do," Gotti replied.

Man admits guilt in fraud

against Native Americans

CHANDLER - The former president of a private bank in Arizona has pleaded guilty in a Ponzi scheme that cost Native American depositors millions of dollars.

Edward James Driving Hawk Sr., 71, of Chandler, admitted mail and wire fraud in a conspiracy with others through a company known as U.S. Reservation Bank and Trust, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

An indictment says the company raised as much as $67 million in unsecured investments, and Driving Hawk diverted an estimated $4 million to himself and his family during the two years of operation.

Driving Hawk's son, Leo Driving Hawk Sr., a former sergeant with the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office, previously pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony and agreed to cooperate with investigators.

Edward, who made his guilty plea Wednesday in U.S. District Court, faces up to five years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000.

Several co-defendants are awaiting trial.

2 more marauding bears killed near Sierra Vista

SIERRA VISTA - Two more marauding black bears have been killed in canyons near Sierra Vista, bringing to four the number killed in the area in the past two weeks.

The latest bear death came Thursday, when it was shot by a Ramsey Canyon homeowner after it damaged the roof of a small SUV and the roof of a home, Arizona Game and Fish Department officials said.

A day earlier, a Forest Service employee shot and killed a bear that had ransacked his motor home in Carr Canyon. The employee reported that the bear charged him and some colleagues after they tried to drive it off by shooting at it and spraying it with a fire extinguisher.

Both shootings met Fish and Game guidelines for killing nuisance bears that pose a threat to humans.
Officials said that a reduced food supply is forcing the animals to look for other sources of food.

Federal charges say pair stole Cleveland Clinic patient records

A Naples man and his cousin who worked at Cleveland Clinic in Weston were indicted Friday on charges they stole personal information of more than 1,100 patients from the former Cleveland Clinic in Naples, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

Cleveland Clinic officials on Friday sent letters to the potentially affected Naples patients alerting them to the theft and to provide them with resources to help protect their demographic and financial information from risk, said Eileen Sheil, spokeswoman for Cleveland Clinic at its parent location in Cleveland, Ohio.

A toll-free number — 1-866-907-0675 — has been established for patients.

Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, registered as an owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, and Isis Machado, 22, of Miami Lakes, were indicted on charges they stole patient information for fraudulent purposes. A current address for Advanced Medical Claims was not available Friday.

According to the indictment, Machado worked as a front desk coordinator at the Weston campus from May 23, 2005, to June 26, 2006, where she had authorized access to Cleveland Clinic's computers, which are integrated with the computers at the former Cleveland Clinic in Naples. She was told by Ferrer she had an "opportunity" to sell personal identification of patients and he would pay her for the information, according to the indictment.

Sometime during the course of Machado's employment at the Weston campus, she accessed computerized patient files and downloaded and printed information from more than 1,100 patients, including their names, dates of birth, Social Security numbers, Medicare numbers and home addresses, according to the indictment. All the data accessed were of Naples patients, Sheil said.

Machado then sold the information to Ferrer, who used the stolen information in connection with the submission of about $2.8 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the indictment.

The pair could face 30 years in prison and more than $1 million in fines if convicted as charged. The case is being handled by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

According to Sheil, of Cleveland Clinic, Machado was caught on June 26 for inappropriately accessing patient information and authorities immediately were notified. She had worked in the scheduling department.

"I believe it was another employee who noticed it and reported it to leadership (in Weston) and leadership turned around and contacted state and federal authorities," Sheil said. "We believe it was an isolated incident. This was one employee's action. There were not any other people involved."

The 83-bed hospital and outpatient medical center in Naples was sold to Naples-based Health Management Associates this past May 1 and a new computer system was installed, said John Merriwether, vice president of financial relations for HMA. The hospital was renamed Physicians Regional Medical Center.

"We put our own system in place," he said. "There was no access to the HMA system."

Sheil said the employee was caught on June 26 but had accessed the patient information before HMA took over the Naples hospital and clinic.

"Cleveland Clinic Florida promptly notified state and federal authorities of this problem and over the past two months, federal law enforcement officials have conducted an intensive and confidential investigation of this matter," Cleveland Clinic officials announced. "The Cleveland Clinic Florida has cooperated fully in this investigation and is also conducting an internal risk assessment to prevent such an event from happening again. ...Cleveland Clinic deeply regrets this incident as patients and visitors place their trust in our employees and staff."

Geoffrey Moebius, chief executive officer of Physicians Regional, said the theft was all of Cleveland Clinic data, not Physicians Regional data.

"At this time, we would like to assure our patients that protecting their privacy is of our highest concern, and this incident did not in any way compromise the current systems in place for Physicians Regional Medical Center and the physician practice, Medical Surgical Specialists," according to a statement from Physicians Regional.

Two Are Charged In Patients' ID Theft (MH)

By John Dorschner

The Miami Herald, September 13, 2006

Two charged for stealing patients' data

Federal officials struck a blow Friday at a key but often hidden link in most healthcare fraud -- the person who provides the personal data that phony providers need to bilk insurance companies.

In an afternoon press conference, U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta announced eight charges against Isis Machado of Miami Lakes, who spent a year as a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic's office in Weston.

Machado, 22, was accused of downloading the computerized personal information of more than 1,100 patients and then selling the data to a cousin, Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, the owner of Advanced Medical Claims of Naples, which is alleged to have used the names to send in $2.8 million in phony claims to Medicare.

Many arrests by state and federal agents involve clinics and medical supply companies, but frequently the suppliers of the personal information are not known.

The Cleveland Clinic case was only the third nationwide in which persons have been charged criminally for violating federal healthcare privacy laws.

Many Medicare recipients discover their names and identity numbers have been used to bilk the federal insurance for the elderly, but never learn how their information was stolen.

"We all wonder," said Marielene McGregor, a Miami Springs senior whose name was used to cheat Medicare out of $10,000 in the name of clinics apparently unrelated to Machado or Ferrer. ``I'm very interested -- where the heck did they get the information? It's really scandalous."

Law enforcement officials say the identity thieves can be virtually anyone connected with the healthcare system -- including nurses, billing clerks, hospital janitors who take a peek at records late at night or ambulance attendants who transport a patient (and the patient's records).

Machado had access to Cleveland Clinic's computers as part of her receptionist duties from May 2005 through June. She and Ferrer were charged with conspiracy to commit computer fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft, conspiracy to wrongfully disclose patients' healthcare information and aggravated identity theft.

The first three charges could lead to a prison sentence of up to 10 years and a $250,000 fine, but the toughest penalties could come from five counts of aggravated identity theft, each of which carries a mandatory two-year sentence in addition to other charges -- tough measures meant to make identity as punishable as serious drug smuggling.

"We expect healthcare employees to keep our personal information confidential and secure," said Jonathan I. Soloman, special agent in charge of the Miami office of the FBI. ``Criminals who commit healthcare fraud steal from all of us as U.S. taxpayers and, in the end, make medical care more expensive for all of us."

Cousins Face ID Theft And Fraud Charges For Stealing Medical Records In Florida (FLSUNSEN)

By Madeline Baro Diaz, Miami Bureau

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 13, 2006

Combining an "unwholesome criminal trilogy" of identity theft, medical privacy violations and health-care fraud, two cousins stole the personal information of more than 1,100 Cleveland Clinic patients and billed more than $2.8 million in Medicare charges, federal prosecutors said Friday.

Isis Machado, a coordinator at the Weston clinic, printed out information from electronic files that included Social Security numbers, dates of birth, addresses and other details about Medicare patients at the clinic's Naples location, prosecutors said.

She then sold the information to her cousin, Fernando Ferrer Jr., owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, who let the information be used to file fraudulent Medicare claims, prosecutors said.

Both were indicted earlier this week in Fort Lauderdale on charges of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and conspiracy to wrongfully disclose individually identifiable health information.

They are also charged with fraud in connection with computers and violations related to the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, or HIPAA, which forbids the unauthorized release of private patient information.

"Medical files have some of our most private information," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. "Each of us rightly trusts that our health-care providers will keep them confidential."

In June, another Weston employee alerted clinic officials to the scheme, which prosecutors say began sometime after Machado began working there in May 2005.

The officials contacted law enforcement, fired Machado and cooperated with the investigation, said Cleveland Clinic spokeswoman Eileen Sheil. Health Management Associates bought the Naples clinic in May, but the facility was still in a transition period in June when officials learned of the identity theft allegations.

"The Cleveland Clinic Florida ... is also conducting an internal risk assessment to prevent such an event from happening again," clinic officials stated Friday.

On Friday, the Cleveland Clinic sent letters to patients who might have been affected. It also set up a hotline, 1-866-907-0675, for patients with questions or concerns.

Machado, 22, and Ferrer, 29, had their initial appearances in federal court Friday and were released on bond, prosecutors said. If convicted, Machado and Ferrer could be sentenced to 10 years in prison and fined $250,000 on the most serious of the charges. They could not be reached for comment Friday.

The indictment of Machado and Ferrer is the first HIPAA prosecution in the Southern District of Florida and the third in the nation. Acosta said he expects more prosecutions under the act as more patients' records become available electronically.

Acosta said patients can help combat health-related identity theft by checking their health care statements carefully.

"Patients need to be very vigilant," he said. "If there are charges that should not appear, if there are charges that are fraudulent, then the patient needs to call Medicare or Medicaid or a health-care provider that is trusted to ensure that the billings are accurate and not the result of fraud."

Cousins Accused Of Medicare Fraud (LAKELED)

Lakeland Ledger, September 13, 2006

US Man Pleads Guilty To Copyright Theft (IDG)

By Grant Gross

IDG News Service, September 13, 2006

An Erie, Pennsylvania, man involved in a BitTorrent peer-to-peer network has pleaded guilty to copyright infringement and faces up to five years in prison and a US$250,000 fine, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said.

Scott R. McCausland, 24, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement in violation of the Family Entertainment Copyright Act, the DOJ announced Tuesday. He's scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 12 in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

McCausland was involved in a BitTorrent peer-to-peer (P-to-P) network previously known as Elite Torrents, the DOJ said. This guilty plea is part of the first U.S. criminal case focusing on a P-to-P network using the BitTorrent technology, the DOJ said.

McCausland's conviction is the third in a series of convictions arising from Operation D-Elite, a federal crackdown against the first providers of pirated works to the Elite Torrents network. At its prime, the Elite Torrents network attracted more than 133,000 members and allowed the illegal distribution of more than 2 million copies of movies, software, music and games, the DOJ said.

U.S. federal agents shut down the Elite Torrents network on May 25, 2005, seizing its main server and replacing its log-in Web page with the notice: "This site has been permanently shut down by the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement." Within the first week, the message was viewed more than a half a million times.

The Elite Torrents P-to-P network offered a virtually unlimited content selection, including illegal copies of copyright works before their availability in retail stores or movie theaters, the DOJ said. For example, the network made available the final entry in the Star Wars series, "Episode III: Revenge of the Sith," more than six hours before it was first shown in theaters. In the next 24 hours, it was downloaded from the Elite Torrents network more than 10,000 times, the DOJ said.

Street Sweep Scoops Up 18th St. Gang (LAT)

By Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

Federal prosecutors indicted 18 members of the 18th Street gang, including one imprisoned leader of the Mexican Mafia, on racketeering, conspiracy and narcotics charges for a scheme where they allegedly would sell streets in the Wilshire, Koreatown and Pico Union areas to drug dealers for weekly and monthly fees.

The criminal organization, prosecutors allege, was run by Ruben "Night Owl" Castro, a Mexican Mafia boss and leader of the 18th Street gang, from his federal prison cell with the help of his girlfriend. In 1997, Castro was convicted in the first federal Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) case against a gang.

In a sweep across Southern California this morning, federal and local law enforcement personnel arrested 10 members of two powerful cliques within the 18th Street gang known as the Hoover Locos and the Shatto Park Locos. Prosecutors allege that the 18th Street cliques in those areas answered to Castro and its shot callers collected so-called "tax" or "rent" from drug dealers for the right to sell narcotics on a street with a guarantee of protection from the 18th Street gang enforcers.

"It is a form of old-fashioned organized crime. Drug dealers would buy a street, say a section of Alvarado from 3rd to 4th street," said Bruce Riordan, assistant U.S. attorney.

Castro was housed in a Colorado federal prison during the time he allegedly oversaw the organization dubbed the "Ruben Castro organization" by prosecutors. Authorities admitted that even one of the toughest prison systems did not stop Castro from operating his criminal business. "No matter what we do, some people intent on committing crimes will do it," said George S. Cardona, chief assistant U.S. attorney.

In a 71-page indicted unsealed today, prosecutors allege that the gang operated a criminal enterprise with Castro through his girlfriend Jesusita Ramirez, 62, giving orders to so-called shot callers (gang leaders) who collected thousands of dollars weekly from drug dealers. Failure to pay the gang cliques resulted in fines, hiked rates and ultimately acts of violence, prosecutors alleged.

The leaders of the cliques often lived in the suburbs, such as Ontario, El Monte and Temple City, rather than the streets they plied their criminal enterprise, prosecutors said.

Castro's girlfriend is one of four suspects who remain at large. She is charged with participating in a RICO conspiracy and two narcotics trafficking conspiracies. Her position, Riordan said, reflected a growing phenomenon in the Mexican Mafia with women for the first time moving into positions of decision making.

"The respect grows to a level of authority they participate in more than passing messages," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0062425

Also at large are Noe Chavez, "Lil Duster," 23, of Los Angeles; alleged narcotics wholesaler Juana Fuentes, "Mani," 24, of Los Angeles and alleged narcotics wholesaler Edwin Schaad, 41, known as "Chaparro."

The 10 arrestees included: Mervin Nelson Sanchez, "Chivo," 35, of Ontario, alleged to be a Shatto Place gangster who oversaw the gang's business operations. Araceli Bravo, 33, known as Traviesa," an alleged gang leader for the Hoover clique who ran its operations.

The others arrested were: Michael Pineda, 28, of North Hollywood; Jose Juan Alvarez, 29, of Los Angeles; Efrain Ruiz Torres, 34, of Temple City; Jose Morales Perez, 26, of Los Angeles; Melida Flores, 48 of Palmdale; Juan Manuel Montes, 38, of El Monte; Marlon David Penate, 29, of Los Angeles; and Jorge Sanchez Monroy, 33, of Los Angeles.

Three other men in addition to Castro are imprisoned on prior charges: Elvin Ambrocio, 36, and Ronaldo Cruz, 34, are both serving sentences for illegally reentering the country after being deported as felony illegal immigrants while Luis Castro, 42, is in state prison after being convicted of receiving stolen property.

Ruben Castro, Ramirez, Sanchez Ambrocio, Bravo, Pineda, Cruz, Alvarez, Chavez, Torres and Perez face life without parole if convicted on the racketeering charges.

Missouri: Judge Voids Execution Procedure (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

A judge ruled that the state's newest protocol for execution by lethal injection is an improvement, but still falls short of providing constitutional protections. Ordering the state to revise its rules again, the judge, Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. of Federal District Court, said that a doctor who had long mixed the drugs used in executions should no longer "participate in any manner, at any level, in the State of Missouri's lethal injection process." The doctor, identified in court documents only as John Doe I, had acknowledged sometimes giving inmates smaller amounts of anesthesia than the state had said was its policy.

Smokers Seek $200 Billion From Tobacco Companies Over Low-Tar Cigarettes (LAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, The Associated Press

AP, September 13, 2006

Lawyers for smokers of light cigarettes have asked a federal judge to grant class action status to a lawsuit against major tobacco companies, allowing tens of millions of people nationwide to seek as much as $200 billion in damages.

In the lawsuit, filed in 2004, the smokers accused Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which is now part of Reynolds American Inc., based in Winston-Salem, N.C., and other defendants of deceiving them for more than 30 years by claiming low-tar cigarettes were less harmful than regular cigarettes. The manufacturers, they allege, knew the health risks were about the same.

U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein was scheduled to hear arguments Tuesday in Brooklyn.

As a class, light cigarette smokers would be entitled to between $120 billion and $200 billion in refunds for a deceptive product, plaintiffs attorney Michael D. Hausfeld said Tuesday.

"They paid for a cigarette that was supposed to pose less of a health risk," he said. "They got one that was as risky, if not more risky."

The tobacco companies "continue to believe that the class should not be certified," said R.J. Reynolds spokesman David Howard. "Class certification is not appropriate when you're talking about individual smokers and health claims."

Aside from the class action issue, the judge also has asked lawyers whether the recent findings of another federal judge should apply to the case.

A ruling in August by U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler in Washington, D.C., found that tobacco companies misled smokers by labeling cigarettes "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild."

The defendants "distorted the truth about low tar and light cigarettes so as to discourage smokers from quitting" and to preserve revenue, Kessler wrote. "They suppressed research. They destroyed documents. They manipulated the use of nicotine so as to increase and perpetuate addiction."

Though Kessler's decision did not penalize the manufacturers financially, it still "affirmed the accuracy" of the accusations in the light cigarette case and "exposed the companies to a several billion-dollar claim," said Paul Gallagher, another plaintiffs attorney.

Court papers filed by tobacco company lawyers have argued that adopting Kessler's findings as fact and having a jury simply determine damages "would be fundamentally unfair." The Washington decision, the papers said, was inconsistent with other cases in which juries rejected the same allegations about light cigarettes.

Defense attorneys also argued that applying the earlier ruling "makes no sense" since "it certainly will be appealed."

The light cigarette case was one of several filed during the past decade in Brooklyn, some under civil provisions of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. All the Brooklyn tobacco cases have been assigned to Weinstein, whose has previously devised far-reaching settlements for asbestos and Agent Orange litigation.

Judge Adds Extra Prison Time In 19 Smuggling Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A judge sentenced three people convicted in America's deadliest human smuggling attempt, exceeding the maximum recommended prison term in two of the cases.

U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore sent Emma Sapata Rodriguez to prison for 15 years Monday for her part in trying to smuggle more than 70 immigrants inside a stifling trailer in 2003. The truck trailer was abandoned about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston and nineteen of the immigrants died.

Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez, who was convicted partly by the testimony of her two sons, received the recommended maximum sentence of 12 years and seven months. She smuggled one person into the trailer.

Sapata and Sarrata were convicted along with Victor Sanchez Rodriguez of conspiracy to harbor and transport illegal immigrants. In addition to the conspiracy charge, the jury found Sarrata guilty of one count of harboring and Sapata guilty of eight counts of harboring and six counts of transporting. Sanchez was convicted of eight counts of harboring and nine counts of transporting.

Sapata's prison term exceeds federal sentencing guidelines by three years and seven months. Her husband, Sanchez, was sentenced Monday to 23 years and four months in prison. The sentence is three years and four months longer than the maximum recommended penalty.

His attorney said the sentences "makes no sense" and is appealing. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that judges are not bound by federal sentencing guidelines.

Gilmore explained the extra prison time by citing the horrific nature of the crime.

The couple smuggled eight people into the trailer, three of whom died, including a 5-year-old boy and his father.

So far, seven people have been sentenced to prison in the case, including the couple's son, Victor Jesus Rodriguez, whom Gilmore sent to prison for 20 years and seven months in July.

The leader of the smuggling ring, Karla Patricia Chavez Joya, received a 17-year, five-month prison term in May.

They are among 14 people indicted for trying to smuggle more than 70 immigrants inside a stifling trailer. During the trials, survivors testified that they screamed and clawed at the trailer's walls as the temperatures sweltered.

The second trial of the truck driver, Tyrone Williams, is scheduled to begin next month. A jury could not agree on a verdict last year. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty.

'Justice Can't Just Forget' Long-ago Racial Killings (AJC)

By Bob Kemper, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 13, 2006

The letter landed on Chip Burrus' desk about 18 months ago.

Two black couples, George and Mae Dorsey and Roger and Dorothy Malcom, had been brutally killed by a white mob in Georgia, it said. And the details astonished the FBI's assistant director, even 60 years after the crime was committed.

"I'd never heard of this [case] before, and I kind of fancy myself a student of the South," said Burrus, who had just taken over as assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division when the letter arrived. "You sort of start asking yourself, 'How many more of these are out there?' "

After ordering all of the FBI's field offices to comb their files and revisit people and groups who may have information about unsolved slayings from the civil rights era, Burrus had his answer: There are at least 35 to 50 such cases across the country, predominantly in the South.

But can these cold cases from 40, 50 or 60 years ago be solved?

"We won't have the ability to bring closure to a lot of them, probably," Burrus said. But "you just can't forget. Justice can't just forget. Even though they're 50 years old, it still doesn't mean we shouldn't take a look at them and use whatever laws we can to try to address it."

Congress is weighing whether to create special cold-case units at the Justice Department and FBI that, with a $5 million annual budget, would focus exclusively on unsolved killings from the civil rights era. But Congress has come late to the movement. Federal and state authorities already are reopening those cold cases in Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama and elsewhere.

This new urgency over unsolved killings from one of America's most violent eras was ignited in part by a series of successful prosecutions of civil rights murder cases in recent years and the fear among victims' families and law enforcement agencies that suspects and witnesses, now in their 70s and 80s, may not live much longer.

Further fueling the movement to close cold cases is the growing clout of black elected officials in the South, the appearance of a new generation of Southern prosecutors eager to put that racially explosive era behind them and the need of aging witnesses and perpetrators to clear their consciences before they die, according to civil rights groups and police.

Nationwide, 29 civil rights era killings have been reinvestigated since 1989, resulting in 27 arrests and 21 convictions, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center, a nonprofit organization in Mongtomery, Ala., whose missions include monitoring hate groups and providing legal expertise in civil rights cases. Twenty-two of those cases were in the South.

The latest breakthrough was in Florida in August. After reopening the 1951 firebombing murders of Harry and Harriette Moore for the fourth time, state investigators found new evidence — a suspect's deathbed confession that had been lost from the investigative file — and charged four white men with the Christmas Day slayings. All four were dead by the time the case was closed.

In Alabama on Aug. 29, Dallas County prosecutor Michael Jackson — the state's first African-American district attorney — announced he was launching an investigation into the 1965 death of civil rights worker Jimmy Lee Jackson, who was shot by a state trooper. State investigators and the FBI are expected to assist.

James Bonard Fowler — the trooper who shot Jackson and publicly acknowledged his role for the first time in a 2005 interview in the magazine of the Christian social justice group Sojourners — said it was self-defense. Other witnesses dispute that.

"These are events that help the South remember and face itself. These are things that most white Southerners didn't want to believe about themselves," said Mark Potok of the Southern Poverty Law Center.

Susan Glisson, director of the Institute for Racial Reconciliation at the University of Mississippi, said there is a downside to reopening old national wounds.

"People justifiably are worried that raising issues that are painful or controversial could at times set things back," Glisson said. Still, she said, that shouldn't deter investigators and prosecutors from pursuing the cold cases.

"At least beginning to have an honest appraisal of the past, at least beginning to tell the truth, outweighs the pain that it causes," Glisson said.

The only Georgia case on the FBI's list is what is known as the Moore's Ford Bridge lynching — the slayings described in the letter that landed on Burrus' desk.

In July 1946, the Malcoms and Dorseys, who were related, were taken to Moore's Ford Bridge along the banks of the Apalachee River in Walton County, lined up and shot hundreds of times.

Dozens of people may have seen or participated in the lynchings, but no one was arrested.

Authorities believe the lynching was in retaliation for a fight Roger Malcom had with Barney and Bob Hester, who were white, on the Hester farm 10 days before the murders. Barney Hester was stabbed during the melee and Roger Malcom went to jail screaming, "I ain't gonna get out of this! They gonna kill me."

Malcom was released from jail the day before the shootings.

Burrus declined to discuss the Moore's Ford investigation beyond saying, "We're kind of at a crucial point right now."

He said other Georgia cases could be examined: "I think there's going to be several down there we're going to be taking a second look at."

Bobby Howard of Social Circle has been the custodian of the story of the Moore's Ford case since 1968, when a local mortician, Dan Young, showed him pictures of the victims' bodies and gave him two lists — one of alleged white participants and one of blacks who reportedly knew about it.

Howard said he used to be wary of Georgia investigators and FBI agents interested in re-examining the killings after ignoring them for 60 years. But with the FBI's newly organized effort to close such cases, Howard said he believes a breakthrough in the Moore's Ford case may not be far off.

"I'm really excited about it right now. I've never felt this way about it before," he said. "With the stuff that's been happening I believe they really are serious."

In a series of trials since 1994 — a round of prosecutions writer David Halberstam once called "a lot of little Nurembergs" — authorities sent to prison men responsible for some of the most infamous murders from that era: the 1963 bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala., that killed four young girls; the 1963 assassination of civil rights activist Medgar Evers, who was gunned down in front of his children; and the 1964 murders of three civil rights workers who disappeared near Philadelphia, Miss., while investigating the burning of a black church.

Several of those convicted while in their 70s, 80s and 90s have died in prison.

Most of the remaining unsolved cases involve victims known to few people beyond their families and communities, with the exception of the slaying of Emmett Till. The black teenager from Chicago was visiting relatives in Mississippi in 1955 when he was tortured and killed, supposedly for whistling at a white woman. The boy's mother held an open-casket funeral, and a widely reprinted photo of Till's disfigured face let the world see what was happening in the South.

In 1955, an all-white jury acquitted two white men, Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam, in the case. But they later confessed to the killing in a Look magazine interview. Both have since died. The case helped galvanize the civil rights movement.

Federal attorneys and the FBI announced in 2004 they would reopen the case. In March, they said they would not file charges because the five-year statute of limitations on federal civil rights violations had expired.

Even without the added pressure of a national spotlight like the Till case, police are finding that lesser-known cases can be problematic to revive, let alone solve. Memories have faded over the decades, and circumstances surrounding the old cases sometimes make it difficult for authorities to determine whether a murder even occurred, or whether there were civil rights violations that would allow the federal government to intervene.

Yet having so much time pass between the crimes and the new investigations does mean that once-terrified witnesses and relatives of suspects are increasingly willing to reveal what they know.

And that, said Mark Vukelich, head of the FBI's civil rights division, is a bigger asset to investigators than all of the new technologies they are applying to the cases.

"The thing that works to our advantage is the fact that attitudes change," Vukelich said. "I think it's a bigger ally than the forensic aspect."

9th Circuit Finds Racial Motives In Juror Dismissals (LAW)

By Matthew Hirsch, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 13, 2006

Almost 12 years after the fact, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals shot down a Humboldt County, Calif., prosecutor's decision to yank three American Indian jurors and one Asian juror from an infamous murder trial, finding all were singled out on the basis of race.

The court, in a narrow 6-5 majority ruling, swept aside a series of earlier decisions in state and federal courts that upheld the jurors' exclusion in the trial of Richard Kesser. In 1995, Kesser was convicted and sentenced to life without parole for hiring a hit man to kill his ex-wife.

Though the prosecutor's handling of jury selection had been unsuccessfully appealed up to the California Supreme Court, the 9th Circuit gave it a closer examination under the Batson and Wheeler standards. The lower courts had accepted the prosecutor's nonracial explanations, but the 9th Circuit judges said those excuses fell flat when compared to the full record of the jury selection process.

"The racial animus behind the prosecutor's strikes is clear," wrote Judge Jay Bybee, who authored the majority opinion in Kesser v. Cambra, 06 C.D.O.S. 8481 .

In his opinion, Bybee reprinted at length prosecutor Worth Dikeman Jr.'s notes, without citing Dikeman by name.

There, Dikeman described one juror as a "darker skinned" "[N]ative American female." Noting that the juror worked for a local tribe, Dikeman indicated he wanted to keep such people off the jury because "they are sometimes resistive of the criminal justice system generally and somewhat suspicious of the system."

Dikeman's notes also included race-neutral reasons for excluding the American Indian jurors. Among those was the prosecutor's observation that one juror appeared "somewhat unstable [and] fairly weak."

Upon earlier review, the 1st District Court of Appeal concluded that those reasons were not "sham excuses" and upheld the jurors' exclusion.

Bybee and the 9th Circuit majority disagreed. Dikeman's "ostensibly 'race-neutral' reasons show themselves to be only a veneer, a pleasing moss having no depth," Bybee wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0062429

Bybee criticized the state appeal court for letting Dikeman's jury strikes stand. Not only did the court fail to review the record to find obvious contradictions in Dikeman's reasoning, it erred in finding any "sincere, permissible motives," Bybee said.

There were two concurring opinions, authored by Judges Kim Wardlaw and Marsha Berzon. The dissent, authored by Judge Pamela Rymer, said the state appellate court's ruling was not an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law.

Reached Monday afternoon, Dikeman said he was "very disappointed in the decision, even though I haven't read it."

Since Kesser's trial, Dikeman said, 19 judges have reviewed his decision to strike the four nonwhite potential jurors. Most controversial was his decision against Debra Ringels, the only one slated to be a member of the panel rather than an alternate.

"I know what I did, and I know what I did not do. And I did not get rid of that juror because she was Native American," Dikeman said of Ringels. "I got rid of her because I thought she would be a bad juror in that case."

Kesser's appellate attorney, William Weiner, said he was "very, very delighted" by the ruling, especially given the moderate-to-conservative group of judges picked to rule on his case.

"When I first got the panel, I was heartbroken to be honest," Weiner said.

An attorney general's spokesman said the state prosecutor has not decided on seeking a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court. If the 9th Circuit ruling stands, Kesser will get a new trial.

Lawsuit Challenges Use Of Federal Aid For Bible-Based Counseling (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

A group called Americans United for Separation of Church and State filed suit yesterday to block federal financing for an organization that provides marriage counseling based on the Bible.

The lawsuit is another challenge to the Bush administration's efforts to channel money for social services to religious organizations. While religious groups are not barred from getting public money, such financing can only be used for secular purposes, not "worship, religious instruction or proselytization," according to government guidelines.

Americans United, a watchdog group based in Washington, D.C., filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court in Tacoma, Wash., on behalf of 13 state residents. They object to federal funds being used to support the Northwest Marriage Institute, which states in its newsletter that it offers "Bible-based premarital and marriage counseling." The institute, in Vancouver, Wash., received $97,750 in federal grants in 2005 from the Department of Health and Human Services.

The lawsuit argued that the institute uses federal funds for religious purposes, including developing materials with religious content, buying equipment for use in religiously based programming and paying part of the salaries of employees who do Bible-based counseling.

"This program trains people in how to make their marriages conform to one narrow interpretation of faith," said the Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United, in a written statement. "The federal government has no business forcing the taxpayer to subsidize that."

A spokesman for the Health and Human Services Department declined to comment on the suit, saying that the agency generally does not comment on pending lawsuits.

Bob Whiddon Jr., director of the Northwest Marriage Institute, said he had not yet seen the lawsuit.

But he said that the grants were meant to strengthen his organization by paying for consultants to improve its business practices and to buy equipment, not for programs.

"The grants say that I'm allowed to do things that will allow me to increase the capacity of my organization to serve the community," Dr. Whiddon said in a telephone interview. "None of what we do with the money is for religious purposes."

The administration has failed to provide clear guidelines about what federal funds can be used for, said Robert W. Tuttle, a law professor at George Washington University who is an expert on religion-based initiatives.

The government instructs organizations broadly that they are prohibited from using funds for religious purposes. But, he said, it does not answer the seemingly small, yet sometimes critical, questions that could occur in daily practice.

For example, could software or an LCD projector bought with federal money be used for religious purposes? Or is it acceptable to give federal money to improve the management practices of an obviously religious organization like the Northwest Marriage Institute, when those changes would affect both its secular work and religious mission?

"The government studiously avoids clearing up these questions because it doesn't want to discourage people from applying and look hostile to faith groups," Professor Tuttle said. "I honestly don't think it would discourage people. Instead, it would give them a good sense of how to avoid being sued."

ANTITRUST:

Drug Maker Fires Chief Of 5 Years (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

The troubled five-year term of Peter R. Dolan as chief executive of the drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb ended yesterday when the board dismissed him over the mishandling of a patent dispute involving the company's blockbuster drug, Plavix.

Mr. Dolan, 50, was replaced with an interim chief, James M. Cornelius, a Bristol-Myers director. Mr. Cornelius had recently served as the interim chief executive of the medical device maker Guidant and was a crucial player in its agreement to be acquired earlier this year by Boston Scientific.

Although the Bristol-Myers board said it would mount a search for a permanent chief executive, Mr. Cornelius's interim appointment increased speculation on Wall Street that the company might become an acquisition candidate.

In a conference call with reporters yesterday, the chairman of Bristol-Myers, James D. Robinson III, declined to speculate on a possible sale of the company. But he said the preservation of the Plavix franchise was the company's main objective. Bristol markets Plavix in a partnership with Sanofi-Aventis of France.

Plavix, used by millions of people to fight blood clots, is the company's best-selling drug, with sales in the United States of $3.5 billion last year. "I can tell you that our priority No. 1 is Plavix, Plavix, Plavix, and we intend to vigorously defend our patent rights," Mr. Robinson said yesterday.

A trial is scheduled for next January over a patent challenge by Apotex, the Canadian generic drug maker with which Bristol-Myers had tried to reach an out-of-court settlement this year. Missteps in those negotiations led to Apotex's undermining Bristol-Myers's Plavix franchise by flooding the market with a cheaper generic version of the drug.

Although a judge subsequently ordered a stop to those shipments, the millions of dollars worth of the generic drug already on the market forced Bristol-Myers to lower its earnings forecast for this year by as much as 25 percent.

Accusations that Bristol-Myers tried to hide details of the negotiations from government antitrust reviewers resulted in a Justice Department investigation that included an F.B.I. search of Mr. Dolan's office in late July.

Mr. Dolan was not available for comment yesterday. Mr. Robinson said that the interim chief, Mr. Cornelius, was well suited to the task because of his extensive experience in health care companies. Besides his role at Guidant, he is a former chief financial officer for the drug maker Eli Lilly & Company, where he worked for 28 years.

Mr. Cornelius, 62, said he was happy to serve as interim chief, but would not be a candidate for the job on a permanent basis.

The board's removal of Mr. Dolan followed a meeting Monday night at the headquarters in Manhattan, convened by Mr. Robinson. With Mr. Dolan absent, a court-appointed overseer recommended that he be fired for his handling of the Plavix negotiations with Apotex.

Yesterday, the company declined to provide details about the objections raised by the overseer, Frederick B. Lacey, a former federal judge. But Bristol-Myers did say that there had been no finding by Mr. Lacey that the company or its employees had broken the law.

And it said that Mr. Lacey did not accuse the company of violating the terms of a deferred prosecution agreement it entered last year with the Justice Department in an unrelated accounting scandal.

Mr. Lacey, who declined yesterday to discuss the matter, is monitoring the company's behavior under the terms of that Justice Department agreement, which the company entered into in the hope of avoiding a criminal indictment. Under such agreements, companies are expected to be model corporate citizens in their dealings with regulators and their disclosures to investors. And court-authorized overseers like Mr. Lacey have broad powers to monitor the company's activities.

On Mr. Lacey's recommendation, the board also fired Richard K. Willard, a former chief of the Justice Department's civil division who was hired as chief counsel last October. Mr. Willard's role in the Plavix case is not publicly known. He could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Mr. Robinson said yesterday that the board had been reviewing the company's management for weeks, hinting that Mr. Lacey's recommendation merely hastened the departure of the chief executive.

"We gave a good deal of consideration over the past few weeks to what would be in the best interest of the company in terms of its leadership going forward and concluded that it was time for change," Mr. Robinson said.

Mr. Robinson said that Mr. Dolan was “not fired for cause” — meaning not for wrongdoing or for neglect of his duties. That means Mr. Dolan will probably be eligible for a severance package, the details of which Mr. Robinson said had not been worked out.

Shares of Bristol rose 93 cents, to $24.32 yesterday. But the shares are off nearly 60 percent since Mr. Dolan became chief executive in 2001.

Speculation among financial analysts turned to the question of who might succeed Mr. Dolan, as well as a possible acquisition of the company. At 50, Mr. Dolan had expected to remain in charge of the company for years and had not groomed a successor.

“My sense is that they’re going to have to go outside,” said Jami Rubin, a pharmaceutical analyst with Morgan Stanley. Ms. Rubin suggested that Christine Poon, the vice chairman for Johnson & Johnson, who spent 15 years at Bristol-Myers, would be a strong candidate for the job.

In a note to investors yesterday, Friedman, Billings, Ramsey said that Mr. Dolan’s ouster increased the chances of a takeover of the company, which analysts said might fetch $35 a share. Friedman, Billings noted that Mr. Cornelius, the interim chief, acted as Guidant’s chief during its purchase by Boston Scientific.

Friedman, Billings analysts said that the most likely suitors for Bristol-Myers would be Pfizer, AstraZeneca, GlaxoSmithKline or Novartis.

While declining to address takeover speculation, Mr. Robinson, the board chairman, did acknowledge that the effort to settle the patent dispute with Apotex had been a mistake.

Hoping to protect the Plavix franchise until shortly before the patent expires in 2011, Bristol-Myers had twice this year reached a tentative settlement that in part would have involved paying Apotex to wait on the sidelines.

As a way to bring Apotex back to the negotiating table after regulators rejected the first version of the agreement, Bristol-Myers made unusually generous concessions that would go into effect only if regulators again rejected the deal.

One was the agreement not to seek triple financial damages, as would be Bristol-Myers’s and Sanofi’s right, if Apotex started selling its drug but eventually lost the patent case in court. The other concession was to wait five days after Apotex started shipping its drug before seeking a court’s injunction against those shipments.

“I think that in hindsight, maybe we shouldn’t have negotiated in the first place,’’ Mr. Robinson said, “because we were negotiating in good faith. I’m not sure that was reciprocated.”

That was an apparent reference to the company’s claims that it was misled by Bernard C. Sherman, the chief executive of Apotex. In court, a lawyer for Sanofi-Aventis and Bristol-Myers has argued that the accusations that started the Justice Department investigation were contrived by Mr. Sherman to scuttle the settlement deal — and to begin the concessions that enabled Apotex to start shipping the generic Plavix.

Mr. Sherman, in an e-mail message yesterday, called the accusation “nonsensical.”

Bristol-Myers Ousts Its Chief At Monitor's Urging (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 12 -- Drugmaker Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. pushed out its chief executive, Peter R. Dolan, on Tuesday at the urging of a federal monitor who was looking into how top management dealt with generic competition for Plavix, its top-selling heart drug.

Bristol's board announced the departure of Dolan, its chief executive since 2001, and general counsel Richard K. Willard one day after the company's independent directors met with the monitor, Frederick B. Lacey, and Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey.

The New York firm has been operating since last year under a deferred prosecution agreement with Christie that resolved an earlier, unrelated accounting scandal by requiring it to stay out of trouble for two years and allowing Lacey, a former judge, to call for management changes, as he did Monday night.

Bristol Chairman James D. Robinson III said in a conference call that the board unanimously agreed that Dolan had to go. Neither he, Lacey nor Christie would describe specifically what concerned Lacey enough to recommend Dolan's termination.

Although Bristol could have tried to negotiate to keep Dolan, the board chose not to because the Plavix situation and other "failures have caused a loss of confidence," Robinson said. "It was time for a change."

The board temporarily replaced Dolan with James M. Cornelius, a Bristol director and a former chief executive of medical-equipment manufacturer Guidant Corp., where he served in a similar capacity after a scandal there in 2004.

Dolan's ouster is one of the highest-profile management changes at a company operating under a deferred prosecution agreement. Prosecutors often seek new management as part of such settlements -- Bristol named an independent chairman as part of its initial deal -- but subsequent changes are far less common.

Christie's spokesman, Michael Drewniak, said that the U.S. attorney "was fully supportive of Judge Lacey's recommendations" for management change but noted that "there was no finding of a violation of the [agreement] or criminal wrongdoing."

The Plavix issue arose earlier this year after Bristol attempted to strike a deal with Apotex Inc. to keep its competing generic version of the blood-thinning drug off the market until 2011. State attorneys general rejected the deal as anti-competitive, and the Justice Department has opened an antitrust investigation separate from Christie's probe.

Apotex put its product on sale this summer, and it quickly captured 75 percent of the market; Bristol sued for patent infringement and won a preliminary injunction halting further production, but the judge declined to recall the generic medicine already on the market. The case is to be heard in January.

Robinson, Bristol's chairman, said the firm's outside counsel had assured the board Monday night that it had "no reason to believe there was anything unlawful done by anyone at Bristol-Myers Squibb" in connection with the Apotex agreement.

The Plavix dispute is not related to the accounting problems that first got Bristol in trouble. In that case, Bristol was accused of pushing an excess amount of its products on its distributors, a process known as "channel-stuffing." The firm paid $300 million in restitution and agreed to two years of monitoring by Lacey, who has attended board meetings and made quarterly reports to Christie.

Lacey declined via e-mail to comment on his work as monitor. His intervention at Bristol comes as deferred prosecution agreements are becoming far more common.

Once a tool aimed primarily at keeping individual offenders on the straight and narrow, these agreements are now being used to resolve corporate cases in which government investigators think they have found serious wrongdoing but worry that a criminal indictment could put a large public company out of business.

Last month, the brokerage arm of insurance giant Prudential Financial Inc. signed a deferred prosecution agreement to resolve allegations that brokers in its Boston office helped big investors evade rules against short-term trading of mutual funds. Computer Associates International Inc., now known as CA, entered into a similar deal after its top executives were accused of criminal accounting fraud.

"The law on the books is so wooden. Prosecutors had a choice between prosecuting [entire corporations] for the sins of their employees and companies getting off scot-free," said Fordham University law professor Daniel Richman. Deferred prosecutions "really have created a third choice," he said.

Legal analysts said the leadership change at Bristol shows that prosecutors are serious about keeping the pressure on companies that have engaged in wrongdoing. "I see it as encouraging that we have monitors who are doing what they are supposed to do, which is rolling heads," said James D. Cox, a law professor at Duke University.

Although some analysts raised concern that federal prosecutors were getting involved in corporate governance, Samuel W. Buell, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, pointed out that when corporations are convicted of crimes -- as opposed to entering into a deferred prosecution agreement -- probation and monitoring are almost always part of the resulting sentence.

Robinson said Bristol's board had not discussed a severance package for Dolan, whose departure he described as "involuntary."

Cornelius, a former Eli Lilly & Co. executive who helped Guidant through a regulatory inquiry into malfunctioning heart defillibrators and a bumpy merger with Boston Scientific Corp., was upbeat on the conference call with reporters. "Our financial strength here at Bristol-Myers Squibb is outstanding," he said. "The new product pipeline is one of the best in the future that I've ever seen."

The stock market greeted the leadership change with enthusiasm. Bristol-Myers shares, which have lost more than half their value during Dolan's five-year tenure, closed at $24.32, up 93 cents, or nearly 4 percent.

Bristol-Myers Chief Quits After Bungling Plavix Deal (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport And David Voreacos

Bloomberg, September 13, 2006

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. Chief Executive Officer Peter Dolan quit after bungling an agreement to keep a generic version of the drugmaker's top-selling heart pill Plavix off the market.

Dolan, 50, and General Counsel Richard Willard stepped down after a court-appointed monitor last night told the Bristol-Myers board they should be fired. The monitor, former U.S. Judge Frederick Lacey, was probing corporate governance issues related to a patent accord on Plavix, Bristol-Myers's biggest-selling product, the company said today in a statement.

James Cornelius, the former chairman and interim chief executive officer of the medical device maker Guidant Corp., was appointed to replace Dolan while the board searches for a successor. Dolan, who is staying on as an adviser, didn't have an obvious heir apparent within the company, analysts said.

``The board simply didn't have a choice," said Les Funtleyder, an analyst with Miller Tabak & Co. in New York, in an interview. ``It became obvious that his presence at Bristol was not constructive to the stock or the company, and it was actually more of a distraction than a help."

Shares of New York-based Bristol-Myers rose 59 cents, or 2.5 percent, to $23.98 at 1:03 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Since Dolan took over as CEO, Bristol-Myers's stock has lost 56 percent of its value.

``The positive response we see in the stock is related to the board listening" to shareholder requests for a change in the company's management, said Anthony Butler, an analyst with Lehman Brothers in New York, in an interview today.

Five-Year Run

Dolan's departure concludes a five-year run as CEO marked by missteps. U.S. prosecutors investigated payments Bristol-Myers made to wholesalers between 1999 and mid-2002 that encouraged drug distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell, a practice called channel stuffing.

To settle the probe, Bristol-Myers last year accepted a deferred prosecution agreement with Christopher Christie, U.S. attorney for New Jersey, giving Lacey the power to require that the company take ``any steps he believes are necessary" to comply with the accord. Under the settlement, Dolan gave up his position as chairman, and the company paid $300 million to resolve the matter.

Dolan in March made a deal with Canada's Apotex Inc. to delay generic competition for Plavix, a drug widely used to prevent heart attacks and strokes that generated $6.3 billion in revenue last year. The accord was rejected by U.S. state attorneys general, clearing the way for Apotex last month to sell cheaper copies of the product five years before the patent's expiration. Apotex claimed in court papers that part of the agreement was secret.

Christie Comments

Lacey and Christie ``made no finding that the company violated the deferred prosecution agreement," Christie said today in an interview. Lacey had been looking into corporate governance issues related to the Plavix agreement, he said, declining to elaborate.

Christie said he wouldn't discuss why Lacey recommended Dolan's firing, a conclusion that he said he supported. Under the deferred prosecution agreement, the board was required to follow Lacey's recommendations and could appeal only to Christie, giving him the final say.

The company also said that Lacey and Christie's inquiry ``did not involve any matters" subject to the Justice Department's antitrust investigation of the Plavix agreement. The Federal Bureau of Investigation raided Dolan's office July 26 searching for documents and e-mails that might show he deceived U.S. antitrust enforcers about the accord.

Bristol-Myers's settlement to avoid prosecution for channel stuffing included a promise that the company ``will at all times strive for openness and transparency in its public reporting and disclosures."

Plavix Situation `a Disaster'

``The last three months, this whole Plavix situation has just been a disaster, and it just reminds people of the troubles and the lack of leadership that were more in the forefront two or three years ago," said Patrick Kaser, portfolio manager at Brandywine Asset Management in Philadelphia, in an interview. ``The board probably is happy that someone actually gave them cover on this."

Willard will be replaced on an interim basis by Sandra Leung, vice president and corporate secretary, Bristol-Myers said. Leung will be advised by board member Louis J. Freeh, the former director of the FBI and a former U.S. judge, the company said.

Cornelius's ``extensive experience in the health-care arena will be critical in ensuring a smooth transition of leadership of this great company," said James D. Robinson, Bristol-Myers's chairman, who is the former chief executive officer of American Express Co., in a statement.

Robinson's Comment

``I also want to express my deep appreciation and respect for Peter for his unyielding commitment to our company's mission, values and purpose," Robinson said. He said Dolan executed ``a successful strategy that has put Bristol-Myers Squibb squarely on a path toward growth and leadership for the future."

Bristol-Myers and its marketing partner Sanofi-Aventis SA of Paris had sued Weston, Ontario-based Apotex, arguing that they have exclusive marketing rights to sell Plavix until a patent expires in 2011. Apotex received U.S. Food and Drug Administration approval earlier this to sell a generic version. Bristol-Myers and Sanofi made the deal delaying competition to settle the lawsuit and keep Apotex from selling its copies while the patent case was pending.

Lehman analyst Butler said Karen Katen, the former Pfizer Inc. vice chairman, and Christine Poon, a former president of pharmaceuticals at Bristol-Myers who is now a Johnson & Johnson vice chairman, may be in the running to succeed Dolan.

Bristol-Myers Fires CEO And Counsel (AP)

By Wallace Witkowski

AP, September 13, 2006

NEW YORK - Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. yesterday ousted Peter R. Dolan as chief executive officer at the urging of a federal monitor, who found that the drugmaker's patent deal with a generic competitor violated an agreement with prosecutors. In an apparent move to reassure investors, it also decided to maintain its substantial dividend.

Several analysts and investors had speculated whether the board would keep its 28-cent-a-share dividend given its recent lowered earnings forecast as sales of its best-selling drug, Plavix, tumbled because of earlier-than-expected competition from a cheaper generic pill.

"The board opted to hold onto the status quo to recognize the loyalty of investors," said Friedman Billings Ramsey analyst David Moskowitz, who had earlier speculated that the board might cut the dividend by as much as 25 percent to conserve cash. "The ridding of Dolan sends a strong message that the board was listening to investors."

Earlier in the day, Bristol-Myers ousted Dolan after five years as CEO and said its general counsel, Richard K. Willard, would leave the company.

Those moves came a day after a federal monitor recommended at a board meeting that the company fire both Dolan and Willard. Dolan has been CEO since 2001, and Willard was appointed general counsel in October.

The company named board member James M. Cornelius as interim CEO effectively immediately to replace Dolan.

Cornelius served as chairman of the board and interim CEO at medical-device maker Guidant Corp. from September 2004 through April 2006, after decades at drugmaker Eli Lilly & Co.

Sandra Leung, the company's corporate secretary, was named interim general counsel, and will be aided by former FBI Director Louis J. Freeh, a board member and former general counsel.

The board formed a special committee to fill the positions permanently.

The dividend is payable Nov. 1 to shareholders of record as of Oct. 6. The board also forecast a full-year dividend of $1.12 per share.

Bristol-Myers Squibb shares rose 93 cents, or 3.98 percent, to close at $24.32 on the New York Stock Exchange. Before yesterday's rally, the stock had lost 11 percent since hitting its 52-week high of $26.14 on July 25.

The company confirmed reports that Judge Frederick B. Lacey recommended the firings, and that Christopher J. Christie, U.S. attorney for New Jersey, concurred. Both Lacey and Christie attended a meeting of the board late Monday.

Lacey was appointed monitor of the company in June 2005 after Bristol-Myers settled federal charges for an accounting scandal that ended up costing the company $800 million. Under the agreement, charges would be dropped against the company if it met certain standards until 2007.

The apparent last straw was Dolan's and Willard's conduct stemming from a failed agreement between Sanofi-Aventis, Bristol-Myers' partner for the drug Plavix, and Canadian drugmaker Apotex Inc. to keep a lower-priced generic version of the best-selling blood thinner off the market.

The agreement soured when state attorneys general refused to sign off on it.

As a result, Apotex launched its generic version in early August, and quickly grabbed about 75 percent of new prescriptions. Plavix is the second-best-selling drug in the world, with annual sales of about $5.9 billion.

The Plavix agreement also fell under a federal criminal investigation, leading FBI agents to raid Bristol-Myers' offices, including Dolan's, in New York. In the meantime, a judge halted further sales of Apotex's generic version of Plavix but declined to order a recall, leading some to believe that there could be generic product on the market well into 2007.

Some Wall Street analysts had insisted the board cut its losses now and fire Dolan, believing that the Plavix agreement was not an isolated incident. Critics also point to the accounting scandal, expensive investments in drugs like ImClone Systems Inc.'s Erbitux cancer drug, and failed pipeline drugs like the blood-pressure medication Vanlev and diabetes treatment Pargluva.

Plavix deal undoes CEO Dolan

Yesterday's ouster of Peter R. Dolan as CEO of Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. was the culmination of a series of missteps, including the mishandling of its top-selling drug, a blood thinner called Plavix:

1998: Plavix is launched.

May 2001: Dolan is named CEO of the New York-based drug company.

June 15, 2005: Bristol-Myers agrees to pay $300 million to settle federal charges that it offered wholesalers incentives to stockpile products in a scheme called "channel stuffing." Two former executives are indicted for their role in the scandal. Under its deferred prosecution agreement, all charges would be dropped if the company met certain standards until 2007.

March 21, 2006: Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis, co-marketers of Plavix, agree to pay Apotex Inc. at least $40 million in a deal under which the Canadian generic drug company ends its challenge of the patents protecting Plavix. The drug generated global sales of $5.9 billion in 2005. The deal, which needs regulatory approvals, would prohibit Apotex from selling a generic version until 2011.

June 25: The companies announce they have modified the agreement in response to concerns raised by the Federal Trade Commission and various state attorneys general.

July 27: Bristol-Myers says it is the subject of a criminal antitrust probe

settlement with Apotex.

July 28: State attorneys general refuse to grant antitrust clearance to the settlement. The Wall Street Journal reports that FBI agents raided Dolan's office July 26.

Aug. 8: Apotex launches its generic version.

Aug. 17: Bristol-Myers says

it has hired former federal prosecutor Mary Jo White to investigate what went wrong with the Apotex agreement. In a separate development, Apotex claims in court papers that it had a "side agreement" with Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis that involved delaying the sale of generic Plavix. Bristol-Myers says its ongoing internal investigation has found no evidence of unlawful conduct.

Aug. 31: Federal court in New York orders Apotex to halt sales of it's generic blood thinner.

Sept. 11: Former federal judge Frederick B. Lacey, who monitors the deferred prosecution agreement, recommends that the Bristol-Myers board terminate Dolan and Richard K. Willard, its general counsel.

Yesterday: Dolan and Willard quit. James M. Cornelius, former chairman of Guidant Corp., is named interim CEO.

Drug Giant Opens Door To Suitors After Firing Chief (NSL)

By GEORGE E. JORDAN, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), September 13, 2006

Bristol-Myers ousts Dolan, then suggests it will consider proposals

First they fired the CEO.

Then they said openly for the first time they would consider selling the company.

And if that happens to Bristol-Myers Squibb, another name in the pantheon of drug giants that dominated the New Jersey economy could disappear.

The board of the pharmaceutical giant -- with some 6,000 workers in New Brunswick and Princeton -- ended weeks of speculation yesterday and fired chief executive Peter Dolan.

Then, in a startling move for a company that likes to play things close to the vest, board chairman James Robinson suggested the company could go on the block.

"We will deal with any bona fide proposal that anyone wants to make in an orderly and professional manner," Robinson said in a conference call with reporters last night. Robinson declined to comment further on talk of a possible takeover.

Dolan's ouster sent shares of Bristol-Myers up nearly 4 percent and prompted widespread debate on Wall Street about whether and when the company would become a takeover target.

In recent years, Warner-Lambert and Pharmacia were gobbled up by Pfizer, and Aventis was taken over by the French company Sanofi, now known as Sanofi Aventis. All three were based in New Jersey.

Dolan, at 50 one of the youngest Fortune 500 CEOs, was fired for blunders that allowed a competitor to flood the market with generic copies of Bristol-Myers' biggest-selling drug.

The company's board also said it may take the extraordinary step of denying severance pay to Dolan, who had won praise for his drug-development efforts but stumbled badly during a five-year tenure that included a series of costly lawsuits, regulatory probes and criminal investigations.

"This was an involuntary departure," said Robinson, the former American Express chief executive who is now Bristol-Myers chairman.

He added: "We haven't dealt with" Dolan's severance, which under the terms of his contract could include more than $13 million in cash and other benefits.

In a move to calm shareholders, the board voted to hold steady the company's cherished annual dividend of $1.12 a share, which appeared in danger last week when Bristol-Myers forecast dramatically lower earnings due to a sharp drop in sales of Plavix, its popular heart medication.

Some Wall Street analysts said Bristol-Myers' latest predicament could increase the likelihood of a takeover by another big drugmaker. Several European pharmaceutical companies have long coveted Bristol's stable of cancer drugs and its product pipeline, with several biotechnology drugs under development.

Others industry analysts predicted the company's board would now dig in its heels, hire a well-respected chief executive and refocus the company on specialty treatments for cancer and HIV, much like a biotechnology company.

"I think this business is not broken," said Anthony Butler, a pharmaceutical analyst with Lehman Brothers. "I think it can and should continue to grow."

Based in New York, Bristol-Myers is one of New Jersey's largest employers, with some 6,000 workers at facilities around Princeton and New Brunswick.

Investors cheered the change in the executive suite, driving up the value of Bristol-Myers shares to $24.32, the highest level since July.

In announcing Dolan's immediate departure, the company named James Cornelius, a member of Bristol-Myers' board and former chairman of the medical device maker Guidant Corp., as interim chief executive pending a search for a permanent successor. As CEO of Guidant, Cornelius orchestrated its sale to Boston Scientific.

Dolan's ouster came a day after a federal monitor recommended his removal and the ouster of general counsel Richard Willard over their handling of negotiations with Apotex, a Canadian drugmaker that last month launched generic copies of Plavix. Earlier in the year, Bristol-Myers struck a deal to pay Apotex a reported $40 million to keep the copy off the market until its patent on Plavix expired in 2011, but the deal fell apart when the U.S. Justice Department opened an investigation into the companies' dealings.

The monitor, former U.S. Judge Frederick Lacey, had been appointed last year to oversee the company after Bristol-Myers admitted to wrongdoing in a $2 billion accounting scandal and agreed to pay $300 million to avoid criminal prosecution.

Bristol-Myers said yesterday Lacey is still probing corporate governance issues related to Bristol's accord with Apotex.

Robinson said: "In hindsight, maybe we shouldn't have negotiated in the first place, because we negotiated in good faith. A deal was cut. We thought as revised it stood a very good change to be approved by the authorities. It was not. Since then, we have gone about our business and fought very hard."

Lacey's position on Dolan and Willard was supported by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie, who led the probe into the accounting scandal and negotiated the "deferred prosecution" agreement with Bristol-Myers.

Under last year's agreement, Bristol-Myers pleaded guilty to securities fraud. It had been accused of encouraging drug distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell -- a practice called channel stuffing -- between 1999 and mid-2002 in order to mislead investors about its net earnings.

Under the deferred prosecution deal, Robinson said yesterday, Bristol-Myers' board had no choice but to fire Dolan and Willard because their ouster had the backing of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Christie, who attended Lacey's briefing, could not be reached for comment.

His spokesman, Michael Drewniak, said news accounts incorrectly reported Bristol-Myers violated the terms of its deferred prosecution agreement, which requires quarterly reports from Lacey and regular meetings between prosecutors and Bristol-Myers executives.

"There was no finding of any violation," Drewniak said.

US Drugs Group Seen As Takeover Target After Chief Ousted (TIMES)

By James Doran, in New York

London Times, September 13, 2006

THE chief executive and senior lawyer of Bristol-Myers Squibb were ousted from the troubled drug-maker yesterday as speculation mounted that the $48 billion company could become the target of a bid.

Peter Dolan, the chief executive for five years, was forced to resign, after Frederick Lacey, a federal monitor put in place to make sure the drug company complied with legal orders made last year, pushed for his resignation.

Mr Lacey recommended to a special session of the company's board that it get rid of Mr Dolan and Richard Willard, Bristol-Myer's general counsel, because of their role in a scheme to keep cheap generic versions of one of the company's drugs off the market. US drug manufacturers must allow generic, or unbranded, versions of their products to be manufactured after a certain period. The practice is a boon for consumers, but can have a crippling effect on drug companies, which often rely on just one or two big-name drugs to drive profits growth.

Analysts were quick to pounce on the latest unsettling news from Bristol-Myers with claims that the company is more vulnerable than ever to a hostile takeover bid from one of its rivals. Industry sources said European pharmaceutical companies like Sanofi-Aventis, Schering-Plough and AstraZeneca could be interested.

Under Mr Dolan's five-year stewardship Bristol-Myers has lurched from crisis to crisis and the shares have lost almost 60 per cent of their value.

Last year the US Attorney in New Jersey forced the company to comply with a deferred prosecution agreement after an investigation into $2.5 billion worth of "channel stuffing" — a practice that involves overloading wholesalers with drugs to meet quarterly sales targets. The company also paid $300 million to settle the claims. In 2001, soon after Mr Dolan became chief executive, he was forced to relinquish the role of chairman when authorities began an accounting inquiry that led to Bristol-Myers spending more than $800 million to settle lawsuits and government inquiries.

He was also criticised for spending as much as $2 billion to buy Erbitux, a controversial colon cancer medication made by ImClone.

But his final error was to become embroiled in a convoluted deal with Apotex, a small Canadian drug maker that was set to make a generic version of Plavix — Bristol's leading blood- thinning drug. Mr Dolan offered to pay Apotex tens of millions of dollars to delay the start of its generic Plavix manufacturing plans. But the deal fell through and is now the subject of a federal criminal investigation for possible antitrust violations.

Bristol-Myers CEO And GC Resign In Midst Of Federal Probe (LAW)

By Martin C. Daks, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, September 13, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb's CEO Peter Dolan and General Counsel Richard Willard resigned Tuesday, spurred by the recommendations of a federal monitor, after the company came perilously close to violating a deferred-prosecution agreement entered last year.

Bristol-Myers director James Cornelius was appointed interim CEO of the New York-based pharmaceutical and health care products company, and Sandra Leung, vice president and corporate secretary, was named interim general counsel. Former FBI director Louis Freeh, now a Bristol-Myers director, was appointed as Leung's adviser.

Bristol-Myers has had to answer to monitor Frederick Lacey, a former federal judge, since last year when it signed a deferred-prosecution agreement with U.S. Attorney for New Jersey Christopher Christie in the face of a prosecution on conspiracy and securities-fraud charges. The company has extensive research facilities located in New Jersey.

The agreement was the outgrowth of a three-year investigation into a "channel stuffing" scheme by which the company, during 2000 and 2001, allegedly used financial inducements to get wholesale distributors to accept unnecessarily high levels of inventory shipments, thereby artificially pumping up quarterly sales results.

The June 2005 accord meant that Bristol-Meyers could avoid further federal litigation if it kept its nose clean. But under Dolan's and Willard's watch, the Department of Justice's antitrust division began probing the company's agreement to pay at least $40 million to a Canadian competitor, Apotex Inc., to delay putting its generic version of Bristol-Myers' blood thinner Plavix on the market.

Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeffrey Macdonald said he was unable to comment on the reasons behind the decision to remove Dolan and Willard.

In a prepared statement announcing the personnel changes, Bristol-Myers noted that the federal monitor and Christie did not find any violation of the deferred prosecution agreement.

The company further stated that outside counsel Debevoise & Plimpton, which is conducting an investigation relating to the Plavix transaction, found no evidence to conclude that Bristol-Meyers or any of its employees acted unlawfully.

But the question of possible impropriety appears to have led Lacey, the federal monitor, to recommend -- at a Sept. 11 Bristol-Meyers board meeting that Christie and outside counsel Debevoise & Plimpton attended -- that Dolan and Willard resign. And under a deferred-prosecution agreement, the monitor's recommendation generally carries the force of an order, say securities lawyers.

The company also said, in its prepared statement, that the board meeting had nothing to do with the ongoing Justice Department antitrust investigation.

Stock analysts had been clamoring for Dolan's ouster due to product-related missteps and the channel-stuffing investigation. Wall Street reacted favorably to the moves. Bristol-Myers shares were at $24.20 near the close of trading, up 85 cents for the day.

Mary Jo White of Debevoise & Plimpton and Kenneth Conboy of Latham & Watkins, each of New York City, are currently advising the Bristol-Myers board. White, the former U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, also advised the company on its deferred-prosecution agreement with the government. Conboy is a former federal judge in Manhattan.

Board Chairman James Robinson III will head a committee to search for a new CEO. Dolan has agreed to assist in the transition to the new leadership.

Willard worked in the Department of Justice from 1981 to 1988, at one time serving as assistant attorney general in charge of the civil division.

As part of the deferred-prosecution agreement, Bristol-Myers agreed to pay $300 million into a shareholders compensation fund, in addition to $539 million it had already paid out to settle shareholder lawsuits filed in district court and elsewhere.

The company also agreed to endow a chair at Seton Hall University School of Law in Newark, N.J., focused on business ethics and corporate governance.

DFW Airport Enlists Help In Wright Amendment Fight (AP)

By David Koenig, AP Business Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

GRAPEVINE, Texas — Supporters of legislation to shrink Dallas Love Field and bar long flights there for eight more years have enlisted help in countering the charge that their proposal violates antitrust laws.

Four experts in antitrust law, including two former Federal Trade Commission members, wrote to congressional leaders last week to say the restrictions are part of a necessary compromise to end a decades-long fight over Love Field.

The proposed legislation, they said, "will be far better for airline competition and consumers than the regime that prevails today — and that will continue to prevail if the legislation does not pass."

The letter was released Tuesday by officials of Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport. It was signed by former FTC members Thomas B. Leary and Christine Varney, and two other private antitrust lawyers, Harry M. Reasoner of Vinson & Elkins LLP and Janet L. McDavid of Hogan & Hartson LLP.

Reasoner's law firm works for the city of Dallas and Southwest Airlines Co., and the other three work for a firm that represents Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport — all supporters of the legislation.

The letter was intended to blunt a letter written two weeks ago by nine university antitrust experts, who criticized the DFW bill pending in Congress, saying it could lead to higher fares and less service for travelers.

The criticism by the academics followed the leak of an unsigned memo from the Justice Department's antitrust division, which said the bill would violate antitrust laws. The department, however, has not taken an official position.

The bill was introduced by Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and modeled on a deal cut by AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, DFW Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth. It would eventually repeal a 1979 law called the Wright Amendment.

Despite its powerful backers, the bill's fate is in doubt, partly because key lawmakers object to provisions designed to protect the deal from legal challenges.

Hutchison escorted Dallas Mayor Laura Miller on a lobbying tour of Capitol Hill offices Tuesday.

Critics complain that the bill would preserve restrictions on long flights at Love Field for eight more years and that Love Field would shrink from 32 gates to 20 gates, which could block other airlines from competing with incumbents American, Southwest and Continental Airlines Inc.

JetBlue Airways Corp., has said it would be interested in serving Love Field, near downtown Dallas, but not the more remote DFW Airport.

The Consumer Federation of America and Consumers Union called the DFW bill "anti-competitive and anti-consumer." The owners of six unused Love Field gates have financed studies designed to undercut the bill, claiming that continuing limits at the Dallas airport would hurt the city's economy.

Leary and Reasoner, the pro-deal lawyers, said critics of the DFW-American-Southwest bill were naive in holding out for immediate repeal of Love Field flight limits.

"It's unrealistic to compare the world under the compromise legislation with the world that would exist if the Wright Amendment were repealed outright because that repeal, as explained to me, is just not going to happen," Leary said.

Associated Press Writer Suzanne Gamboa in Washington contributed to this report.

Texans Working Overtime On Wright (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy And Robert Dodge, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON – With time quickly ticking off a short calendar, Texas lawmakers worked into the evening Tuesday to address antitrust concerns and save their effort to lift the Wright amendment.

DMN file The legislation would implement a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co.

Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, along with House members from Texas and Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, lobbied legislators across Capitol Hill throughout the day.

"We're all begging, pleading, cajoling – doing anything we can to address their concerns," Mr. Cornyn said.

The legislation to end flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field is scheduled to go before the House Judiciary Committee today. The meeting will give lawmakers on the panel a chance to amend the bill before the committee's authority runs out on Friday.

Officials from North Texas feared that the committee's chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., would try to strip provisions protecting the agreement from antitrust challenges.

"At one time, those were deal breakers," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell. "I don't know if they are now or not."

The legislation would implement a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co.

The deal would repeal the Wright law in 2014 and allow immediate one-stop flights anywhere in the U.S. through any of the nine states inside the Wright perimeter. It would also reduce the number of gates to 20 from 32 to compensate for an expected increase in noise and traffic.

The gate reduction has driven concerns about competition from key House and Senate committees.

The House Judiciary Committee planned to consider the Wright bill last week but ran out of time.

The five parties have agreed to remove the antitrust exemption and replace it with other protective language, but it's been unclear whether that would satisfy Mr. Sensenbrenner.

Lawmakers have several options if the committee does strip the antitrust protections from the legislation today. House members could try to reinstate the provisions on the House floor or let the bill die with the hope of a Senate version moving ahead.

Ms. Hutchison, Ms. Miller and other officials from North Texas pressed their case Tuesday evening with Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The message, Ms. Miller said, was that consumers would be better off under the deal.

"The reason we did this compromise was to promote competition, not to curtail competition," she said. "The sooner we can get the bill passed, the lower the airfares will be."

Ms. Miller met throughout the day with other supporters. Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who co-sponsored the legislation, said existing law requiring a competition plan for the airport would address concerns that have been raised.

The mayor did not get meetings with two key detractors of the legislation – Mr. Sensenbrenner and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

But Mr. Specter said later that he and all the parties were trying to construct language to clear the bill without further hearings.

"We want to be cooperative," he said. "We just want to be sure that it does not impact the antitrust laws."

After the meeting, Ms. Miller and lawyers representing the parties huddled with Senate staffers outside Mr. Specter's office to devise new language that would get the legislation through.

The two Texas senators planned to meet today with Mr. Leahy, whose concerns have slowed the effort on the Senate side. Both said they were hopeful that others would see the merits of the compromise.

"It is taking a very anticompetitive situation and replacing it with a much more competitive situation," Ms. Hutchison said. "It isn't what you would write if you were starting from scratch, but we're not."

As the parties continued negotiations, lawyers traded fire over the antitrust issue.

Attorneys representing the parties to the June agreement fired off a letter to key lawmakers Tuesday, saying the deal strikes a balance between competition and environmental concerns.

"The antitrust objections to the proposed legislation ... ignore practical realities, including the very real concerns of congestion and air and noise pollution," the letter said.

They were responding to an Aug. 29 letter written by nine law professors that said the deal forecloses full competition and will cost North Texas consumers more in higher airfares.

In a conference call with reporters, the attorneys who wrote the latest letter said they agreed with the law professors "in the abstract" about competition but said other issues must be considered.

"These policy choices must also take into account environmental considerations, community concerns and previous decisions and commitments," they wrote.

The authors of the new letter were described as "respected antitrust experts" by D/FW. And while they have antitrust credentials, they also have clients with an interest in seeing the deal approved by Congress.

Several of the attorneys work at Hogan & Hartson, a law firm that represents D/FW. One of them, Thomas Leary, said he offered his opinion without knowing that D/FW was a client of the firm.

Also signing the letter was Harry Reasoner, an attorney at Vinson & Elkins, which represents the city of Dallas and Southwest.

FCC Chief Appears To Aim For AT&T-BellSouth Vote In Fall (MRKTWTCH)

By Siobhan Hughes

Market Watch, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin on Tuesday appeared to suggest that he is hoping to vote over the next month or so on whether to approve AT&T Inc.'s (T) purchase of BellSouth Corp. (BLS).

Federal regulators in late April commenced a review of the transaction, which was valued at $67 billion when it was announced. The FCC generally tries to approve transactions six months after beginning its review.

"We have an informal clock of 180 days that we try to act on, and I think that 180-day clock runs sometime this fall, the end of October," said Martin after testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee. "We always have a goal of trying to act within 180 days."

The Justice Department hasn't yet approved the merger. Traditionally, the FCC waits to act until the Justice Department had completed its own review. The FCC meets in two weeks and again on Oct. 12.

Martin still faces questions about whether he will be able to count on both Republican colleagues on the five-member commission. FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell on Tuesday reiterated he may be recused from voting, given that his former employer opposes the merger. McDowell would be a crucial swing vote because the two Democrats may favor imposing conditions that don't fit in with Martin's largely hands-off approach.

"No final determination has been made," McDowell told reporters after the Senate hearing. "We'll be recused until we have to make a final" decision, McDowell said. He said he hasn't been meeting with either AT&T or BellSouth representatives regarding their merger.

AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, in March announced plans to buy BellSouth in a transaction that would give AT&T sole control of Cingular Wireless, the biggest U.S. wireless operator.

Microsoft Debates Vista Security With EU (SEAPI)

By Todd Bishop, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 13, 2006

Regulators warn of possible violations of antitrust laws

European regulators warned Tuesday that Microsoft's addition of security programs to Windows Vista may run afoul of antitrust laws and increase risks for consumers long term by endangering other companies that protect against online threats.

Microsoft called the programs important security features and said it hopes the European Commission doesn't require them to be removed from Windows Vista in Europe.

The back-and-forth comes less than a week after Microsoft said antitrust questions not yet answered by the commission could force the company to delay the European release of Windows Vista, the upcoming version of its biggest product.

"We want to launch Windows Vista in a fully lawful manner, and we want to avoid regulatory decisions that could increase security risks for European consumers," Erich Andersen, Microsoft associate general counsel said, in a statement from the company Tuesday.

Regulators want to make sure Microsoft doesn't use its dominant PC operating system to give its other programs unfair advantage over rival programs by using Windows as a distribution mechanism. Vista's built-in anti-spyware protections and Windows Security Center software are among the programs discussed in letters between Microsoft and the commission.

At a news briefing Tuesday in Brussels, Belgium, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd didn't identify the specific security programs that would cross the line.

He said the commission understands Microsoft's desire to improve the underlying security of Windows. Microsoft has been trying to reduce the programming bugs that have made the operating system vulnerable.

But Todd said Microsoft could hurt the existing market for PC security software by offering its own security products free inside Vista. A variety of companies sell anti-spyware, Internet firewalls and other programs to protect PCs from online threats.

"If Microsoft were to foreclose these markets by bundling its own security products into its own operating system, less diversity and innovation would ultimately harm consumers through reduced choice and higher security risks," he said in a webcast of the briefing.

Microsoft has included anti-spyware programs in Windows Vista but is selling anti-virus protection separately, as part of its Windows Live OneCare service.

Windows Security Center is the central program in Vista for monitoring the status of protections, such as firewall and anti-virus programs. Microsoft says it made changes in the program, in response to questions from the commission, to make sure it's neutral in the way it presents and works with security software from Microsoft and others.

Another potential antitrust sticking point is Microsoft's inclusion of its data-protecting BitLocker drive encryption technologies in two high-end Windows versions, known as Enterprise and Ultimate. That may complicate matters for existing vendors of encryption technologies.

But the fact that BitLocker isn't included in Windows Vista Business Edition could strengthen Microsoft's argument on that point, by leaving more of the market for other encryption technologies, said industry analyst Roger Kay, president of Endpoint Technologies Associates.

In most cases, the company appears to have "gone at least far enough and maybe bent over backward" to address the commission's concerns, Kay said.

But Microsoft's inclusion of new security capabilities in Windows Vista could put smaller security software companies out of business or force them to make adjustments, said Joe Wilcox, a Jupiter Research analyst.

"If you look at Microsoft's entrance into other markets, it's like an atom bomb going off," Wilcox said. "There are few companies that survive the fallout."

Security software company Symantec Corp., the company behind the Norton brand, has answered questions raised by the European Commission but hasn't lodged any complaints over Microsoft's inclusion of its own security programs in Windows Vista, said Chris Paden, a Symantec spokesman.

"We're not worried about it from an anti-competitive point of view right now, because we know we can outinnovate them, and we know we can outexecute them," Paden said of Microsoft.

Commission spokesman Todd reiterated Tuesday that the agency is willing to give Microsoft antitrust guidance. But he added that "it is not up to the commission to tell Microsoft definitively the precise form that Vista should take before it's put on the market in Europe."

Security is just one of the potential antitrust trouble spots in Windows Vista that Microsoft and the European Commission have been discussing. Microsoft says it wants to resolve the open antitrust questions prior to Windows Vista's release, scheduled for November for businesses and January for consumers.

Lawsuit Against Microsoft Set For Court (AP-YBIZ)

Iowa Buyers of Microsoft Products Alerted to Class-Action Rights

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- One of the last remaining consumer class-action antitrust lawsuits filed against Microsoft Corp. in a state court is set to go to trial in November, and the company's co-founder and chairman is on the witness list to testify.

That doesn't mean Bill Gates will end up in the witness chair in Polk County District Court defending his company's business plan, but it's a possibility.

The lawsuit against Microsoft has made its way to the Iowa Supreme Court three times and unlike those in most states, which have been either settled or dismissed, it is scheduled for trial on Nov. 13.

Attorneys expect the trial to last six months.

Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin said Tuesday her experts have estimated that individuals and businesses have been overcharged as much as $453 million for Microsoft products in the last 12 years because a lack of competition has inflated the cost of the company's products.

In Iowa, about 5.1 million licenses for Microsoft Windows have been issued, 1.8 million for Office, 446,373 for Word and about 21,349 for Excel.

The average consumer overcharge ranges from $10.50 for buyers of Word to $56.99 to those who purchased Excel, Conlin said.

Many customers may have purchased more than one version in 12 years, Conlin said, so they could be eligible for multiples of those amounts.

Conlin said class members include all those who bought the following in Iowa from May 18, 1994, through June 30, 2006: Microsoft Windows, MS-DOS, Word, Excel, or Office software, or a personal computer on which this software was already installed.

"Class members do not have to do anything to be included in the class and there is no cost to be a member of the class," Conlin said.

Customers in Microsoft's database have been notified by mail or e-mail that they are part of the class-action case, Conlin said.

Microsoft denies that consumers were injured and said that computer users have benefited from the company's efforts to improve its products.

"The merits of the case will be determined in a lengthy trial that will begin in November," Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said Tuesday. "We're looking forward to being in Iowa and having the opportunity to address these claims and defend our business model of selling high quality software at fair and reasonable prices."

One of the reasons Iowa continues to fight Microsoft in court is that Conlin has refused to accept a settlement in which Microsoft would offer vouchers for computer products.

"I don't think Iowans want coupons," she said. "I think if they were charged too much money and that's what a jury decides, then they should get their money back, not a coupon."

The case claims Microsoft violated Iowa's antitrust laws and harmed customers by illegally overcharging for its software, by denying class members free choice in software products and the benefits of software innovation, and by making computers increasingly susceptible to security breaches.

Microsoft initially faced 206 class-action lawsuits across the United States. The company said 108 were consolidated in a federal antitrust case and 96 remained in state courts.

Most were dismissed or settled for vouchers.

Cases in Iowa and Mississippi are among a handful that remain.

District court officials sent a court-ordered notice to known class members in Iowa by mail and e-mail, a required step in class-action cases.

Anyone in the class may chose to exclude themselves from the case but must do so by mail or e-mail by Nov. 13, Conlin said.

MAN May Target Its Rival Scania With Takover Bid (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And Stephen Power

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

German truck maker MAN AG is considering a bid for Swedish rival Scania AB, a potential move to consolidate the European market for heavy commercial vehicles and diesel engines, according to people close to the matter.

Scania, of Sodertalje, Sweden, has a market value of about $9.6 billion. It isn't clear if Scania would be receptive to any approach, these people said. A MAN spokesman didn't return calls seeking comment. A Scania spokesman couldn't be reached for comment.

Munich-based MAN has been looking for acquisition targets after restructuring its business to focus on commercial vehicles, diesel engines, turbines for the energy industry, and services such as logistics, Chief Executive Hakan Samuelsson said in a recent interview. Mr. Samuelsson, a Swede, spent 23 years at Scania before joining MAN in 2000 to turn around the German company.

Scania operates with one of the global industry's highest profit margins. The high-quality vehicles Scania produces for premium prices have made it known as the Porsche of the truck business among people in the industry.

German car maker Volkswagen AG holds about 34% of Scania, and 29% is owned by Swedish holding company Investor AB and foundations run by the Wallenberg family. VW Chief Executive Bernd Pischetsrieder is chairman of Scania's board. A VW spokesman said there has been no agreement with MAN over a sale of VW's Scania stake.

Scania's shares were suspended from trading yesterday after a report in a Swedish newspaper said MAN was about to make a takeover bid. Scania's shares leapt 9.3% to 389.50 Swedish kronor ($53.32) before the trading halt. In the first half of this year, Scania reported net income of 2.83 billion kronor ($387.4 million) on revenue of 35.22 billion kronor.

Makers of trucks used to haul heavy cargo typically see their fortunes closely follow the swings in the global economy, and many have benefited from globalization. European goods such as appliances increasingly arrive at ports from Asian manufacturers and are trucked to wholesalers and retailers across the Continent.

MAN reported a 37% increase in operating profit in 2005 to €765 million ($971.7 million) from €557 million a year earlier, with sales rising 5% to €14.7 billion.

Environmentalists, GOP At Odds Over Hunting On Calif. Island (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

A House GOP bid to continue big-game hunting in a national park on a California island is angering environmentalists and parks officials, who say preserving the nonnative deer and elk herds for hunters will further damage the delicate habitat.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) is seeking to maintain the hunting preserve as part of a defense authorization bill, arguing that disabled and paralyzed veterans should be able to hunt there. That would overturn a legal agreement, signed by the National Park Service eight years ago, to eliminate deer and elk from Santa Rosa Island by 2011.

Hunter, who came up with the idea while driving down the California coast with a group of Iraq veterans, said it could "provide wonderful outdoor activities for those American veterans who have protected our freedom." The House has adopted the language, but the Senate passed a resolution opposing it. Lawmakers must reconcile if they hope to pass the defense bill before adjourning for the election.

The dispute over Santa Rosa, part of the Channel Islands chain, reflects the obstacles to restoring native ecosystems.

Game animals that ranchers introduced to the 54,000-acre island more than a century ago, along with cattle and pigs, have consumed local plants and encroached on native animals. The deer and elk have attracted golden eagles, which in turn prey on the endangered island foxes. Parks officials are now trying to save the foxes, whose population has dwindled from several thousand to a few hundred, along with eight threatened or endangered plant species.

When federal officials bought the islands in 1986 for $29.5 million from the last private landowners, Vail & Vickers Ltd., they banished the cattle and pigs but allowed the former owners to conduct regular hunts in an effort to gradually rid Santa Rosa of the deer and elk.

As a result, Santa Rosa is mostly closed to the public more than four months a year so a few dozen hunters can shoot deer and elk. Hunters pay the Vail family up to $17,000 each.

Hunter's measure would require the interior and defense secretaries to make hunting available to paralyzed and disabled veterans and block the herds' impending extermination. Hunter's spokesman, Joe Kasper, said the congressman hopes to allow veterans "to hunt on Santa Rosa at little or no cost." There are currently about 1,100 deer and elk on Santa Rosa, said Jim Youngson, a spokesman for Vail & Vickers.

Rep. Lois Capps (D-Calif.), who represents Santa Rosa, called the proposal "outrageous."

"This is not about veterans," she said. "It's about letting a private enterprise continue on a national park at a cost to the taxpayers."

In a recent letter to Capps, Hunter wrote that "hikers, bikers and others can enjoy their activities while disabled veterans hunt." But Capps said the provision amounts to "kicking the public out of public land."

House and Senate negotiators are set to begin negotiations over the defense bill this week.

Paralyzed Veterans of America also opposes the measure. In late July, its chief lobbyist, Douglas K. Vollmer, wrote to Congress highlighting several obstacles to Hunter's proposal, including the cost of hunting and the logistics of getting to and from the island.

"While PVA applauds the efforts of Chairman Duncan Hunter to open hunting and outdoor venues for our members, other disabled veterans and current service members," Vollmer wrote, "we have come to the conclusion that the Santa Rosa Island initiative is not viable."

National Park Service Deputy Director Stephen P. Martin testified before the Senate in May that the deer and elk must be removed for "native plants and animals to flourish on Santa Rosa Island."

"There's no question when you introduce large herbivores to a place . . . they have an array of impacts," he said in an interview. "It's really important to move forward on the course we're on."

Youngson said the former owners have not taken a position on Hunter's proposal but would like the herds to remain.

"They're not advocating for commercial hunting to continue after 2011," Youngson said. "They don't want to see the animals, and this is their word, 'slaughtered.' In the ranching families' opinion, this is their home. They don't believe they damage the environment."

FBI Agent Accused Of Hiding Relationship With Female Felon (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A former FBI agent pleaded guilty Tuesday to false-statement charges after he was accused of concealing his relationship with a Colombian illegal immigrant so she could stay in this country following a drug arrest.

The agent, Ronald LeBlanc, 45, of Dania Beach, Fla., entered the plea before U.S. District Judge Richard C. Casey in Manhattan, admitting he failed to disclose the nature of his relationship with the woman, with whom he was intimately involved.

LeBlanc was accused of making false claims, providing misleading information and concealing important facts to secure a visa for the woman, a cooperating witness.

At his plea, he also admitted making false statements regarding the substance of the information the woman provided to law enforcement.

LeBlanc faces a maximum of five years in prison when he is sentenced Dec. 20.

LeBlanc met the woman in the summer of 1999 while working on a squad investigating South American drug trafficking and money laundering organizations.

He registered her in November 1999 as a cooperating witness and acted as her supervising agent, an indictment said. The woman had pleaded guilty to a drug charge after she was arrested by FBI agents in Massachusetts in November 1998, when she and two others went to a warehouse to receive about 50 kilograms of cocaine.

The woman moved to New York in February 1999 after she was released from custody on the Massachusetts charges. She faced deportation because her cooperation was not enough to win her special consideration.

The woman moved to Miami in December 1999, and LeBlanc transferred to the Miami office in November 2000.

The indictment accused LeBlanc of trying to help the woman stay in the country by making false claims in 2001 about her cooperation in connection with Colombian nationals she knew who were suspects in three killings. One involved Donald Pagani Sr., a retired police detective who was fatally shot during an armed robbery of a meat company in the Bronx.

Federal prosecutors alleged that despite LeBlanc's claims the woman never assisted authorities with any proactive attempts to locate the fugitives in the killings before they were captured in Colombia in December 1999.

Panel Advises Cutting Salaries At Agency (AP)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

White House employees who oversee the war on drugs could be in for a huge pay cut next year.

Salaries and expenses at the Office of National Drug Control Policy would fall from $26.6 million to $11.5 million under the recommendation of the Senate Appropriations Committee. The director of the office, John Walters, earns $183,500. There are 111 full-time employees at the agency.

The committee's explanation: The reductions are designed to "more closely reflect actual performance."

The committee also called for independent studies and documents such as travel records, salaries and contracts. Its frustration is spelled out in an appropriations bill that funds transportation, housing and various federal agencies. The full Senate has yet to take up the bill, but the committee passed it in late July.

The legislation states that the committee's staff must make numerous inquiries before they can get information from the drug policy office. Plus, the office has prevented directors of various programs from meeting with the committee.

"This kind of unresponsiveness ... results in an unnecessary waste of time and energy," the bill states. "Numerous follow-up communications are required in almost every instance."

A spokeswoman for the White House office said Tuesday that it has streamlined communications to be more responsive to lawmakers.

"The good news here is the agency is accomplishing its mission. Teen drug use is down, and I think members of the Hill understand that and appreciate that," said Jennifer de Vallance, spokeswoman for the drug policy office. "Based on conversations our legislative affairs staff has had with staff members on the Hill, we're confident that the funds are going to be restored."

A spokesman for Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., who chairs the subcommittee with oversight over the drug office, did not indicate everything is now OK.

"Unfortunately, this has been a long-term problem," said spokesman Rob Ostrander. "The agency has a record of being unresponsive to committee staff. We hope that changes, because at the end of the day we need to ensure taxpayers' money is being spent wisely."

In recent months, disagreement between the administration and several lawmakers has flared concerning the High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Program, which gives additional money to communities with chronic illicit drug sales. That could be contributing to lawmakers' frustration with the agency.

The administration wants the $225 million program transferred to the Department of Justice. Many lawmakers oppose the transfer for fear the program would become less of a priority.

The committee recommended an increase in funding to $227 million. President Bush recommended a cut to $208 million: "This program is an important function of ONDCP and should not be transferred," appropriators said.

Besides cutting salaries, lawmakers said they would request funding for a study by the National Academy of Public Administration. They also ordered a Government Accountability Office study on the distribution of grants. Plus, they directed Walters to provide quarterly updates on travel expenditures, staffing levels and plans for future hirings.

Last week, Walters and other federal officials announced a drop in drug use among young teens in 2005, the third consecutive drop for that age group. "Twelve to 17 year olds are signaling a positive change in behavior that is strong, broad, continuing and affecting both males and females," he said at the National Press Club.

Lawmakers outside the appropriations committee have also complained about the agency's responsiveness. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., took to the Senate floor last week and singled out Walters for criticism: "Under him, the office operates like an ivory tower rather than the command center for our national drug control policy," Biden said.

Federal Inmate Accused Of Directing L.A. Drug Sales (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo And Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

Inmate controlled sales in L.A. neighborhoods using hidden messages, U.S. prosecutors say.

Sending hidden messages in letters from his cell at Colorado's "Supermax" prison, a kingpin of the 18th Street gang controlled an elaborate drug operation on the streets west of downtown Los Angeles, federal prosecutors charged Tuesday.

The indictment of 18 members of the gang capped a four-year investigation by a task force of Los Angeles Police Department detectives and FBI agents that used wiretaps, undercover surveillance and inside sources.

They say its members directed the drug trade in some of the city's most crime-troubled neighborhoods, including the Westlake district, Pico-Union and part of Koreatown.

Authorities said they were surprised by the sophisticated hierarchy that they discovered when infiltrating the gang. They described it as being more akin to the Cosa Nostra than a traditional Latino street gang.

"This is very businesslike," Assistant U.S. Atty. Bruce Riordan said. "The discipline evolved over the years."

At the top of the chain of command: Ruben "Nite Owl" Castro, 46, a leader of the Mexican Mafia prison gang who authorities said controlled the two cliques of the 18th Street gang targeted in the indictment, the Shatto Park Locos and the Hoover Locos.

Castro allegedly ran the enterprise from the Administrative Maximum facility in Florence, Colo., where he is serving a life term after being convicted on similar gang racketeering charges in 1997.

With the highest level of security in the nation, the Supermax houses Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski, shoe-bomber Richard Reid and 9/11 plotter Zacarias Moussaoui.

Under constant surveillance, Castro had to use cryptic phone conversations and hidden messages to get his directives to his deputies on the streets, who are described in court papers as "shot callers."

At least two letters seized by the FBI were scrawled in thick pencil marks, which when erased revealed tiny messages written with a fine-point pen.

"We have a couple letters with significant messages to the shot callers on how to direct things," Riordan said.

Castro mostly relayed his messages through his girlfriend, Jesusita Ramirez, 62, who served as an intermediary between him and the street lieutenants, prosecutors said.

Letters from prisoners are supposed to be screened by prison officials. But Castro's hidden messages apparently were able to get out of the prison undetected, officials said.

From the same prison, members of the Aryan Nation gang were able to send orders for killings and other crimes using a complicated system of secret codes, according to testimony at a trial in Orange County earlier this year.

Running Castro's day-to-day operation outside the prison were the shot callers who collected regular "rent" from drug wholesalers and street peddlers, prosecutors allege.

One wholesaler allegedly said that he paid defendant Mervin Nelson Sanchez $1,500 a week to supply dealers in one area.

"Untimely payment of rent to Ruben Castro Organization by a narcotics dealer often resulted in increased rent," according to the indictment, followed by "threatened and actual acts of violence."

Shot callers decided whether the wholesalers and retailers were bringing in enough cash, Riordan said. They told the dealers which wholesalers they had to buy from, and how much per day they had to buy.

When unauthorized dealers moved in, the shot callers gathered weapons to get rid of them, the indictment alleges.

The shot callers didn't have free reign, though, he said; they answered to Castro's girlfriend, Ramirez, who is wanted but still at large.

On one occasion in 2004, according to court documents, she told a shot caller that Castro was angry because drug sales in one neighborhood were down. Castro, she said, believed that the reason was because the shot caller's assistant lived too far from the area, according to court documents.

Much of the estimated half-million dollars a year in proceeds was transferred straight to her, the indictment says, and a small amount went to Castro in prison. Another portion allegedly went to the Mexican Mafia to pay for protection for members of the two 18th Street gang cliques in prison.

Local and federal authorities have been trying for decades to bring down the 18th Street gang, which has about 8,000 members in Los Angeles County alone.

In 2000, federal prosecutors indicted 26 members of the 18th Street clique known as the Columbia Li'l Cycos, which also charged dealers the right to operate.

The group generated hundreds of thousands of dollars in profits, which it plowed into homes in Burbank and El Monte, a restaurant in South Gate and an auto business in Los Angeles. The case resulted in 26 convictions, Riordan said.

The Los Angeles city attorney's office has obtained three different injunctions against the gang's various cliques. Castro was arrested in 1997 along with other gang leaders in what officials said then was an effort to "cut off the head" of the gang.

But the 18th Street gang has seemed to bounce back each time, often with new recruits.

Based on experience, Riordan said, he expects the latest indictment to put the gang out of action for three years in those neighborhoods. But, he said, other members might eventually fight for control of the area.

In addition to Castro, 10 members and associates of the 18th Street gang were indicted on federal racketeering and conspiracy charges of using threats and violence to control the drug trade.

Both the 18th Street gang and its rival, the Mara Salvatrucha, were born among Central American immigrants in the troubled blocks of apartments west of downtown, and have since grown to tens of thousands of members here, in Central America and, increasingly, across the United States and Mexico.

The U.S. Southern Command, based in Miami, has said the gangs pose one of the biggest threats to security in Central America, and authorities are concerned that the acts of extreme violence seen there — beheadings, tortures, a massacre of 28 people on a bus in Honduras — could begin here.

Though the two gangs mostly are disorganized — with no known leadership — there are signs that they are evolving into something more organized. "In El Salvador, eight different cliques got together and performed a kidnapping extortion recently," the FBI's Robert B. Loosle said.

The indictment is the first time that federal authorities have alleged a conspiracy between two cliques.

Riordan said this type of organization and professionalism generally starts in Los Angeles and spreads.

"We are the cradle," he said.

Alleged Mobster Pulls $1M Bail In Weed Bust (NYDN)

By John Marzulli

New York Daily News, September 13, 2006

A reputed Bonanno crime soldier charged by the feds with supervising a marijuana distribution ring in Queens was ordered held yesterday on $1 million bail.

Bari Mascitti was busted outside a warehouse at 14-33 Astoria Blvd. where Drug Enforcement Administration agents later executed a search warrant and found 120 pounds of marijuana stashed in the building and in a nearby vehicle.

Also seized in the raid were scales, boxes, gloves and an air purifier.

"We believe a lot more [marijuana] was in play here," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Ramos at a detention hearing for Mascitti in Brooklyn Federal Court yesterday.

Mascitti, 60, was carrying a key chain with a key to the warehouse when he was arrested on Sept. 5, Ramos added.

Although he's not charged with racketeering or membership in the crime family in the criminal complaint, Mascitti "is an active member," according to prosecutors. They said that he was recently observed driving to a casino in Atlantic City with reputed Bonanno soldier Paul Spina, according to court papers.

Mascitti, who is unemployed, was unaware he was under surveillance on Sept. 1 when DEA agents watched him and codefendant Michael Santoro shop at a Staples office supply store for airtight plastic storage bins to keep their marijuana fresh and potent, according to court papers.

Santoro, and co-defendants Craig Buffa, Jason Caccavo and Francisco Quintero were released on bail, but the feds wanted Mascitti held out of fear he might flee or attempt to threaten witnesses.

Magistrate Roanne Mann said she was concerned that Mascitti had violated the terms of supervised release in previous criminal cases, even though his elderly mother had posted her home for bail.

The judge approved a $1 million bond and house arrest, but insisted that Mascitti's three children co-sign the bond.

"If he violates a single condition of release, it will have serious financial consequences, and I want it to hurt significantly," Mann warned defense lawyer Richard Rehbock.

Mascitti faces five years if convicted.

Man Gets 12-year Sentence On Drug Charges (PAPN)

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), September 13, 2006

A Harrisburg man was sentenced to 12 years in federal prison on charges of distributing and possessing crack cocaine and nearly 2 kilograms of cocaine, Thomas A. Marino, U.S. Attorney for the Middle District, said Monday.

Percy Harris, 34, was under investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration since 1998. A search of his home found digital scales, a false-bottom can, $30,000 in cash, about 4 ounces of crack cocaine and the cocaine, Marino said.

Harris also must serve a 3-year term of supervised release. The case was prosecuted by assistant U.S. Attorney Christy H. Fawcett.

Mexican Meth Trade Fills Supply Gap As Local Labs Fade (DMR)

By Jane Norman

Des Moines Register, September 13, 2006

Washington, D.C. - Mom-and-pop meth labs are vanishing from the landscape, but there's been no reduction in the supply of the highly addictive illegal drug that's plagued Iowa, law enforcement experts said at a congressional hearing today.

Law officials told members of the Senate Finance Committee that 80 percent of meth now is manufactured in "super labs" in Mexico and smuggled over the border. Such labs can produce 10 pounds or more of meth in a day.

Large amounts of cash are funneled back to Mexico, through money laundering or in bulk via small banks or casinos. Estimates are that $3.2 billion to $7.2 billion in drug profits wind up in Mexico and Colombia annually.

"In my humble opinion, this is a weapon of mass destruction introduced by Mexican criminal organizations into this country," said Gregory Passic, director of the office of drug interdiction for customs and border protection at the Department of Homeland Security.

A June survey by the National Association of Counties found that meth was considered the No. 1 illegal drug problem for half of counties and it is rapidly moving east from the rural west and Midwest.

Sean McCullough, special agent in charge of the Iowa Division of Narcotics Enforcement, said that tough laws cracking down on meth ingredients approved by Iowa lawmakers have produced a 72 percent reduction in the number of local meth labs.

But McCullough said that even though meth seizures have declined, "Mexican drug trafficking organizations continue to dominate the state's illicit drug trade."

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Ia., the chairman of the committee, said constituents in his town meetings in Iowa often link the arrival of illegal immigrants in the state to the spreading use of meth.

Joseph Rannazzisi, deputy assistant administrator of the Office of Diversion Control at the Drug Enforcement Administration, said that wherever there is a transient population and migrant workers, it's possible for traffickers to blend more easily into the community.

However, he said both legal and illegal immigrants are used as drug couriers.

Grassley Says Meth Remains A Problem (RADIW)

By Matt Kelley

Radio Iowa, September 13, 2006

One of Iowa's chief anti-drug agents is testifying this morning (Tuesday) before a Congressional panel about the widening methamphetamine problem. Sean McCullough, Special Agent in Charge of the Iowa Division of Narcotics Enforcement, is appearing before the Senate Finance Committee.

Iowa Senator Chuck Grassley chairs that panel and says despite diligent efforts to thwart meth producers, the drug is still finding its way into the U.S. and Iowa. Grassley says "This summer, a survey taken by the National Association of Counties revealed that meth is considered the number-one illegal drug problem for nearly half of all the counties across America. In Iowa, 79 of our 99 counties said that meth is the number-one problem."

Grassley says while many "mom and pop" meth making operations have been shut down in Iowa, the drug is still arriving here via a drug pipeline from Mexico. Grassley says the purpose of the hearing is to gather testimony about the "changing geography of meth use and production." They'll look at how meth ingredients and drug money are moved, along with the extent and effectiveness of various law agencies on the federal, state and local level.

Grassley says Iowa led the way with its restrictions on meth precursors, forcing drug stores to take more precautions with cold and allergy medications containing pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient in meth. Numerous other states followed Iowa's example, as did the federal government, but Grassley says the benefits were temporary.

Grassley says "Now, of course, filling that void, sophisticated international cartels have come in, dominating meth trafficking." The Washington D.C. hearing was supposed to begin at nine A.M. Central time.

Officials Ask Congress For Meth Help (BILLGAZ)

By Noelle Straub

Billings Gazette, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress must provide more funding and encourage better cooperation between law enforcement agencies to combat the methamphetamine problem in Montana, an officer and a tribal leader from the state testified at a Senate hearing Tuesday.

"We are working with decreased funding, limited resources, a growing epidemic and vicious drug-related crimes," said Lt. Dan Springer, commander of the Missouri River Drug Task Force, which is based in Bozeman.

"Methamphetamine hit our area like a freight train, and we have seen nothing but a steady increase in the supply and the demand over the past 10 years," he said.

Springer and Crow Tribal Chairman Carl Venne testified at a hearing of the Senate Finance Committee, on which Montana Sen. Max Baucus is the top-ranking Democrat.

Asked by Baucus what he needed to do a better job, Springer said, "Bodies. The only way work gets done is by people beating the street. And that takes money."

Funds from the federal Byrne Memorial Grant primarily have provided the money for the task force, but that funding has decreased by 62 percent over the past five years, he said. Even getting a third of that back would help add an investigator or two, he said.

That decrease means that the task force, which has nine full-time investigators and covers an area of 17,000 square miles, has been "just maintaining rather than conducting proactive, hard-hitting investigations," he said.

Springer asked for a more stable form of funding that does not keep agencies wondering each year how much money they will receive.

The price of meth in Montana is twice the price of cocaine, prompting an increase in robberies, assaults and other violent crimes by addicts, he said.

Springer also noted that there is no DEA agent within 160 miles of the task force, so that the group must work with those in Billings to take a case to the federal level. Criminals are much more likely to cooperate if they face federal charges, he said.

Venne testified that his reservation is the size of Rhode Island and some nights has only one officer on patrol.

"Meth use on our reservation is at epidemic stages," he said. "Not only on my reservation but all the reservations in Montana."

Venne, who also serves as an advisory council member of the Montana Meth Project, said the three different jurisdictions involved on the reservation - the local Bureau of Indian Affairs, FBI and the county - are not cooperating to battle meth.

"None of them are working together to fight this problem," he said.

"Why don't we fight this together with our resources? ... We need to work together by building bridges and not burning them between communities and between races."

Venne said the agencies should work out memorandums of agreement to be able to cooperate across boundaries.

The BIA, which handles all law enforcement on the reservation, has 14 officers and two investigators, "probably half of what they need," Venne said.

Baucus said that "mom and pop" meth production has decreased since a Montana law required that some drugs, like pseudoephedrine, be kept behind the counter at pharmacies. But he said that production of meth in Mexico has picked up.

"We've got to break the meth supply chain," Baucus said.

U.N. Official Targets Afghan Opium (AP)

By Constant Brand

AP, September 13, 2006

The United Nations urged NATO forces Tuesday to take military action to destroy the opium industry in southern Afghanistan, saying cultivation of the crop is out of control in the embattled Asian country.

U.N. anti-drug chief Antonio Maria Costa said opium production was being used to fund terrorist groups, and that eradicating it was crucial to establishing order in the south.

"In the turbulent southern region, counterinsurgency and counter-narcotics efforts must reinforce each other so as to stop the vicious circle of drugs funding terrorists and terrorists protecting drug traffickers," Costa said.

He urged NATO countries to give the alliance the mandate and added resources to expand its mission in southern Afghanistan and take action against production of the crop used to make heroin.

"I call on NATO forces to destroy the heroin labs, disband the open opium bazaars, attack the opium convoys and bring to justice the big traders," he said.

Last week, NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said it was not planning to play a leading role in the fight against narcotics in Afghanistan, but the alliance has suggested its troops could play a backup role if they had the time and resources to support Afghan forces and police in eradication of the crops.

Costa said his office had met with NATO to discuss the problem, and he met Tuesday with European Union External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner.

"Its clear the mission of NATO in Afghanistan has evolved into a full-fledged attempt to eradicate Taliban," he said, adding that NATO would find it "very difficult" to defeat Taliban and insurgents in the south unless they cracked down on drug traffickers.

The U.N.'s Office on Drugs and Crime released its annual survey of Afghanistan's poppy crop in Kabul earlier this month, which said opium cultivation rose 59 percent this year to produce a record 6,100 tons of opium — a massive 92 percent of total world supply.

The U.N. agency said only six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces are opium-free. It said some 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the total Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit more than $3 billion.

"The goal should be to double the number of opium-free provinces next year, and double them again in 2008. That is ambitious, but achievable," Costa said.

He called for increased development aid from international donors such as the European Union to get farmers off their dependency on growing opium. Costa said the aid should be made conditional on commitments by regional political leaders to fight opium cultivation and to curb corruption.

Costa also said the Afghan government should step up policing to bring to justice drug traffickers, seizing their assets such as houses and land. He said Afghan authorities also had to do more to stem the import of chemicals needed to make heroin, and to deter "the flow of volunteers, arms and money for the insurgency."

Costa said legalizing Afghanistan's opium trade was not a solution either. He said the market for opium-made morphine was not lucrative enough, adding that the price of illicit opium was five times that of medical opium.

"There is no magic formula to save Afghanistan," Costa said. "Instead we need to insist on full implementation of the Afghan national drug control strategy, which is based on development, security, law enforcement and good governance."

The EU acknowledged in June that its program to fight the narcotics trade in Afghanistan has not worked. The EU has pumped several hundred million dollars into fighting drugs in Afghanistan.

Ferrero-Waldner said the EU would continue to offer alternative crops for farmers to grow.

Afghanistan's counternarcotics minister, Habibullah Qaderi, said the government suggested farmers be offered big cash crops, such as dates or saffron, which bring them better income than wheat. He also called for international donors to step up efforts to build infrastructure to ensure better transport for farmed goods to market.

Opium production in Afghanistan — centered mainly in the two southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, where NATO troops are meeting stiff resistance from Taliban and other insurgents — has boomed since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Last year, more than 4,500 tons of opium were harvested, about 90 percent of the world supply.

Afghanistan Will `Haunt' World If Taliban Flourish, Rice Says (BLOOM)

By Ed Johnson

Bloomberg, September 13, 2006

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- Afghanistan will ``come back to haunt us'' unless it becomes a stable democracy, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization appealed for reinforcements to fight the Taliban.

The international community will pay if it allows the country to become a failed state where Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda network operates unhindered, Rice said in a speech yesterday, according to the U.S. State Department.

Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters have stepped up attacks in recent weeks as Afghan and international forces try to bring stability to the country's southern provinces. Resistance is stiffer than expected and NATO commanders will hold a conference today to seek about 2,000 extra personnel to reinforce the alliance's existing 19,000 soldiers.

``I am calling for alliance solidarity as some members are carrying more of a burden than others,'' NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said yesterday in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

``The military advice is that we need extra forces,'' he said. ``These are political decisions and it is up to the politicians in the capitals to do what they promised to do.''

Foreign ministers from the alliance's 26 member nations will meet in New York next week to discuss NATO's operation in Afghanistan, de Hoop Scheffer added.

Guerrilla War

NATO took over operations in Afghanistan's six southern provinces from the U.S.-led military coalition on July 31 and is trying to bring stability and aid reconstruction.

Rebels loyal to the Taliban regime, which was ousted by a U.S.-led military coalition in 2001, are waging a guerrilla war against the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, the U.S.-led coalition and Afghan forces.

ISAF says it has killed more than 500 Taliban rebels since it began an offensive in southern Kandahar province, codenamed ``Operation Medusa,'' on Sept. 2. Five Canadian soldiers and a member of the U.S. military embedded with Afghan forces have been killed in 11 days of fighting.

NATO's offensive against the Taliban is critical and the most ``challenging mission'' in its history, Rice said during a visit to Canada yesterday.

``It was the Taliban and their support for al-Qaeda that allowed al-Qaeda to flourish, to become the organization that it did, to plot and to plan and then to launch the attacks of September 11th,'' she said. ``An Afghanistan that does not complete its democratic evolution and become a stable terrorist- fighting state is going to come back to haunt us.''

Biggest Threat

The Taliban have overtaken al-Qaeda as the region's biggest threat, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said in an address to the European Parliament's foreign affairs committee yesterday.

``We have to check Talibanization,'' said Musharraf, who has deployed almost 90,000 soldiers on his country's border with Afghanistan to tackle insurgents.

Thirty-seven countries have contributed troops to the ISAF mission. Canada has deployed about 2,000 soldiers, most of them based in Kandahar. The U.K. has 4,900 soldiers in the country, 3,600 of them deployed in the south, mainly in Helmand and Kandahar, and will deploy an extra 900 soldiers later this year, the Defense Ministry said.

Only Latvia has answered NATO's call for reinforcements, offering to increase its presence in Afghanistan from 36 to 56 soldiers, the London-based Times newspaper reported yesterday, citing unidentified military officials in the Afghan capital, Kabul, and unidentified NATO officials.

Bumper Crop

Taliban operations in southern Afghanistan are being funded by money generated from a bumper crop of opium in the region, NATO and UN officials said.

A record 165,000 hectares (407,700 acres) of land were under opium cultivation in Afghanistan in 2006, a 59 percent gain over 2005, the UN Office on Drugs and Crime said earlier this month. In the southern province of Helmand, cultivation rose 162 percent.

NATO forces must ``destroy the heroin labs, disband the open opium bazaars, attack the opium convoys and bring to justice the big traders'' Antonio Maria Costa, the head of UNODC said at a news conference in Brussels yesterday, according to the UN.

The counter-insurgency and counter-narcotics efforts must reinforce each other ``so as to stop the vicious circle of drugs funding terrorists and terrorists protecting drug traffickers,'' Costa said.

De Hoop Scheffer rejected Costa's appeal. ``NATO does not have a leading role and does not seek to play one in that fight, important though it is," Agence France-Presse cited him as saying yesterday in Brussels.

Narcotics are going to be ``an albatross around our necks and the Achilles heel in the recovery of Afghanistan" unless the problem is tackled, U.S. Marine General James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander in Europe, said Sept. 7.

U.N. Pushes NATO To Curb Afghan Drug Trade (UPI)

United Press International, September 13, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 12 (UPI) -- The head of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime is asking NATO to address surges in opium production in the southern regions of Afghanistan.

"I call on NATO forces to destroy the heroin labs, disband the open opium bazaars, attack the opium convoys and bring to justice the big traders," he said Tuesday at a news conference in Brussels. "I invite the coalition to give NATO the mandate and resources required."

Costa cited the 2006 UNODC Annual Opium Survey, released last week, reporting 407,700 acres of opium were under cultivation in Afghanistan, an increase of 59 percent from 2005. A record of about 6,725 tons, up 49 percent from last year, was harvested.

Most of the opium cultivated in Afghanistan is in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, the U.N. agency said. Of the country's 34 provinces, only six do not produce opium.

The survey also said the number of Afghans involved in the opium industry has increased by almost a third to 2.9 million, 12.6 percent of the total population.

Costa said such mass production of opium can lead to an increase of heroin overdoses.

"Experience shows that massive over-supply of heroin does not lead to lower prices but to higher-purity heroin doses," he said. "I fear that in 2007, once the new crop has reached retail markets, Afghan opium will kill more than the 100,000 people" who recently died.

In addition to an aggressive strategy from NATO, Costa requested increased aid to Afghanistan along with the help of district and provincial leaders in the commitment to curb the growing industry.

ATF Brought In To Assist In Tire Fire Investigation (SANDC)

San Diego Channel, News 10, September 13, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Federal fire scene detectives joined Tuesday in local investigations into a blaze that raged through an East Village tire shop over the weekend, causing an estimated $3.5 million in damages.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will aid the San Diego Fire-Rescue Department in determining the cause of the conflagration in the 1000 block of Broadway, ATF information officer Susan Raichel said.

Sunday night's blaze at Tire Express forced the evacuation of about 200 people from neighboring Sara Frances Hometel, SDFRD officials said.

It took several dozen firefighters more than three hours to extinguish the main body of the inferno, which caused no serious injuries but left several people suffering from smoke inhalation.

The investigative assistance of the ATF's National Response Team will bring additional expertise and state-of-the-art equipment to the probe, Raichel said.

Four regional components, organized geographically to cover the United States, comprise the squad, which can respond within 24 hours to assist state and local law enforcement or fire service personnel in investigations.

A fleet of response vehicles located throughout the United States provides logistical support, Raichel said.

Man Charged With Bank Fraud, Impersonating Federal Marshal (AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) A Salt Lake City man who ran a business called U.S. Marshalls Salvage has been charged with impersonation of a U.S. marshal and bank fraud, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Andrew A. Costa, 41, has no connection to the U.S. Marshals Service. But he is accused of telling people he was a federal marshal and of handing out business cards with a five-point star similar to the U.S. marshal insignia, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Costa used the business cards and other documents containing the star insignia to create the impression he was associated with the federal agency, James Phelps, supervisory deputy of the Salt Lake City office of the Marshals Service, said in an affidavit filed with the complaint last week.

Costa is accused of carrying out the deception from about January to August and of depositing fraudulently obtained money in a credit union account. He is accused of accepting $22,000 for a truck he had repossessed, Phelps said in court documents.

Bank fraud carries a penalty of up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

He is also charged with illegal possession of marshal insignia and unlawful use of the marshal name.

Costa could not immediately be reached for comment. There is no telephone listing in his name in the Salt Lake City area.

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Says Immigrant Child Can Stay (FINDLAW/AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A 10-year-old Salvadoran boy who was apprehended while trying to cross the U.S. border on his own to find his mother can stay in America at least until next summer, an immigration judge ruled Monday.

Judge William Martin's decision means Jonathan Martinez can live with his mother in Inglewood while the family prepares an asylum claim to keep him here, lawyer Julianne Donnelly said. That case is expected to be heard in August.

Donnelly said the family will argue that Jonathan does not have anyone to take care of him in El Salvador, making him susceptible to gangs and violence.

"He would be forced to fend for himself on the streets," Donnelly said.

Jonathan's case illustrates a growing problem with the federal program known as "temporary protective status" under which his mother is staying in the United States. Officials don't know what to do with the thousands of kids from Central America who come to the country illegally to join their parents.

The program provides legal residency to illegal immigrants from El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, all countries that have suffered devastating natural disasters in recent years. The idea is that they can best serve their homelands by working here and sending money home.

But only immigrants in the United States when a program starts - for Salvadorans, after two major earthquakes in 2001 - are eligible. That means children who come later to join parents don't qualify, putting them in a sort of immigration limbo. Many end up being deported.

Jonathan's mother had left him with an aunt in 2000 to illegally immigrate to the U.S. Since 2001, she has had the temporary status.

When the aunt got sick in late 2004, Jonathan said he and a teenage cousin rode buses north for several weeks to reach the U.S. border. The two were separated, and Jonathan was nabbed in the desert trying to cross the Mexico-Arizona border. He has lived with his mother and 3-year-old half sister since then.

The family said the aunt who took care of him has since left El Salvador, his grandparents are too old to take him in and his father disappeared years ago.

"I'm happy because I get to stay," said Jonathan in a phone interview after Monday's hearing. "I didn't want to go back because I would be by myself."

Immigration Proposals (NYT)

By Rachel Swarns

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

House Republicans proposed a series of border security and immigration enforcement strategies, calling for more fencing along the Mexican border, more Border Patrol agents and counterfeit-proof Social Security cards for citizens and immigrants searching for work. The proposals are likely to form the basis for a legislative package House Republicans plan to announce this week. The initiatives are expected to pass the House this month, either attached to other legislation or as a stand-alone bill. House Democrats called the Republican effort political grandstanding in the weeks before the November midterm elections.

GOP Calls 'Elite' Out Of Touch On Immigration (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

House Republicans, returning from a month of field hearings on illegal immigration, yesterday warned of a gaping disconnect between American voters and many "elite" lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0062454

"I have never seen such a disconnect between the American people and the elite," said Rep. Peter T. King, the New York Republican who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee and held two hearings last month.

Mr. King said securing the border this year is a cornerstone to national security and the war on terrorism. He called for more Border Patrol agents, more detention facilities for captured illegals and more unmanned aerial vehicles to patrol the border.

Testimony by Mr. King and others came during a "forum" yesterday before the Republican Policy Committee at which committee chairmen who held field hearings during the August recess could report their findings to Republican leadership.

Yesterday's packed meeting was yet another rebuke of the Senate immigration reform bill that would grant citizenship rights to about 10 million illegal aliens already in the country. Republicans attacked the Senate bill for granting Social Security benefits to illegals, hampering the ability of local police to detain illegals and requiring the U.S. government to consult with Mexican officials before building a border fence.

Also, House Republican leaders said yesterday's forum would set the stage for a new slate of border-security proposals they hope to pass the House before the November elections.

The Senate, like the majority of Democrats in the House, has refused to approve border-security legislation unless it includes proposals to grant citizenship rights to illegals and create a guest-worker program.

But House Republicans said yesterday, one day after marking the five-year anniversary of the September 11 attacks, that border security is too important to the war on terror to allow it to wait until agreement can be reached on the other components.

"There is a very simple reason why we need border security," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who chairs the House intelligence committee. "We are a nation at war. We face a very dangerous enemy that is intent on attacking us again."

Rep. Harold Rogers, Kentucky Republican, said legislation approved this year has improved the situation on the border. He noted $21.2 billion in new spending for Border Patrol agents, detention beds and other "border security tools."

As a result, he said, 99 percent of aliens apprehended along the Southwest and northern borders are being detained for deportation, compared with only 34 percent a year ago. Also, agents rounded up 66,000 aliens along the Southwest border in July, 34,000 fewer than in July 2005.

"What you are doing is working and that's having an effect," Mr. Rogers said.

Still, said Rep. Adam H. Putnam, the Florida Republican who chairs the Republican Policy Committee, more needs to be done.

"Our pressing border-security issues before us, however, cannot be delayed," he told his committee yesterday.

House GOP Seeks Tough Border Security (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 12, 2006

Congress should take tough steps to stop the flow of illegal immigrants, House Republicans agreed Tuesday, while putting off the question of whether undocumented workers already in the country should be given a path toward legal status.

A Republicans-only forum on border security confirmed the House's rejection of the Senate approach of combining enhanced border security with creation of a guest worker program and a means for illegal immigrants to move toward eventual legal status.

"The state of our borders is a security crisis," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., at the meeting of GOP leaders and committee chairmen. The American people want, he said, "immediate, targeted legislation specifically designed to secure the border, protect our homeland and vigorously enforce our immigration laws."

The purpose of the forum was to share results from some 22 hearings Republicans held in 13 states during the August recess to press the importance of the border security issue. House Republicans initiated the hearings as it became apparent that compromise with the Senate on a more comprehensive bill would be unlikely to clear Congress this year.

Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, is charged with putting together legislation in the coming weeks. It was unclear whether the final product would be a stand-alone bill — which might face strong opposition in the Senate — or be attached to a spending bill that Congress must pass this year.

But House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said at a news conference Tuesday that "we will send President Bush a series of border initiatives this year."

He said that areas that must be addressed include more border patrol agents, additional fencing along the border, stricter enforcement of immigration laws and enhanced state and local law enforcement authority.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., pushed for efforts to establish a smart, counterfeit-proof Social Security card.

DOJ_NMG_0062455

Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, spoke of a $5.5 billion Homeland Security Department contract to be awarded this fall that would "essentially prevent penetration" within the next five years through a combination of electronic surveillance, unmanned aerial surveillance and patrols.

Bush, while not specifically endorsing the Senate bill, has long advocated changes in immigration policy to create a guest worker program and set up a procedure by which the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country can work toward legal status and eventual citizenship.

Democrats dismissed the August hearings as episodes of preaching to the converted and said that, as long as there is a demand for foreign labor, the security-only approach won't work.

"They haven't even told us what they are planning to propose, which shows that this is not a serious legislative thing they are proposing," said Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., in a telephone news conference. "This is a political game."

Putnam, while responsible for putting together a border security package, represents an agricultural district in central Florida where there's interest in creating a guest worker program for farm workers.

He is scheduled to attend a rally Wednesday outside the Capitol being staged by farmers, restaurant owners and the Chamber of Commerce in favor of comprehensive immigration legislation.

"While there must be a comprehensive approach to immigration, securing our borders is the first, and most pressing, problem demanding our attention and action," he told the forum.

TAX:

How To Lower Your Tax Bill This Year There's Still Time In 2006 To Exploit Law Changes On 401(k)s, Donations And Energy Conservation (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

Even though 2007 arrives in just a few months, there's still plenty of time to consider tax-saving moves for 2006 -- especially in view of a spate of changes to the tax code.

Among the revisions effective this year are higher limits for 401(k) contributions, a new charitable-giving incentive and new breaks for energy-efficient vehicles and home improvements. These are in addition to perennial year-end techniques such as selling losing stocks. Many taxpayers can also take steps to blunt the impact of other, more onerous changes, such as the expanded "kiddie tax."

"With all the new laws, you've got many new ways to cut your taxes" and soften the blow from other new provisions, says Sidney Kess, a New York lawyer and accountant.

But year-end planning could be tricky for millions of people this year because of continued uncertainty about the fate of several popular tax breaks that expired at the end of last year. Chief among these is a provision allowing people who itemize their deductions to deduct either their state and local income taxes or sales taxes. Unless Congress revives this provision, taxpayers will be able to deduct only their state and local income taxes for 2006. The option to deduct sales taxes, instead of the income taxes, is especially important to people in states with no state income tax, such as Florida, Texas and Washington.

Many lawmakers in both parties want to restore the sales-tax provision. Even so, it's not clear when -- or even whether -- Congress will act because the subject has become ensnared in other, unrelated battles, such as those involving estate-tax cuts and raising the minimum wage.

Here is a look at several changes this year that could affect people's financial plans:

Retirement Savings: The maximum amount that workers under age 50 can contribute to their 401(k)s rose this year to $15,000, under a schedule outlined in a 2001 law. That's up from $14,000 last year. If you're 50 or older at any time this year, you can set aside a total of $20,000, up from $18,000 last year. "Put away as much as you can in your 401(k)," Mr. Kess says.

The maximum amount people under age 50 can put away in an IRA this year remains $4,000. But those 50 or older can put away $5,000, up from $4,500.

Separately, Congress this year approved eliminating the income limit to convert a traditional IRA to a Roth IRA, a change that will be effective starting in 2010. If your income is too high to make a Roth IRA contribution for 2006, "you might want to consider making a nondeductible contribution [to a regular IRA] for 2006 and future years -- looking forward to rolling the account into a Roth IRA starting in 2010," says Mark Luscombe, principal analyst at CCH, a Wolters Kluwer unit. With a Roth IRA, you can't deduct your contributions but the funds grow tax-free and withdrawals may be tax-free, depending on certain rules.

Charitable Giving: Last month, President Bush signed a law that allows taxpayers who are 70½ or older to give away as much as $100,000 a year from their IRA directly to qualified charities without triggering federal income taxes. Charities expect this change to generate billions of dollars of additional donations.

Here's how it works: In a typical case, a taxpayer can get an exclusion from gross income for otherwise taxable distributions of as much as $100,000 from an IRA -- as long as the money is paid directly to a qualified charity. This money counts toward taxpayers' required minimum distributions for that year. This new break is available only for distributions this year and in 2007.

Some people already have made plans to take advantage of this new break. David Handler, a lawyer at Kirkland & Ellis in Chicago, says a client is moving $100,000 from his IRA this year -- and will do so again next year. The money will go directly to public charities.

Separately, lawmakers changed some rules on deducting gifts of clothing and household items. For contributions made after Aug. 17 this year, you generally can't deduct the value of those items unless they're in "good" condition or better. Congress didn't try to define "good" but the Internal Revenue Service may come up with guidance.

However, there's an important exception: You can still deduct the value of an item that isn't in good condition or better if the amount claimed is more than $500 -- and if you include a qualified appraisal with your tax return.

These new rules apply to household items such as appliances, furniture and linens. They don't apply to items such as paintings and other objects of art or jewelry, which are covered under a different set of rules.

So what's a donor supposed to do? Consider taking photos of significant gifts, accountants say, and keep a detailed inventory of what you donate.

Kiddie Tax: Congress has increased the number of children whose income is subject to their parents' higher tax rate, by raising the age limit. If a child receives dividends, interest and other "unearned income," the first $850 typically is tax free and the next $850 is then taxed at the child's lower rate. Income above $1,700 is subject to the parents' top rate. Previously, the parental rate kicked in only for children under age 14, but now it affects kids under age 18.

Because of this change, upper-income investors should consider investments for their children that generate little or no current taxable income, such as U.S. savings bonds or index funds, Mr. Kess says. Consider avoiding high-yielding corporate bonds, since the interest currently would be taxable as ordinary income.

New Energy Tax Breaks: These include "credits of up to $500 lifetime for energy-efficient improvements to your home," says Mr. Luscombe of CCH. Other incentives apply to eligible solar water heaters and solar electricity equipment, and -- for many taxpayers -- the purchase of hybrid and other alternative-fuel vehicles.

Working Abroad: A new law sharply raises taxes on many Americans living and working abroad. While the impact will vary sharply from country to country, it will be especially painful for many Americans stationed in countries such as Singapore and Hong Kong that have high housing costs and low taxes. If you're affected, ask your employer for help in picking up the extra tab -- which in some cases can easily run to tens of thousands of dollars. * * *

BAUCUS URGES lawmakers to act quickly to extend expired tax breaks.

Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the Senate Finance Committee's ranking Democrat, emphasizes the importance of taking action soon to approve "the extenders," such as the sales-tax deduction.

Millions of taxpayers will be hit with higher taxes unless Congress extends this and other expired provisions. ***

MORE PEOPLE get hit with stiff penalties for delaying tactics or frivolity.

The U.S. Tax Court is authorized to impose a penalty of as much as $25,000 on someone for tactics designed mainly to delay, or for making arguments that clearly are "frivolous or groundless." Frivolity would include arguing that there is no law requiring Americans to pay income taxes, or that "wages" aren't really income, or that paying taxes somehow is voluntary, or that the 16th Amendment to the Constitution wasn't properly ratified. That amendment, enacted in 1913, authorized Congress to impose an income tax.

Although judges have been warning taxpayers for years, many people still haven't gotten the message that judges are losing patience with these and other similar claims.

In a recent case, a Tax Court judge imposed a $25,000 penalty on a California man. * * *

BRIEFS: Reminder: Friday is the deadline for third-quarter estimated tax payments. ... Service to people visiting IRS "taxpayer assistance centers" around the nation showed "improvement" during this year's filing season, says the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration (www.tigta.gov). For example, taxpayers received "fewer inaccurate answers" to tax-law questions than in the 2005 filing season.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Tells Group He Sees A 'Third Awakening' (WP)

By Peter Baker

President Bush said yesterday that he senses a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion in the United States that has coincided with the nation's struggle with international terrorists, a war that he depicted as "a confrontation between good and evil."

Bush told a group of conservative journalists that he notices more open expressions of faith among people he meets during his travels, and he suggested that might signal a broader revival similar to other religious movements in history. Bush noted that some of Abraham Lincoln's strongest supporters were religious people "who saw life in terms of good and evil" and who believed that slavery was evil. Many of his own supporters, he said, see the current conflict in similar terms.

"A lot of people in America see this as a confrontation between good and evil, including me," Bush said during a 1 1/2 -hour Oval Office conversation on cultural changes and a battle with terrorists that he sees lasting decades. "There was a stark change between the culture of the '50s and the '60s -- boom -- and I think there's change happening here," he added. "It seems to me that there's a Third Awakening."

The First Great Awakening refers to a wave of Christian fervor in the American colonies from about 1730 to 1760, while the Second Great Awakening is generally believed to have occurred from 1800 to 1830.

Some scholars and writers have debated for years whether a Third Awakening has been taking place, although some identify other awakenings in U.S. history. Bush aides, including Karl Rove, have read Robert William Fogel's "The Fourth Great Awakening and the Future of Egalitarianism."

Bush has been careful discussing the battle with terrorists in religious terms since he had to apologize for using the word "crusade" in 2001. He often stresses that the war is not against Islam but against those who corrupt it. In his comments yesterday, aides said Bush was not casting the war as a religious struggle but was describing American cultural changes in a time of war.

"He's drawing a parallel in terms of a resurgence, in dangerous times, of people going back to their religion," said one aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the session was not open to other journalists. "This is not 'God is on our side' or anything like that."

The White House did not release a transcript of Bush's remarks, but National Review posted highlights on its Web site. On another topic, Bush rejected sending more troops to the Afghanistan-Pakistan border areas to find Osama bin Laden. "One hundred thousand troops there in Pakistan is not the answer. It's someone saying 'Guess what' and then the kinetic action begins," he said, meaning an informer disclosing bin Laden's location.

House May Identify Members Who Earmark Money For Pork Projects (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Republican-led House of Representatives will vote this week on two measures that could help reveal who's behind billions of dollars in pork-barrel spending each year.

That could help Republicans appeal to fiscally conservative voters who are frustrated by Congress's runaway spending and threatening to stay home from the polls in November.

Taxpayer-watchdog groups praise the sentiment behind House Majority Leader John Boehner's decision to schedule these votes, but he's being squeezed between lawmakers who are reluctant to cede power and critics who say the legislation doesn't respond forcefully enough to a spate of congressional corruption scandals.

The first measure, approved by the Senate and slated for final House approval on Wednesday, would create a centralized, online search engine for government contracts, making it easier for the public to track who's receiving government dollars and how the money is being spent.

The second, a proposed change to House rules, would identify the lawmakers behind special-interest projects known as "earmarks."

Tens of thousands of earmarks are tucked anonymously into massive spending and tax bills each year. Citizens Against Government Waste identified 13,997 earmarks worth $27.3 billion in appropriations bills last year alone. Critics of pork-barrel politics say that attaching lawmakers' names to earmarks could curb abuses of the process, although lawmakers often trumpet the earmarks they win for projects when they think their constituents or contributors want them.

Boehner, R-Ohio, said Tuesday that the two measures are a start but don't eliminate the need for more comprehensive lobbying reform after the conviction of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., on bribery charges; the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that's touched several members of Congress; and a corruption investigation into Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., who's accused of stashing a $90,000 in cash in a freezer.

"If you look at the members who've gotten themselves in trouble, it was over the illicit use of earmarks," Boehner said. "I just think that bringing transparency and accountability to this process is in everyone's best interests."

Some campaign-finance watchdogs consider these proposals a diversion, however.

Tom Schatz, the president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said of the House plans: "It's better than nothing. It should provide a lot more transparency. Whether it means they'll be more accountable and do less remains to be seen."

Lobbying reform legislation has stalled in negotiations between the House and Senate. Critics say neither chamber has gone far enough to cut down on lawmakers' financial relationships with lobbyists.

Details of the House earmark proposal were still changing Tuesday, but there appeared to be some loopholes, especially in identifying lawmakers behind projects in tax and authorization bills, as opposed to appropriations measures.

That drew fire from members of the House Appropriations Committee, who don't want the burden of disclosure to fall disproportionately on them. "We have strong support among our members as long as it applies across the board," said committee spokesman John Scofield.

House Democrats said they wanted to offer an amendment that also would prohibit earmarks which benefit lawmakers' families or lobbyists connected to their political action committees.

It also was unclear to what degree senators would have to disclose their earmarks.

Senators aren't bound by House rules, but once legislation with their earmarks in it reaches the House, then House rules might require their identification.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who with Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., sponsored the Senate's contract search-engine legislation, said of the House's plans, "I'm willing to take half a loaf if we can get something done that's good."

Earmark Showdown (WSJ)

Like drunks checking into rehab, House Republicans will take one final stab this week at reforming the "earmark" epidemic on Capitol Hill. So far this year more than 10,000 projects -- for baseball parks, bovine genetics, bicycle paths, beaver management grants and bridges to nowhere -- have been stashed into budget bills at a cost of nearly $30 billion. That ain't peanuts.

The proposed reform would require the disclosure of the Congressional sponsor of every earmark slipped into an appropriations bill. There would then be a three-day waiting period from the time these reports are issued until the House vote. Members could no longer vote for 1,000-page spending bills while claiming they didn't know about the fiscal mischief inside.

A related Senate bill by Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) would require that the dollar amounts and recipients of all grants and earmarked contracts be listed on a public data base. Voters could then determine how much money is given away each year to some 30,000 groups, ranging from Planned Parenthood to the California Raisin Board. This is called "transparency," which ought to be the least Congress can do for taxpayers. The Members can still request the earmarks, but they'd have to defend them in the sunlight -- which means running the risk of what Republican Jeff Flake of Arizona calls the public "shame factor."

One reason to suspect that these rules would deter the worst excesses is that Appropriators in both parties are groaning. They are insisting on loopholes that would exempt grants to state and local governments and hometown universities. They're also seeking an exemption for omnibus continuing resolution bills, which in some years contain a half-trillion dollars of spending crammed into one elephantine package. Unless these escape hatches are shut, earmark reform won't mean much.

A case in point is the HHS-Education spending bill, which so far contains 1,867 earmarks at a cost of just under $500 million. Members tell us the bill has caused a mini-rebellion because two of the three largest earmarkers are Democrat Nancy Pelosi, who walks away with $7.9 million worth of goodies, and David Obey, the ranking Democrat on Appropriations who receives $6.8 million for his Wisconsin district. This is the same Ms. Pelosi who earlier this session pledged to give up her pork to help balance the budget.

The House GOP leadership finally seems to comprehend the stakes in this pre-election budget fight. Majority Leader John Boehner calls the anti-earmarking bill "must-pass legislation," and has agreed to separate it from a bottled-up lobbying-reform bill. All that can block this from passing now are the spend-happy Republicans on Appropriations. If they succeed, they will have inflicted a far greater wound on their majority than the Democrats ever could.

House, Senate Divide Stalls Ethics Bill (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 12, 2006

Unable to agree on sweeping ethics legislation, the House this week will try to pass a narrower bill to shed light on pet projects that lawmakers tuck into spending and tax bills.

The measure on "earmarks," a rules change that would apply only to the House, is a small part of comprehensive lobbying and ethics legislation that the House and Senate both passed last spring in the wake of a spate of scandals involving lawmakers and lobbyists.

But the two chambers have been unable to find common ground, and prospects for legislation that was deemed a top priority when this session of Congress convened last January are not good.

But even the scaled-back earmarks measure, which would require disclosure of special projects inserted, often furtively, into larger bills, is facing opposition.

Republicans on the Appropriations Committee, which puts together annual spending bills, have objected to being singled out for earmark reform and demand that any new rule also apply to tax and authorization bills.

Republicans on the committee held up passage of the lobbying bill last May over the same issue.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said at a news conference Tuesday that he was working with the chairmen of the involved committees and "we're going to do it this week."

He acknowledged the problems: "Everyone has a different description of what an earmark is."

"If you look at the members who got themselves in trouble, it was over the illicit use of earmarks," Boehner added.

Earlier this year former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was sentenced to more than eight years in prison after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes in return for steering government contracts to certain companies.

The House has also scheduled a Wednesday vote on a bill, approved by the Senate last week, that would create a database of government spending so that citizens and activist groups can more easily track the grants and contracts included in the federal budget.

Democrats, who say the earmarks measure is a pre-election effort by the Republicans to show they are accomplishing something to improve ethics, said just bringing openness to the use of earmarks wasn't enough.

"Earmark reform must do more than identify an earmark's sponsor," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., in a letter to his colleagues. "We need to curb the proliferation of unnecessary and suspect earmarks."

Emanuel said he would offer legislation that would prevent members from awarding earmarks that would benefit a registered lobbyist who serves as chairman of a particular member's political action committee. It would also end the practice of adding earmarks into conference reports that come out of House-Senate negotiations.

Boehner said the Appropriations Committee has already been successful in reducing earmarks, noting that requests for member projects had been reduced by 37 percent compared to last year, with spending for such projects down $7.8 billion.

The larger lobbying and ethics bills, an outgrowth of the scandal involving disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, would have limited the number of meals and gifts that members could accept from lobbyists, required greater information on the purpose of privately funded trips, slowed the movement of members leaving Congress for jobs in lobbying and mandated lobbyists to submit information on their activities more frequently.

The legislation became hung up over a provision in the House bill that would have limited donations to independent political groups known as 527s. Such groups tended to provide more financial support to Democrats in the last presidential election, and Senate Democrats made clear that they would not support any lobbying bill that contained 527 restrictions.

NIH: Scientists Escape Ethics Punishment (AP)

By Rita Beamish, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, September 13, 2006

Most of the federal scientists who improperly accepted personal money from drug or biotechnology companies walked away with reprimands or were allowed to retire unscathed.

Only two of the 44 scientists found to have violated rules governing private consulting deals are being investigated for possible criminal activity, and they remain on the government payroll, the National Institutes of Health told The Associated Press this week in the most detailed accounting it has released.

NIH spokesman John Burklow said his agency wanted eight others reviewed for possible crimes, but those cases were rejected by the investigating office at the U.S. Health and Human Services Department.

The two still outstanding - Drs. Trey Sunderland and Thomas Walsh - both committed "serious misconduct," so grave that they would be fired if they were civilians, NIH internal ethics reports contend.

NIH says it has been unable to act against the two because they are part of the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, which provides medical help during disasters.

Lawmakers plan to push for answers Wednesday at a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing, part of continuing scrutiny into how the agency polices conflicts of interest. Responding to congressional criticism, NIH last year barred federal scientists from the once-common practice of earning lucrative paychecks from private companies.

Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said he wants to know why it is taking so long to resolve the case of Sunderland, a leading Alzheimer's disease researcher whose request to leave government service has been denied for two years.

"Where's the accountability? Where's the response?" Stupak said. "This person should be dealt with severely."

He referred to allegations that Sunderland improperly transferred human tissue samples from NIH patients to the drug company Pfizer.

"These people thought they were helping other people, not some scientist profiting," he said. Sunderland, through his attorney, denies that his consulting payments from Pfizer were tied to samples he provided in his government capacity.

The Public Health Service Commissioned Corps is concerned about the allegations against Sunderland and Walsh and "will take appropriate action should wrongdoing be found," said spokeswoman Christina Pearson.

However she cited "other reviews" of Sunderland that her agency must coordinate with.

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said the case points out deeper problems at NIH.

"In spite of the public changes that have been made at NIH, there really does not appear to be a cultural change where the institution and the members of the institution condemn the kind of behavior that apparently Dr. Sunderland has exhibited. It's really, really disappointing," he said.

The subcommittee is expected to question NIH officials about documents showing it approved several taxpayer-paid trips for Sunderland to attend conferences and events in places like Hawaii and Toronto, even after recommending his firing. Things changed last month when his superiors, a day after assuring Sunderland the agency would soon negotiate his release, suddenly restricted his access and activities and assigned him to administrative duties, his lawyers said in a letter to the subcommittee.

NIH investigated 103 employees after revelations in 2004 that many had failed to report their paid relationships with drug companies. Of the 44 alleged offenders, six left NIH before they could be punished and two had offenses so minor they merited no sanction, Burklow said.

The majority received reprimands or warnings for failing to properly obtain approvals for their outside consulting work, he said. Suspensions ranging from a week to 45 days were meted out to a few who did not get prior approval or did not report their drug company ties, said Burklow.

Sunderland is under investigation by the HHS inspector general and the Justice Department, officials have said. And a government official told AP that Walsh, a prominent cancer researcher, is the other case the inspector general is reviewing. The official requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Reached at his NIH office on Monday, Walsh declined comment.

NIH ethics reports allege the two scientists had unauthorized, unreported deals with drug companies - Sunderland earning more than $600,000 over eight years for consulting and speeches and Walsh more than $100,000 in five years - and that their consulting improperly overlapped with government duties.

Lawyers for both scientists said in written defenses to NIH investigators that the two put in exceptionally long hours at their government jobs, even if the proper paperwork was missing for taking leave to perform outside work.

Documents obtained by AP show Sunderland initially got a green light to retire in November 2004 and he had his 11-year research project transferred to a New York center where he planned to accept a prominent post. But NIH officials subsequently recommended against his departure and the center now is moving on to hire someone else.

Sunderland's attorney Robert Muse cites a litany of mixed signals Sunderland received from NIH, including months of refusal to meet after stating a willingness to work out his release.

Burklow, citing privacy concerns, would not discuss any individual cases.

"The bureaucratic inaction," Muse wrote the congressional subcommittee on Monday, "has unreasonably interfered not only with Dr. Sunderland's career but also with his important Alzheimer's research," which he said cost the government millions of dollars.

Some scientists whose consultancies were negatively highlighted in 2004 congressional hearings and press accounts left NIH voluntarily. They suffered no repercussions.

Cancer researcher Lance Liotta said he retired in May 2005 with pension and benefits, accepting "a great opportunity" in research at George Mason University. His consulting activities, though questioned after the fact by Congress, were approved at the time, and he never was sanctioned.

Another former researcher, 33-year NIH veteran Michael Brownstein, had held nearly $2 million in stock with four companies whose boards he served on while he worked at NIH. The agency approved the consulting and never accused him of wrongdoing, said Brownstein, who continues his genetic research at the J. Craig Venter Institute in Rockville, Md.

Medicare Premiums Up Less Than Expected (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 12, 2006

Most elderly and disabled people on Medicare will see their premiums rise to $93.50 a month next year, a 5.6 percent increase that is much lower than had been anticipated.

Officials had been projecting that premiums would again grow at double-digit rates, but there has been an unexpected slowing in the volume of services and tests that doctors are ordering for their Medicare patients.

The news was not as good for wealthier beneficiaries. For the first time in the program's history, wealthier beneficiaries will pay more for the insurance that covers doctors' visits and outpatient hospital care, known as Medicare Part B.

The higher payments will apply to about 1.5 million beneficiaries with incomes of more than $80,000 a year. Congress approved means-testing in the 2003 law that created the Medicare drug benefit.

For individuals who earn more than $80,000, or couples who earn more than $160,000, premiums will jump to $106. That amount goes up even more for seniors with higher incomes. For the wealthiest seniors, the monthly premium would go to $162, leading some analysts to project that wealthier and often healthier seniors would begin to leave the program.

Medicare Announces A Small Hike In Premiums For 2007 (MCT)

By Tony Pugh

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - In the smallest-percentage rate increase since 2001, Medicare monthly premiums for physician care and outpatient hospital services will rise by only $5 in 2007 to $93.50, federal officials announced Tuesday.

At 5.6 percent, the increase for Supplementary Medical Insurance, better known as "Part B" coverage, fell short of the 11 percent hike that Medicare actuaries had projected and of this year's 13.2 percent increase. It's even farther removed from the record 17.4 percent spike last year.

A miscalculation of projected Part B spending is the main reason for the lower-than-expected rate increase, Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan said. Medicare actuaries forecast higher premiums based on an increase in physician claims that resulted from faster processing rather than from a spike in services provided.

The modest rate increase will allow the 38 million-plus seniors enrolled to keep more of their monthly Social Security checks, since the Medicare premiums typically are withheld from those payments.

"For the vast majority of beneficiaries, the amount of the Social Security cost-of-living increase will be substantially greater than the additional (Medicare) premium they will pay," McClellan said.

But affluent Medicare beneficiaries will pay more for their 2007 coverage because of a provision of the 2003 Medicare Modernization Act that calls for premium hikes ranging from 10 percent to 55 percent over the next three years for beneficiaries who earn at least $80,000 a year, or $160,000 for married couples.

Instead of the standard $93.50, those seniors will pay premiums of $106, $124.70, $143.40 or $162.10 per month, depending on their incomes. Roughly 4 percent, or about 1.5 million, of Medicare's recipients are subject to the higher rates.

The new rates mark the first time that Medicare has used income to set premium rates. The move was designed to help shore up Medicare's ailing finances, which are crumbling under pressure from higher health-care costs and a growing number of beneficiaries.

Under the new guidelines, seniors who earn $80,000 to $100,000 a year- and married couples with incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 - will see their premiums increase by 10 percent, or roughly 3 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. They'll pay Part B premiums of $106 in 2007.

Individuals who earn $100,000 to $150,000 - and married couples with incomes of $200,000 to $300,000 - will see their premiums increase by 25 percent, or roughly 8 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. Their 2007 Part B premiums will increase to $124.70.

Individuals earning $150,000 to $200,000 - and couples with incomes of $300,000 to $400,000 - will face increases of 40 percent, or about 13 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. That works out to a 2007 monthly premium of $143.40.

Individuals who earn $200,000 or more and couples who earn more than $400,000 face the largest increases. Their Part B premiums will jump 55 percent over the next three years, about 18 percent a year. Their monthly premiums will cost $162.10 in 2007.

The Part B premium increase is based on a formula that assumes a roughly 5 percent reduction in Medicare physician reimbursements in 2007. If Congress moves to freeze or increase those payments to doctors, as it has in recent years, the $93.50 premium wouldn't change and contingency funds would be used to make up the funding shortfalls. But money borrowed from the contingency fund would have to be replenished later, mainly through higher Part B premiums, Medicare officials said.

Medicare Premiums To Rise 5.6% For Most Seniors (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Medicare premiums will rise 5.6% next year — to $93.50 a month — and wealthy seniors for the first time will begin paying an additional amount.

Most of the about 43 million Medicare beneficiaries will pay a modest $5 a month more than the $88.50 they pay this year, the smallest increase since 2001. But about 1.5 million wealthier seniors will pay more: $106 to $162 a month depending on their income.

"These income-related premiums will reduce Medicare costs by $7.7 billion over five years and $20 billion over 10," said Medicare chief Mark McClellan on Tuesday. "They are an important step in improving Medicare's sustainability."

Affected are those who earn more than $80,000 individually, or $160,000 as a couple.

Congress approved the new income-based charges as part of the same 2003 law that created the new prescription drug benefit, but it has received little public debate until now.

While wealthier workers have always paid more in taxes to support Medicare, the new income-based premiums are seen by critics as an attack on a basic egalitarian premise of the program: That everyone pays the same and gets the same benefits.

"Medicare is not a welfare program; it's social insurance designed to pool healthy and less healthy people," says Maria Freese, director of government relations and policy for the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare. "Insurance doesn't charge rich people more than poor people."

Most Medicare members pay premiums for Part B, which covers doctor visits, lab tests and hospital outpatient services. Medicare beneficiaries pay 25% of the expected costs of those Part B services. About 7 million low-income people have their Part B premiums paid by the government.

On Tuesday, Medicare officials said the Part B monthly increase that will affect most Medicare members was nearly $5 lower than had been projected in May. The announcement comes as Congress is expected to soon debate whether to overturn next year's planned 5.1% cut in doctor payments. If such action had already occurred, premiums could have risen an additional $1.50 a month.

"Most Medicare beneficiaries will see relatively modest cost increases compared with recent health care trends," McClellan said.

But Freese and other critics of the income-based premiums took issue with McClellan's statement that the income-based premiums will help Medicare's finances. She says the additional charges will do little to bolster Medicare's finances and could drive wealthier, healthier seniors out of the program, possibly causing costs to rise faster. Critics also suggest that income levels at which additional payments are required will be gradually reduced, requiring more seniors to make the higher payments.

But Joe Antos at the American Enterprise Institute says the move was inevitable as Medicare spending rises.

"One of the things we have to do is ask people who have more money to pay more for government services," says Antos. "The difficult balance is finding the spot where we're charging higher-income people more but not so much more that they will simply drop out of the program."

Government Sets Higher Medicare Rates And New Surcharge (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The basic Medicare premium will rise next year to $93.50 a month, an increase of $5, the Bush administration announced Tuesday. It said more affluent beneficiaries would have to pay a new surcharge, from $12.50 to $68.60 a month, depending on their incomes.

The surcharge applies to 1.5 million people with annual incomes exceeding $80,000 for individuals or $160,000 for married couples filing joint tax returns.

Medicare officials said the standard premium for 2007 was lower than they had predicted. In May and again in July, they estimated that the monthly premium, now $88.50, would climb to about $98 in 2007.

The premium in question is for Part B of Medicare, a voluntary program that covers doctors' services, diagnostic tests and outpatient hospital care for 40 million people who are 65 and older or disabled. It shot up 50 percent from 2003 to 2006.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said Tuesday that Medicare spending for doctors' services, while still growing at a brisk pace, increased less than expected in the last year.

Listing factors that contributed to the new premium, Dr. McClellan reported "a modest slowdown in physician spending growth" but "very rapid growth in spending for hospital outpatient services." Many services provided in outpatient hospital clinics "could be performed less expensively and more conveniently in a physician's office," he said.

Kirsten A. Sloan, a health policy analyst at AARP, the lobby for older Americans, said: "The standard premium for Part B is less than originally projected, and that's good news. But the premium is artificially low. It assumes a continuation of current law, under which Medicare payments to doctors will be cut 5 percent next year. If Congress decides to prevent that cut, beneficiaries may have to make up the difference by paying higher premiums in 2008."

The premium is set each year to cover about 25 percent of projected spending under Part B. If Congress had eliminated the cut planned for doctors and simply frozen their Medicare fees in 2007, it would have required a further increase of roughly $1.50 in the monthly premium, Medicare officials said.

Congress established the surcharge under a little-noticed provision of the 2003 law that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare. Federal officials said the surcharge, to be phased in over the next three years, represented a major change. Until now, high-income and middle-income beneficiaries have generally paid the same premium. Medicare officials said the surcharge would raise $7.7 billion in the first five years and a total of $20.8 billion in the first 10 years.

Dr. McClellan said the surcharge would have "a very positive impact, making Medicare more sustainable in the long term." Some Medicare experts say the higher premiums will prompt some wealthy people to drop out of Medicare, leaving the program to serve poorer, sicker people. Dr. McClellan dismissed those concerns, saying Medicare would still be a bargain for high-income people.

Federal health officials estimate that 9,000 people will drop out of Part B because of the surcharge in 2007, while 30,000 will drop out in 2009, when the surcharge becomes larger.

In calculating the extra premiums for 2007, the government will generally use income data from tax returns for 2005. For a single person with income of $80,001 to $100,000, and for each member of a couple filing a joint return with combined income of $160,001 to $200,000, the surcharge will be $12.50 a month, and the total premium will be $106 a month.

The surcharge rises with income. For an individual with income greater than $200,000 and for each member of a couple with combined income exceeding $400,000, the surcharge will be $68.60 a month in 2007, and the total premium will be $162.10 a month. The surcharge will be much higher in 2008 and later years.

In announcing the new premiums, the administration appeared to send a mixed message. On the one hand, Dr. McClellan said, "Medicare beneficiaries are experiencing cost increases that are modest in comparison with recent health care cost trends." On the other hand, he said, spending in the traditional fee-for-service Medicare program is "out of control."

Medicare Premiums To Rise 5.6% In '07 (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Most seniors will have to pay 5.6 percent more for basic Medicare coverage next year, officials announced yesterday. But premiums for more affluent beneficiaries will increase by as much as 83 percent, because the federal government for the first time will require wealthier people to pay more.

The standard monthly premium for Part B, which covers doctor visits and outpatient hospital care, will rise to $93.50 from $88.50 this year, said Mark B. McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Individuals with an annual income of more than $80,000 (or more than $160,000 for married couples) will pay monthly premiums of $106 to $162.10, depending on income.

About 1.5 million of the 42 million Americans on Medicare will have to pay the higher premiums based on income, a change instituted by Congress as part of the 2003 law that created the Medicare drug benefit. McClellan said the income-based premiums will save the financially troubled program $7.7 billion over five years and more than $20 billion over a decade.

Even at the higher rates, Medicare remains a good deal, he said. The most affluent beneficiaries, those with individual incomes of more than $200,000 a year, will pay just under $2,000 a year in premiums while receiving an average of $4,300 a year in benefits.

"That still makes it a very attractive insurance package," McClellan said.

The leader of one organization for seniors predicted that the higher premiums will drive away some of the more affluent seniors, undermining Medicare's broad political support and its finances.

"As healthier and wealthier seniors see their premiums rise, we fear that when that premium equals what they could pay for regular health insurance, why be in the program at all?" said Shannon Benton, executive director of the Senior Citizens League, an advocacy group with 1.2 million members. "We feel that eventually the sickest, the oldest and the poorest are going to be the ones left behind in Medicare, and their costs are going to go up significantly to sustain the program."

Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) introduced a bill in April that would repeal the income-based premium increases, but it has not gotten out of a House committee.

Medicare officials said they expect 9,000 people to drop out of the program next year because of the new income-based premiums, and 30,000 to leave by 2010. Overall, that's not a lot, they said.

"I don't see any substantial adverse impacts on participation in Medicare, and I definitely see a very positive impact on making Medicare sustainable for the long term," McClellan said. Medicare officials had been projecting an even higher increase in the standard premium, but there has been an unexpected slowing in the volume of services and tests that doctors are ordering for their Medicare patients, McClellan said.

Officials said the standard premium increase of 5.6 percent is the smallest since 2001. It trails the projected 6 percent increase in per capita health spending next year and a projected 7 percent increase in prescription drug spending, they said. Average premiums in the Medicare drug benefit, known as Part D, are expected to remain flat in 2007, McClellan said.

McClellan said the Part B standard premium would have to go up by $1.50 in 2008 (in addition to routine annual premium increases) if Congress were to repeal a planned 5.1 percent cut in Medicare payments to physicians next year -- a cut that doctors are lobbying hard to kill.

That prospect troubles AARP -- the largest senior organization, with 37 million members.

"The fact that the premium is a little less than originally projected is good news, but . . . we may simply be forestalling higher costs to beneficiaries," said Kirsten Sloan, the organization's national coordinator for health.

Subtle GOP Maneuvers (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Over the summer, Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) sat down with a handful of Republican colleagues to gauge their support for a potential leadership bid.

The talks were very preliminary, a Carter spokeswoman said, but the former judge is hardly alone in considering a run.

As Republicans focus their energy and fundraising efforts on retaining their majority this fall, a handful of ambitious lawmakers are also angling for a promotion within the conference.

At least seven chairmanships will open next year if the GOP holds the House, and other members are mulling a challenge of the current leaders.

“I think we will see a crowded field,” said Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), who is expected to challenge current Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) should Pryce triumph in her tough reelection race.

The election results, particularly if Republicans lose the House, will dictate how crowded that field becomes. “The dynamics are going to depend on the election results we have,” Blackburn said.

Indeed, uncertainty about those results has somewhat muted the internal leadership campaigns.

“It’s very subtle,” said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), a member of the Republican Steering Committee, the 28-member panel that decides committee slots.

In July, Putnam and other members of the Republican Steering Committee met one-on-one with many of the lawmakers who are vying for committee gavels. Members of that committee expect an up-tick in those meetings before lawmakers in the House go home to campaign at the end of this month.

Uncertainty Facing Current Leaders

During a closed-door meeting last week of the elected leadership in House, Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the GOP campaign chief, told the other leaders that he still expects Republicans to retain their majority in November, a GOP aide familiar with the meeting said earlier this week.

Reynolds and the other leaders have been careful to measure expectations this cycle, warning members of Democratic efforts to unseat them without becoming overly gloomy. This serves to keep members motivated and dampens expectations heading into the critical election.

Whatever the outcome, most members believe House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) control their own fate in the next Congress.

If House remains in GOP control and Hastert decides to stay for another term, many Hill staffers and lobbyists speculate that he would name Reynolds as leadership chairman, former Rep. Rob Portman’s (R-Ohio) old job, in order to give the New York Republican a seat at the table while preventing a two- or three-way race for leader or whip.

Losing the House should throw all those equations in doubt, members, aides and outside GOP lobbyists said in interviews over the last month.

A loss of House control could create an opening for a dark horse candidate, such as Republican Study Committee (RSC) Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.), to launch a bid for the leadership.

Auditioning

Pence has always generated favorable media coverage through an active RSC press shop. The outspoken conservative stirred so much speculation during the race for majority leader earlier this year that his office issued a release stating he would not cast a bid for the post.

Pence stayed in the spotlight over the August recess with his proposal to revive comprehensive immigration reform, and he has taken a much less combative public stance toward the leadership since last fall's showdown over federal spending to fund repair efforts in the hurricane-damaged Gulf Coast. As evidence, the RSC has not gone on attack this month to force leaders to bring a bill creating a so-called "Sunset Commission" to the floor, despite promises Boehner made to give them the vote in exchange for support on the budget.

Pence's naysayers criticize him for catering to the media instead of the party, and some congressional staffers jokingly call him "the minority leader" for threatening the conservative base with his push to cut federal spending despite objections from leaders and the centrist Republicans whose vulnerable seats are so valuable to keeping the majority.

Blackburn, a telegenic conservative, has also maintained a steady presence in the media and in the conference since declaring her ambitions to challenge Pryce last winter.

The Tennessee Republican hosts biweekly meetings with a small group of Republican colleagues to discuss communication strategy in a Longworth office her staff has dubbed "The Think Room." She also worked with leadership to craft a message defying the Senate's immigration bill.

There is also concern in GOP circles that Pryce will lose her seat in November, which could broaden the field of candidates running to replace her.

Whatever the outcome this fall, state delegations will play an important role in these contests, and no state is agitating for a seat at the leadership table more than Texas.

Republican insiders consider Carter, who serves on the Republican Steering Committee, and Rep. Henry Bonilla (R-Texas) the most likely candidates from the Lone Star State. Carter's office said his discussions over the summer were very preliminary and hinted that he was considering a run for one of the lower-tier leadership posts.

The leadership elections earlier this year drew a crowded field for each of the vacated posts, and other leaders narrowly avoided a full slate of elections. Some of those members may still be candidates.

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) resigned his leadership post to run for majority leader; Reps. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) and Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.) never had a chance to wage their own contest for whip when Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) lost his own bid for the No. 2 spot in the conference and chose to stay on as the chief Republican vote counter; and Reps. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.), Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.) and Adam Putnam (R-Fla.) ran to replace Shadegg in a race that Putnam eventually won.

The other wildcards next year are Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska), both completing their final months as chairmen. Sensenbrenner could try to reclaim his post on the Science Committee because he still has two years left under the six-year term limits.

Leaders Keep a Close Eye on the Party

Given this uncertainty, leaders continue to keep a close eye on the conference.

The Speaker will make campaign stops in over 200 districts this cycle, marking the second consecutive election cycle he will exceed that mark. And Boehner, whose own travel has increased precipitously since becoming leader, visited 26 districts during the August recess with more campaign stops expected this fall.

Blunt, whose own post could be challenged, holds regular meetings with small groups of Republican lawmakers to discuss pending legislation.

Blunt and his chief of staff, Brian Gaston, met with most of the committee chairman and their staff directors over the summer to discuss each chairman's legislative priorities for the fall and beyond. The meetings included sit-downs with Sensenbrenner, Young and two other outgoing chairmen, Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) on Financial Services and Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) on Ways and Means.

"Mr. Blunt says the Whip should know the members better than anyone in the building, and both of these opportunities further that goal," Blunt spokeswoman Burson Snyder wrote in an email.

Cantor, Blunt's chief deputy, is expected to travel to anywhere from 50 to 60 districts this cycle in support of Republican candidates. The popular Virginian also hosts regular breakfasts with a small, rotating group of fellow Republicans in the same Longworth office where Blackburn convenes her "Think Room."

The Republican Steering Committee

Not only will the election results reshape the perceptions of individual leaders, a Democratic majority could also reshape the panel that decides on committee slots and other plum assignments.

This uncertainty could actually be a boost for the party because ambitious members are raising more money for their colleagues to protect their majority.

"It's probably the best thing for the [National Republican Congressional Committee]," said Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who is running to succeed Reynolds as chairman, because members are working hard to raise money and help GOP candidates in tough elections.

The Race for NRCC Chair

The race to succeed Reynolds as NRCC chairman is the only leadership race that is guaranteed at this point.

Cole and aides to Reps. Phil English (R-Pa.) and Pete Sessions (R-Texas), his two opponents, all say the race remains undecided. While each member has a significant block of support in the conference, it seems that none has secured a clear majority.

"I expect this to be a two-ballot race," Cole said. "I think there is still a considerable block of uncommitted votes out there."

Cole recently gave the NRCC $300,000 in hard money and distributed a strategy memo last week in which he recommended Republicans to personalize the election by attacking their opponents. That includes investing in a thorough opposition research package, reserving television time to hit opponents and keep critical ads running through the last week before the election.

"Know your opponent's record and weaknesses inside out – and exploit them," Cole wrote to GOP candidate Van Taylor in Texas. "Do not let up – keep the tough ads running right up to the election day."

Sessions has given 78 Republican candidates a combined $553,500 through his political action committee (PAC) so far this cycle, according to a memo from PETEPAC. He has also organized 19 events to benefit a total of 33 GOP candidates this cycle. Those events have raised over $1.7 million. In addition, he raised $717,000 for the NRCC during six dinners over the last two years.

English has traveled extensively to benefit GOP challengers and open seat candidates this year, and his PAC had given Republican candidates more than $300,000 as of the end of July, according to the nonpartisan campaign website politicalmoneyline.com.

The Pennsylvania Republican has made his own ability to win tough reelection fights over the years a vanguard of his campaign for chairman, particularly with members in consistently competitive seats.

These efforts, along with those of other members angling for promotions within the conference, could be the only thing keeping Republicans in the hunt this election season despite a number of national factors that will continue to weigh them down.

"I think our members have worked harder in this race than I've ever seen them," said Cole, who is a former executive director of the Republican National Committee. "I've certainly given more that I thought I would before this cycle."

Panel Discounts Existence Of Unique Gulf War Syndrome (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

An expert panel reviewing hundreds of studies has concluded there is no single "Gulf War syndrome" afflicting thousands of veterans of the 1990-91 conflict, although they have suffered vague symptoms at a much higher rate than other veterans.

They have also experienced post-traumatic stress disorder and depression two to three times as frequently as other veterans, the panel found. Less certain is a possibly higher risk for the neurological ailment Lou Gehrig's disease, and possibly a rare birth defect in their children.

"We can't identify a Gulf War syndrome," said Lynn R. Goldman, a physician and epidemiologist who headed the 13-member committee appointed by the National Academies Institute of Medicine (IOM).

Previous blue-ribbon panels, including several convened by the IOM, one by the Defense Department and one by the White House under Bill Clinton, reached the same conclusion.

In preparing the report, Goldman and her colleagues read 850 studies done in the years since soldiers in an Army Reserve unit in Indiana began reporting a constellation of symptoms that included fatigue, joint and muscle pains, difficulty concentrating and memory problems in the months after they returned from the Persian Gulf in 1991. The panel gave more credibility to large, well-designed and controlled studies; it did no original research of its own.

DOJ_NMG_0062467

The largest and most representative study found that 29 percent of Gulf War veterans reported physical complaints arising from several body systems, compared with 16 percent of servicemen and women who were not sent to the gulf. This was not just an American phenomenon; British, Canadian, Australian and Danish troops deployed to the gulf also reported more symptoms than their non-deployed counterparts.

The panel concluded that "unexplained illnesses are the most prevalent health outcome of service in the Gulf War."

However, the array and severity of symptoms varies, and many are typical of other conditions (such as fibromyalgia, multiple chemical sensitivity and chronic fatigue syndrome) whose cause is unknown.

"The nature of the symptoms suffered by many Gulf War veterans does not point to an obvious diagnosis, etiology [cause], or standard treatment," the panel wrote.

Three studies examined by the panel found a slightly increased rate of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also known as Lou Gehrig's disease, in Gulf War veterans. Overall, 107 cases of the fatal disease were found in about 700,000 men and women deployed. Goldman and her colleagues said this trend should be followed with continued surveillance for the disease.

Among the 850 papers examined were several with less certain findings.

One found a slight increase in brain cancer among the 100,000 soldiers theoretically exposed to sarin gas after rockets containing the nerve agent were unwittingly destroyed in a large ammunition dump in Khamisiyah, Iraq, after the war. That disease remained extremely rare, however, with only a handful of tumors even in the "exposed" group.

That finding is questionable for two reasons, however.

There is no evidence that any soldiers were actually exposed to sarin, which causes well-recognized symptoms at very low concentrations. In addition, brain tumors generally grow 10 to 20 years before being found. This study was done nine years after Khamisiyah, suggesting that many of the tumors in the soldiers had probably formed before the detonation.

Nevertheless, the brain-tumor finding "provides another lead that should be followed" by future studies, Goldman said.

One study also found a slightly increased rate of birth defects, especially of the urinary tract, among children of Gulf War veterans. Another reported five cases of a rare, disfiguring defect called Goldenhar syndrome in babies of Persian Gulf veterans conceived soon after the war, compared with only two in non-deployed veterans. The children with Goldenhar were profiled in a Life magazine article that helped popularize the idea that soldiers had been exposed to persistent toxins during the war.

Because the number of defects was so small, however, these differences could have easily happened by chance.

A big problem with evaluating the source of illness in gulf veterans is that little information was gathered on their exposure to pesticides, smoke and battlefield contaminants -- and even to vaccines and drugs administered by the military.

"Even just a few measurements on the ground would have made a huge difference," Goldman said of the Khamisiyah detonations.

The panel advised the military do a better job of assessing the health of soldiers immediately before and after deployment -- as is being done in the Iraq war -- as well as gathering better toxic exposure data in future wars.

Steve Robinson, a Gulf War veteran who directs government relations for Veterans for America, supported that suggestion in particular.

"The IOM report confirms that many Gulf War veterans are seriously ill and that they were exposed to many types of poisons, but the link remains unclear because the military failed to collect exposure data in 1991," he said. "Veterans for America believes the military cannot let this mistake happen again. . . . Lessons learned should be lessons followed."

VA Study Doubts Gulf War Syndrome (AP-Y)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

The unexplained symptoms that afflict thousands of Gulf War veterans don't constitute a single illness, a federally funded study concludes.

Even though U.S. and foreign veterans of the 1991 war report more symptoms of illness than do soldiers who didn't serve in the Persian Gulf, there is no such thing as Gulf War syndrome, according to the Veterans Affairs-sponsored report released Tuesday.

Nearly 30 percent of all those who served in the brief war have reported problems.

"There's no unique pattern of symptoms. Every pattern identified in Gulf War veterans also seems to exist in other veterans, though it is important to note the symptom rate is higher, and it is a serious issue," said Dr. Lynn Goldman, of Johns Hopkins University, who headed the Institute of Medicine committee that prepared the report.

The report did find evidence of an elevated risk of the rare nerve disease amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also called Lou Gehrig's disease, among Gulf War veterans. They also face an increased risk of anxiety disorders, depression and substance abuse, it said.

The VA contracted with the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, to review scientific studies and probe the issue at the direction of Congress. Department of Veterans Affairs spokesman Phil Budahn said the VA would not comment until it had a chance to study the report.

Tuesday's report is the latest in the important series, which the VA will rely on to determine whether Gulf War veterans are eligible for special disability benefits if they are found to suffer from illnesses that can be linked to their service.

Veterans can now claim those benefits only by making an undiagnosed illness claim, said Steve Robinson, a Gulf War Army veteran and government relations director for Veterans for America.

"They keep saying it over and over, every year. We know that — we know that there is no single thing that made veterans sick. We know this thing is likely a combination of various exposures," Robinson said in pushing for new studies he hopes will find what ails tens of thousands of his fellow vets.

However, the report's confirmation that Gulf War veterans are sicker may actually help them secure government benefits, said Shannon Middleton, assistant director of health policy for the American Legion.

A member of the Research Advisory Committee on Gulf War Veterans' Illnesses, also chartered by Congress, called the report the "first step" in cataloging the studies done on veterans of the conflict.

"But the most prevalent problems in Gulf War veterans are the multisymptom illness/Gulf War syndrome-type problems that still affect a sizable proportion of those who served in the war. I am disappointed that the IOM report does little to analyze what these studies collectively tell us about the nature and causes of these conditions," said Lea Steele, a Kansas State University epidemiologist who is the committee's scientific director.

Soldiers who served in the Persian Gulf following the Iraqi invasion of neighboring Kuwait in August 1990 have reported symptoms that include fatigue, memory loss, muscle and joint pain, rashes and difficulty sleeping. The variety of symptoms has complicated efforts to pinpoint their cause, according to the report.

Nearly 700,000 U.S. soldiers, along with troops from 34 other countries, took part in the Gulf War. Once in the region, those soldiers were exposed to a wide array of toxins and other potential health hazards, including smoke from hundreds of oil well fires, pesticides, depleted uranium ammunition and possibly the nerve agent sarin, released during the demolition of a munitions dump.

Inadequate screening of soldiers before deployment in the Gulf War, coupled with a lack of environmental monitoring during the conflict, have hindered efforts to determine whether exposure to those contaminants is linked to any illness, the report also notes.

For years, the government denied the mysterious illnesses were linked to the war. It now acknowledges that at least some were due to wartime service. The government is no longer pointing to stress as the likely reason, as some federally funded studies had suggested.

Signs Brew Of A Heated Debate Over OMB Nominee (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Federal regulation, which usually simmers on the back burner in Washington, seems likely to start boiling in the next few weeks if public interest and labor groups have their way.

Advocacy groups yesterday assailed Susan E. Dudley , the president's nominee to head up regulatory policy at the Office of Management and Budget, and called on the Senate to reject her nomination.

"We believe she is unfit," said Joan Claybrook , president of Public Citizen, a nonprofit consumer advocacy organization.

By custom, presidential nominees remain silent until their confirmation hearing, so the Bush administration fired back at Public Citizen on Dudley's behalf.

"When a fringe group like this one criticizes Susan Dudley, I think it's a good indication that she's actually squarely in the thoughtful mainstream along with most Americans," said Scott Milburn , press secretary at the OMB. "She's very well suited to . . . keep our regulatory process on track."

To some degree, the dispute over the Dudley nomination reflects inherent tensions in the federal regulatory system. The OMB reviews major agency regulations and can send them back to agencies for more justification. Agencies say their rules flow from laws, do not need more justification and sometimes are backed up by federal courts. The hue and cry increases during Republican administrations, which public interest groups see as tilting policy in favor of big business.

Paul R. Portney , dean of the management college at the University of Arizona, said he thinks public interest groups "don't like the fact that there is this office," regardless of which political party controls the White House, because the OMB questions and forces agencies to justify costs and benefits.

W. Kip Viscusi , distinguished professor at Vanderbilt University, said the Dudley nomination is part of "an ongoing battle where advocates of regulatory programs complain" that the OMB is too powerful.

"The best she can do is try to make the regulations more effective and generate more health and environmental benefits through more imaginative regulatory approaches," Viscusi said.

Portney and Viscusi noted that public interest groups' calls for the Senate to reject Dudley could become a replay of the bruising battle over her predecessor in the regulatory job, John D. Graham . He left as administrator of the OMB's Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs in February, and the White House announced over the summer the president's intention to nominate Dudley.

Prior to her nomination, Dudley directed the regulatory studies program for the Mercatus Center at George Mason University. The center has been active in submitting proposals to the OMB that call for modifying or eliminating regulations and has emerged as a policy player in the Bush administration and on Capitol Hill.

Dudley's scholarly articles and published comments will be used to shape the debate over her nomination. During a telephone briefing, Public Citizen, OMB Watch, Natural Resources Defense Council and the AFL-CIO portrayed Dudley as outside the mainstream on regulatory issues.

"I have dealt with OIRA administrators going back to the first one," said Gary Bass , executive director of OMB Watch. "This nominee is more extreme than any of the past ones. She has an anti-regulatory fervor and an ideological zeal that is unparalleled in any of the nominees put forward in years."

The public interest groups faulted Dudley for controversial remarks on rules involving air bags, arsenic limits in drinking water and workplace injuries. All too often, they contended, Dudley inappropriately relied on cost-benefit analyses and overestimated the value of consumer choice when objecting to regulations.

Jonathan H. Adler , a professor and co-director of the Center for Business Law and Regulation at Case Western Reserve University's law school, said Dudley has "generally liked free-market solutions to things" and "is skeptical of one-size-fits-all" regulations.

Dudley, 51, has a master's degree from the Sloan School of Management at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. She has worked on regulatory issues at the Environmental Protection Agency and at OIRA. Since 2002, she has been affiliated with George Mason University.

Dudley's nomination was submitted to the Senate on Aug. 1, just as Congress left on summer break. The Senate has relatively few work days scheduled in this election year, raising the possibility that President Bush might have to give her an interim appointment if opponents stall her confirmation.

Steven L. Katz, an author and consultant, will discuss "everything new government executives and managers need to know but are never told" at noon today on Federal Diary Live athttp://www.washingtonpost.com. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Macs And Grant Site Just Don't Click (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Scientists, scholars and others planning to use their Macintosh computers to submit grant proposals to the federal government in the months ahead should be prepared for a rocky, or at least error-message-littered, road ahead.

Luckily, Mac users are used to it.

Ever since its inception several years ago, the government's electronic grant submission system has been compatible only with Windows-based computers. That has forced Mac users to go with paper submissions or use clumsy patchwork programs -- or "workarounds" -- that government officials have conceded are "not ideal" and Mac users have called, well, insert your favorite PC expletive here.

Earlier this year, the Department of Health and Human Services -- a central manager of the Grants.gov system -- promised that by November the system would be compatible with Macs, which are popular among scientists and academics. That was based on promises from Northrop Grumman Corp., which has been paid tens of millions of dollars to run Grants.gov for the government.

But a new twist emerged this week when HHS announced that Grumman had lost its bid to win a renewal of its contract and will be moving on as of Nov. 1.

So will Grumman deliver the goods as promised before it leaves?

DOJ_NMG_0062470

"That's a question we have," said Grants.gov program manager John Etcheverry.

Just last week, Etcheverry said, Grumman delivered to HHS its first shot at a Mac-compatible version of its IBM-based grant application software for an initial round of testing by government experts.

Asked how it worked, Etcheverry said hesitantly: "It's, to quote one of our testers, 'It's early.' But it seems to be working."

Despite repeated inquiries from The Post, Grumman spokeswoman Juli Ballesteros did not provide anyone to address the company's commitment to making Grants.gov Mac-compatible before the company leaves.

With that rollout uncertain, responsibility will fall to the new winner of the Grants.gov contract, Fairfax-based General Dynamics Information Technology. Under the terms of its contract, worth up to $18.9 million over five years, the company will create a new system by March 31 that will be compatible with Windows-based and Macintosh computers as well as Unix and Linux systems, which are popular in some science labs and research institutions.

The company's vice president overseeing the Grants.gov project, Mary Biear, said the company will start with a platform-independent, off-the-shelf Adobe product, which it will modify in minor ways to fit the requirements of the government's grant-application system.

She said her company would also maintain key systems left behind by Grumman -- including, if it works, the new Mac-compatible system.

"The first question for our team is . . . if users can use it," said Biear, who said she has seen the nascent product because the companies have begun a seven-week overlapping transition period. "If it's working appropriately, [we] will maintain it and roll it out. If not, we would push it back."

In that case, Mac users will have to wait until the new system comes out at the end of March.

Not everyone is optimistic that even that deadline will be met. David Cassidy, a vice president at the District-based Turner Consulting Group, which was part of a consortium that lost its bid to take over the Grants.gov contract from Grumman, said he can't see how General Dynamics can fulfill the contract's requirements for the price it promised unless the company "has some incredible 'special sauce' that will enable them to meet these budget, functionality and schedule constraints."

But even if the company succeeds on schedule, it will be too late for the thousands of applicants who face a Feb. 1 deadline for the National Institutes of Health's most popular "R01" research grants. NIH has announced that it wants all those applications to be filed electronically.

"The big NIH deadline is Feb. 1, 2007," said John S. Massa, associate director of the University of Iowa's division of sponsored programs, in an e-mail. So a March release "isn't going to help much."

Norka Ruiz Bravo, NIH's deputy director for extramural research, conceded the timing was awkward.

Will the agency consider pushing back its deadline for an all-electronic submission process? "That is something we may want to think about," she said.

Vice Must Wash Hands Before Returning To Work (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Washington

I called Tim Russert to ask if Dick Cheney had washed his hands after their interview on Sunday.

“No-o-o,’’ he replied, sounding confused.

Any sort of scrubbing, I wondered? Antiseptic wipe, Purell, quick shower on the way out?

No, Tim assured me, the vice president did not stop at the basement shower at NBC, or even drop by the men’s room you pass on the right as you head out to the parking lot.

According to The Times’s health section yesterday, Lady Macbeth and Pontius Pilate were not alone in wanting that “damned spot” out.

“People who washed their hands after contemplating an unethical act were less troubled by their thoughts than those who didn’t,’’ Benedict Carey wrote about a new study on the “Macbeth effect,” published in the journal Science.

“In one of several experiments among Northwestern undergraduates, the researchers had one group of students recall an unethical act from their past, like betraying a friend, and another group reflect on an ethical deed, like returning lost money,’’ the article said. “Afterward, the students had their choice of a gift, either a pencil or an antiseptic wipe. Those who had reflected on a shameful act were twice as likely as the others to take the wipe.’’

If Dick Cheney didn’t try to hose himself down after his outlandish performance on “Meet the Press,’’ he may be so deep in denial he doesn’t even know he’s ruining America and needs a symbolic moral superwash.

Since W. revealed he’s been reading Shakespeare — including “Macbeth” — I’ve been puzzling over which character the vice president most resembles. He’s got as much malignant sway over the protagonist as Iago, but Iago hated Othello.

DOJ_NMG_0062471

The Lord of the Underworld is more like Lady Macbeth, who persuades her partner to make a huge error in judgment by taunting him about manliness. If he doesn't want to be unmanned, he must pre-emptively wield the dagger against his rival. She tells him:

When you durst do it, then you were a man;
And to be more than what you were, you would Be so much more the man.

Even though "blood will have blood," Macbeth decides he must stay on his self-destructive path:

I am in blood
Stepped in so far that, should I wade no more,
Returning were as tedious as go o'er.

W. and Vice went on TV this week to double down on their dishonest case, now contradicted by a mountain of evidence, once more milking our sorrow over 9/11 to justify their errant course in Iraq.

In a speech that Tony Snow promised would be "reflective,'' the president used hyperventilated rhetoric about "a struggle for civilization" and cynically retraced a line he now knows is false, again linking Osama and Baghdad: "If we yield Iraq to men like bin Laden, our enemies will be emboldened.''

Bin Laden has become the Willie Horton of the midterms. After letting the C.I.A. disband the unit devoted to hunting for Osama — the Senate took a slap at the White House on Thursday when it voted to reinstate it — Mr. Bush now won't stop talking about the bogeyman he ignored for five years while he transferred all his resources to Iraq.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," he said.

Instead of going after Osama, we invaded Iraq. Now W. says we must stay in Iraq or it will be run by Osamas. We must kill all the terrorists we are creating. American soldiers must keep dying because American soldiers have died. If we criticize Mr. Bush, then we're unmanning the whole country. The logic is deviously Rovian, and we are trapped in the circularity.

On "Meet the Press,'' Mr. Cheney warned that America cannot let its adversaries "break our will'' and show we "don't have the stomach for the fight.''

"It was the right thing to do," Vice insisted of the war in Iraq, "and if we had to do it over again we would do exactly the same thing."

After all the miscalculations and billions wasted, projects screwed up, lives and limbs lost, foreign enemies made, American stature squandered, Taliban strength regained, North Korean bombs and Iran-Iraq alliances built (visiting the American-hating, Holocaust-denying Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad yesterday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq called Iran "a good friend and brother'') Dick Cheney wouldn't do anything differently?

Part of leadership has to be retooling, saying: "You know what? This hasn't worked. This is making things worse. What else can we do?''

Break out the Wet Wipes, Mr. Cheney. Time for a good scrubbing.

Falling Oil Prices May Spell Relief For Consumers (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

The recent drop in oil prices could provide a welcome and surprising boost to consumer pocketbooks this fall, cushioning the economy from a falloff in home prices and construction while venting an important source of inflation pressure.

The easing of energy prices is an unexpected -- and little-noted -- positive amid economic anxiety over falling housing activity, previous energy-price increases and the possibility of recession.

Crude oil was at $77 a barrel as recently as early August. Yesterday, the price of the October crude-oil future contract settled at $63.76, a near six month low, down $1.85 from Monday, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. That helped spur stock prices to a four-month high. At the same time, the average retail price of gasoline has fallen to $2.67 from $3.08 a gallon, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

"Some 99% of the questions I get these days are about the size of the drag from housing, and I think that far too few people are thinking seriously about the boost from lower oil," said Robert Mellman, senior economist at J.P. Morgan Chase. He predicted the retail gasoline price should soon hit $2.30 a gallon, based on declines that already have occurred in the wholesale price.

Mr. Mellman said lower gasoline prices should boost the annual growth rate of consumer spending a full percentage point and could lift fourth-quarter economic growth from a forecast 3%, at an annual rate, to as high as 3.7%. For now, though, his firm is leaving its growth forecast unchanged.

Since 2004, oil prices are up sharply amid supply disruptions, tensions in the Middle East and rising demand, especially in China and India. That increase has in turn squeezed wages, in particular for less-affluent families. Although consumers have absorbed the impact in part by saving less, their spending also has been crimped, which economists and analysts have seen as a factor in slowing sales at retailers from Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to mid- and up-market chains such as Williams-Sonoma Inc.

Fuel prices have gone in reverse of late because many supply fears have proved -- so far -- to be unfounded, including a wider conflict in the Middle East, possibly involving Iran; violence in Nigeria and Iraq; and the hurricane season in the Gulf of Mexico. This also is a seasonally weak period for oil demand.

If declining oil prices lead to a pickup in consumer demand, that also could boost business confidence. "How gas prices affect the average Wal-Mart and Target customer is of keen interest to us," said Patrick Casey, assistant vice president for forecasting and planning at TTX Co., a Chicago provider of rail cars and freight-management services to the railway industry.

Lower oil prices also could boost economic prospects overseas, although by less than in the U.S., where consumer prices are far more sensitive to changes in energy prices. Relief on the fuel front may trigger upward revisions to Europe's economic growth projections for next year. "The rundown in oil prices has come so quickly, I think it has a lot of people reaching for their calculators right now," says David Brown, an economist with Bear Stearns in London.

In China, leaders have been contemplating relaxing costly regulations that have insulated their consumers from the rise in world oil prices. The recent drop could remove some of that urgency.

Some economists are less enthusiastic. Nancy Lazar, economist at ISI Group, said oil prices take a while to fully affect the economy. "We've yet to see a lot of the damage from the increase we've had in the price of oil in the last couple years," she said. "[The recent drop] is good news, but it's more good news for the fourth quarter of 2007 than it is for the near term."

Michael Englund, principal director of Action Economics in Boulder, Colo., said, "Price swings have a much bigger impact on consumer-confidence survey readings and business sentiment than they do on actual consumer behavior."

Of course, with spare capacity still tight, prices could easily shoot up again on a supply disruption. "If oil is back over $70 per barrel in three weeks, all of this [positive benefit] is out the window," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group Inc. Indeed, trading on futures markets indicate oil prices may rise back above $70 by a year from now.

The oil-price drop is still too early, and prices remain too high, for major producers to respond with output cuts. Still, the Organization for Petroleum Exporting Countries quietly agreed this week to supply no more oil than the market requires. That will enable major oil-exporting nations to effectively ignore quotas and curb output if prices plunge further before they meet again in December.

For now, the price drop's impact on inflation will be as important as its effect on economic growth. Edward McKelvey, economist at Goldman Sachs, expects the decline in gasoline prices to knock 0.4 percentage point off the overall inflation rate. The 12-month inflation rate was 4.1% in July. If Mr. McKelvey's calculations are correct and other prices continue their recent trend, that rate could fall to 2.4% in September, in part because a big jump in September 2005, due to Hurricane Katrina, will drop out of the 12-month calculation.

While the Federal Reserve focuses on "core inflation," which excludes energy and food prices, it blames the recent rise of core inflation on energy costs seeping into the prices of other goods and services. It is a principal reason the Fed, while leaving short-term rates alone at 5.25% last month, has said it is ready to raise them again if inflation pressures intensify. It could relax that stance if the retreat in energy prices hastens an expected decline in core inflation. Mr. McKelvey said that by boosting growth, lower energy prices could also make rate cuts less likely.

It may take a while before the drop in energy prices ripples more broadly through other goods and services. "Our fuel surcharge has not fully offset the increased fuel cost," said Ron Dillon, controller of Dillon's Bus Service Inc. in Millersville, Md. "Fuel prices will have to continue to decline substantially" before surcharges are rescinded, Mr. Dillon said.

The falling price of oil also may be an ominous sign if it reflects decreased global demand, which would indicate decreased economic activity. The International Energy Agency yesterday revised down its forecast for oil demand growth world-wide this year, "largely due to revisions to North American preliminary data, flat consumption in Europe, and continued demand sluggishness in the Pacific."

In the U.S., energy-demand growth has slowed but not yet fallen. Through early September, gasoline consumption increased 0.8% from the same period last year, less than typical growth of 1.5% to 2% but a "small impact in comparison to the shifts on the supply side," said Mike Burdette, senior analyst at the Energy Information Administration.

Oil, Gas Prices Take A Dive (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Oil prices plunged below $64 a barrel yesterday and settled 19 percent below this summer's record highs, bringing a major dose of inflation relief to hard-pressed consumers and the economy.

Washington-area drivers have particular reason to rejoice, as gasoline prices here -- in an unusual move -- have dipped a penny below the national average of $2.59 a gallon for regular grade, according to GasBuddy.com yesterday evening, leaving an unexpected dividend of spare change jangling in consumers' pockets that is likely to be quickly deployed into spending on other items.

"Happy days are here again. Let's hope nothing major happens" to send prices back up, said Roy L.C., one of many drivers exulting over the windfall on Internet chat boards yesterday. The drop in oil prices helped spark a 101-point rise in the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Analysts attribute plummeting oil prices to a worldwide easing of demand in the face of record high prices this summer, as well as the dissipation of geopolitical tensions and threats to oil supplies from Lebanon and Iran to the oil-rich Gulf Coast, which has escaped without a hit so far this hurricane season.

Some analysts say a sea change is occurring in the oil market, and it will not revisit soon the record high of $78.40 set in July by premium crude in New York. Premium crude prices settled at $63.76 a barrel in New York trading yesterday, the lowest since March.

"We're in the midst of a tectonic change," said Peter Beutel, president of Cameron Hanover Inc., an energy consultant. "The rally that's lasted almost five years may be over. We keep seeing lower demand estimates which show the impact of very high prices."

Yesterday, the International Energy Agency trimmed its forecast for world oil demand this year by 100,000 barrels a day, and by 160,000 barrels next year, citing slackening demand in the United States and elsewhere.

At the same time, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali al-Naimi, told a conference in Vienna that oil producers plan to invest nearly $100 billion in new oil and gas projects in the next five years to meet rising demand -- raising the prospect of a long-sought easing in the tight supplies that have fueled record oil prices.

Feeding the optimism on Monday, Iraq's oil minister said the war-ridden country hopes to double its oil production to more than 4 million barrels a day in the next five years -- a development that could cause further dramatic drops in oil prices. Though it has the world's second-largest conventional oil reserves, after Saudi Arabia, much of Iraq's production has been idled for years because of a lack of investment and maintenance as well as sabotage by insurgents.

"If we bring security to the country under control, definitely we could double production. We could triple it in 10 years," said Nijyar H. Shemdin, a representative of Iraq's Kurdistan region at a meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday. He said Iraq is producing at 60 percent under its potential.

Many analysts remain wary, however, noting that the tensions in Iraq and elsewhere that have fed high prices have not been resolved. They also point out that oil prices fell precipitously last fall, only to pick up again in the spring and summer.

"Crude and products markets are still dangerously tight, the hurricane season is far from over, and the winter heating season lies ahead," said Eric Chaney, analyst with Morgan Stanley.

While oil prices may rally again this winter, he said he thinks they will fall more substantially in 2007 and 2008 as a result of slower global economic growth, increasing conservation and rising supplies.

In the meantime, however, "lower energy prices will ease global inflation and help the global economy," he said.

David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., said oil prices have been behaving irrationally and could soar again on "a reheating in the Middle East or an escalation of the confrontation with Iran."

He noted that the oil market has been driven by speculation and fear. "The drop in oil prices occurred because near-term fears of supply interruptions have lessened," he said. "The actual supply-demand balance has not changed."

Falling Oil Prices Fuel Blue Chips To Jump 101.25 (WSJ)

By Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Tumbling oil prices were just the fuel stocks needed.

Crude-oil futures fell for the seventh consecutive trading session, their longest losing streak in nearly three years. Investors emboldened by the prospect of lower energy prices and better-than-expected earnings from big Wall Street firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc. looked past reports of a record trade gap and a thwarted terrorist attack in Syria and bought stocks by the bushel.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average leapt 101.25 points, or almost 1%, to a four-month high of 11498.09. It is now up more than 7% year-to-date and about 225 points from its all-time high in January 2000.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1%, or 13.57 points, to 1313.11, and the tech-stock-laden Nasdaq Composite jumped about 2%, or 42.57 points, to 2215.82, to inch back into positive territory for the year. The Russell 2000 index of small stocks rose even more, 2.4%.

Treasury bonds also rose, as did the dollar, including its fifth gain in the past six days on the euro.

"The combination of significant pressure on crude and good earnings from Goldman Sachs provided a very positive tone," said Andy Brooks, head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price Group.

Oil-futures contracts for October delivery slipped $1.85, or 2.8%, to $63.76 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Crude is at its lowest level since March 22 and down more than 9% over the past week. Other commodities, including gold, which is down 8% over the past five days, fell as well.

Unleaded-gasoline futures dropped 4.25 cents a gallon, or 2.7%, on the Nymex to $1.5521, the lowest close since Feb. 27 and off 9.2% so far this year.

Oil prices are tumbling for myriad reasons, including a slowing economy, lower demand forecasts, a calm hurricane season and the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' statement Monday that it would keep pumping crude at current levels. Lower energy costs would lighten their drag on corporate profits, cheering investors.

More than two-thirds of the stocks on the New York Stock Exchange were in the black. Many gainers were companies that should benefit from lower energy prices. Shares of General Motors Corp., which could sell more high-margin trucks and sport-utility vehicles if gas prices keep falling, gained more than 4% on the Big Board.

Goldman Sachs, considered a bellwether in the financial-services group, rose 4.8% on the NYSE.

Investors also reacted positively to shake-ups at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and Hewlett-Packard Co., which rose 4% and 1.5%, respectively.

Early in the day, the pharmaceutical company's chief executive and general counsel stepped down after a federal monitor pressured the company to fire them. Meanwhile, Patricia Dunn announced plans to step down as H-P chairwoman in January, but remain on the board. The move was triggered by a widening probe of tactics used in a company investigation of leaks by its directors.

At the start of the day investors digested news of a thwarted terrorist attack by Islamic militants at the U.S. embassy in Syria and a report from the Commerce Department saying the trade deficit was a record $68.04 billion in July.

One concern heading into today's trading is that yesterday's gains could have been exaggerated by a flurry of trading driven by options expirations later this week. "With all the expirations later this week, it's going to be a tough market to handicap," says Jeffrey Saut, chief investment strategist at Raymond James Financial.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rallied. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the Big Board was 2.84 billion shares, as 2,521 stocks rose and 815 fell.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note rose 7/32, or $2.19 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.775%. The 30-year bond rose 20/32, to yield 4.903%.

The dollar was up. It traded at 117.95 yen, up from 117.59 yen, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2691 from $1.2702.

Falling Oil Prices Help Stocks Rebound (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Oil prices fell a seventh-consecutive session Tuesday, giving investors one less reason to worry about buying stocks.

The suspicion that demand for oil may be cooling, coupled with a major oil discovery last week, knocked crude down $1.85 a barrel to $63.76. Oil has fallen 17.2% from its high on July 14.

Investors are betting lower oil and gas prices will help consumers and businesses navigate a slower-growing economy. That's clear from the Dow Jones industrial average jumping 101.25 points to 11,498.09, contributing to what's turned into a 7.3% gain this year. That's the Dow's highest close since it hit 11,500.73 on May 11, although it's still 225 points away from its all-time high in January 2000 of 11,722.98.

Boosted by computer and electronics retail, home building and photo products stocks, the Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 13.57 points to 1313.11. The index is up 5.2% this year.

And long-lagging tech stocks also got a much-needed lift. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index rose 42.57 points to 2215.82, putting it up 0.5% this year.

There was other bullish news for stocks, other than oil, namely a bigger-than-expected quarterly profit from brokerage Goldman Sachs. The brokerage gained $7.29 to $158.29 and inspired investors to think corporate banking activity remains brisk.

Electronics retailer Best Buy posted strong 22% higher quarterly results. That helped comfort investors worried about how consumer spending would hold up amid $3-a-gallon or higher prices for gas during the summer, says Michael Holland of Holland & Co. "The markets had a huge sigh of relief," he says. Investors are beginning to focus on the positives, he says. "The bad news has been swallowed by the markets."

Even so, the stock rally is all about oil, says Michael Farr, president of Farr Miller & Washington. Falling crude prices "take away the storm cloud of the relentless spiral upward … and the fear of when it will stop," he says.

Despite the market's rally, investors are still tentative and could quickly retrench, says Doug Sandler of Wachovia Securities. Much of the rally is the result of portfolio managers sensing oil is in a bear market and betting that will help stocks in the fourth quarter, he says. But just one piece of bad news will shake those investors out, he says: "Portfolio managers have their fingers in the air, trying to tell where the wind is going."

US Trade Gap Hits Record $68bn (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

The US trade deficit surged to its highest ever level in July as the cost of oil imports rose to a record high and exports fell.

But the swelling deficit, which rose much more than expected, will probably fall back again as oil prices have fallen in recent weeks, analysts said.

The trade deficit rose to $68bn in July, up from $64.8bn in June, beating the record set last October of $66.8bn. The consensus had been for $65.5bn but in the end an unexpected fall in exports drove the deficit up.

About one-third of the increase in the July figure came from higher prices for oil imports. But oil prices have dropped to their lowest levels since March this week, after rising to an all time high in July of $77.03 per barrel. The price is now 15 per cent lower.

"The widening of the deficit in July reflected strength in commodity prices, and energy prices in particular, and these price gains are now being reversed," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics.

"The decline in capital goods exports can be half explained by a $0.6bn drop in aircraft exports, which will be reversed in August."

The value of July exports fell for the first time in five months by $1.3bn to $120bn, while July imports reached an all time high at $188bn, $1.9bn up on June. But exports remained at their second highest level ever.

The fall in exports was led by weakness in capital goods, with aircraft, computers and medical supplies leading the drop.

This year the overall deficit is running at $776bn, which, if met, would set a record for the fifth year in a row.

The politically sensitive deficit to China fell slightly to $19.6bn, but remains on track to exceed the massive $202bn deficit recorded last year, the highest amount ever owed to a single country. The US government has been pushing China to allow its currency to rise in value in order to allow the trade deficit to depreciate.

The worsening trade balance is expected to hold back economic growth this quarter, analysts said.

Trade Deficit Climbs To A Record, Driven By Summer Oil Prices (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The summer swell in oil prices helped push the U.S. trade deficit to a record $68.04 billion in July, a 5% increase from June and the gap's sharpest widening in nearly a year, despite strong exports, the Commerce Department said.

The nation's bill for foreign petroleum totaled $28.48 billion for the month. Imports of all goods and services rose to $188.01 billion, up 1%, from June. But oil wasn't the only factor contributing to the growing trade imbalance. (Read economists' reactions to the data1)

Demand for foreign-made goods showed strength across the board. Imports of industrial supplies, such as iron and steel products, grew $2.18 billion to $54.25 billion in July. Capital-goods imports increased $800 million to $35.46 billion, helped by higher shipments from abroad of computers, medical equipment and drilling and oil-field equipment, among other things. Stronger demand for products like television sets, VCRs, toys and games bolstered imports of consumer goods.

Though overwhelmed by surging imports, U.S. exports came in at $119.97 billion in July. That was down 1.1% from June, but still the second-highest monthly total on record.

A drop in shipments of U.S.-made civilian aircraft, which fell $603 million to $2.59 billion, helped dim the export picture. But shipments abroad of American-made auto parts and vehicles increased, as did exports of consumer goods ranging from pharmaceutical products to pleasure boats, the Commerce Department said.

The department reported a revised June trade gap of $64.82 billion.

The U.S. is on track this year to shatter last year's total trade deficit of $716.73 billion. And with the gap reaching new heights in July, some analysts backtracked on their expectations of how much foreign trade might contribute to U.S. economic growth in the third quarter. Economist David Greenlaw of Morgan Stanley, for example, cut his forecast for third-quarter growth in gross domestic product to 3.0% from a previous 3.2%.

Significantly, when adjusted for inflation, the trade deficit also rose in July, amid a decline in exports and rise in imports. The inflation-adjusted trade deficit is closely watched by economists because it may better reflect foreign trade's impact on GDP.

Even so, it wasn't clear Tuesday that the deficit's jump in July signaled a fresh upward spiral over the long term. Indeed, with oil prices down from midsummer highs, expectations are growing that the deficit could begin to shrink some in the coming months. Paul Ashworth, senior U.S. economist at research firm Capital Economics suggested the "decline in the price of crude oil should cut roughly $2 billion" from the monthly value of U.S. imports.

The U.S. deficit with China declined somewhat in July, shrinking a little more than $100 million to $19.57 billion. Still, the deficit with China remained the U.S.'s largest with any single country, and trade with China remains a volatile political issue.

In this year's fight for control of Congress, for example, top U.S. steel companies and unions have joined together in an multistate media campaign that blames China, along with India and Brazil, for "stealing American jobs" and urges voters to seek out candidates "willing to stand up for American workers and enforce the trade laws."

Bush Adviser Sees Rise In US Wages Growth (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

After years of stagnation, US wage growth will start to catch up with high productivity and economic growth, according to a senior Bush administration official.

Edward Lazear, chairman of President George W. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, on Tuesday also sought to dispel the increasingly widespread view that the median US employee is suffering from a long-term decline in earnings potential.

Mr Lazear's speech is part of a broader administration campaign to focus on the strong US economy in the build-up to critical mid-term congressional elections on November 7. According to recent polls, up to two-thirds of American voters describe the economy as either "not good" or "poor". Voters consistently cite the state of the economy and the Iraq war as their biggest concerns.

Mr Lazear on Tuesday pointed to a 4.1 per cent increase in nominal workers' compensation in the first six months of this year as evidence that employee remuneration was starting to catch up with productivity growth, which has achieved an average annual 3 per cent increase since the US economic recovery began five years ago.

However, critics of the Bush administration say that real wage growth, which excludes the inflationary cost of healthcare that has fuelled compensation growth, continues to languish at or below annual inflation.

Mr Lazear denied the US economy was facing structural changes that had permanently reduced the earnings potential of most employees. He said the normal acceleration of wage growth had begun later in the cycle than usual – but it had begun.

"Wage growth sometimes lags productivity growth – especially coming out of recessions," he said. "2006 will be a period during which real wage gains begin to catch up with earlier gains in productivity, despite large price hikes in the energy sector."

However, the Bush administration's arguments have been met with growing scepticism among economists who point out that real wages for most Americans are marginally below where they were four years ago, in spite of strong overall growth in gross domestic product. According to the Bureau of Labour Statistics, the average hourly wage for private sector non-farm workers was $8.17 in August 2006 (at 1982 prices) compared with $8.23 in August 2002.

Growth in average compensation has been higher than real wage growth owing to the higher cost to employers of healthcare provision and insurance. Medical inflation usually outstrips general inflation.

"The Bush administration continues to tell us what will happen in its view rather than what is actually happening," said Rob Shapiro, head of the New Democrat Network's Globalisation Initiative, a centrist advocacy group. "Median wage stagnation is about a structural shift in the US economy because of globalisation and nothing that Mr Lazear has said has altered this view."

Back, And Stronger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

JUST A FEW MONTHS AFTER 9/11, Osama bin Laden boasted that the attacks had "hit hard the American economy at its heart and its core." If they did, the effect was transitory. In all the commemorations and assessments on the anniversary of 9/11, the resilience of the U.S. economy has attracted less notice than it deserves.

Bin Laden was not alone in his analysis. In the United States, there were warnings of burdensome security costs, sharp business cutbacks and recession on the horizon. Some estimated that the immediate cost of the attacks — including lost life, property and economic output — would approach $170 billion. The longer-term effects, they implied, were almost unimaginable.

Then Americans enjoyed five years of strong productivity and corporate profits, a booming real estate market and rising trade volumes.

It's tempting, and to some degree justified, to chalk up the apparent success to some inherent superiority of the U.S. economy. A recession was already underway on 9/11, but Fed policy and tax cuts fueled a strong recovery. According to a recent report from the World Trade Organization, globalization continued apace, as most major transnational corporations said they would not delay or cancel investment projects in reaction to worldwide terror.

Although private- and public-sector security spending ballooned to $90 billion last year — in a $13-trillion economy — technology had already created efficiencies in U.S. businesses that offset many of the new costs. Entrepreneurs found ways to profit from the security-industrial complex.

Meanwhile, sectors hit directly by the attacks, such as travel, bounced back. Analysts estimate that airlines lost about $40 billion and 150,000 jobs in the wake of 9/11 as passenger traffic plummeted in 2001 and 2002. But last year, a record 670.4 million passengers flew on U.S. carriers.

Another terrorist strike, in the U.S. or abroad, could still do untold damage to the economy. But nowadays economists tend to be less concerned about such a possibility (or unnecessary spending to protect against it) than about high energy costs or a real estate bust. Both would be worrisome, of course. But those kinds of worries are in a whole different category than the fear of a terrorist attack.

Look Who Got A Raise (NYT)

Fearing inflation, investors were spooked recently by a government report showing that companies have spent a lot of money of late on their employees. Annual labor costs were up in the second quarter by 4.9 percent, nearly a point higher than initially estimated. That came on top of a much bigger than expected increase in the first quarter.

Compensation is business's biggest expense, so rising labor costs — if passed on to consumers — could certainly push up prices. But so far, there are no clear signs of that happening. Instead, today's rising labor costs seem to reflect a different economic phenomenon: growing income inequality.

The big jump in labor costs in the first quarter appears to be driven by fat bonuses and stock options — not hefty increases in wages and salaries, the financial lifeblood of most Americans. One-off shots of income do not portend higher inflation because they reflect activity that already happened. And they don't translate into more money for most people. According to David A. Rosenberg, an economist for Merrill Lynch, the huge upward revision in first-quarter labor costs worked out to some $80 billion on an annual basis that flowed to "a lot of well-heeled folks cashing in their stocks."

Rising labor costs also reflect the high cost of employees' health insurance. Unfortunately, that expense doesn't imply better coverage, only higher prices for even a bare-bones plan. The more insurance costs, the more it eats into take-home pay, without making up for the loss with better benefits.

When statisticians talk about "labor costs" and economists — and politicians — talk about "compensation," they mean all forms of earned income, like wages, salaries, bonuses and stock options, plus benefits, like insurance and pensions. Measured that way, employees don't look too terribly squeezed. But for most workers, increases in wages or salaries, if any, have been steadily eroded by inflation while health insurance, if any, costs more and covers less.

Wage Debate Pits Workers Vs. Businesses (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 13, 2006

DENVER — The 11 workers at Jim Noon's company, which makes cardboard boxes and packaging, earn well above the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour. Even so, the Denver businessman opposes — "for all sorts of reasons" — a Colorado ballot measure that would raise the state's minimum hourly wage to $6.85.

Noon says the initiative to amend the state constitution would exert pressure to increase all salaries and signal the state is not business-friendly. On a philosophical level, he says, "the state constitution shouldn't have dollar figures; it should have concepts."

In the western part of the state, in Delta, Traci Woodson's support for the initiative is personal. The 26-year-old single mother of two is a home-based child care provider who works at least 95 hours a week. She is paid an average of $5.77 an hour for looking after children from 6 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. and sometimes overnight. If the measure passes, her pay would rise because the amount the state pays for her low-income clients' child care needs is pegged to the minimum wage.

"You can't make it on the minimum wage," Woodson says. In Delta, the average cost to rent a three-bedroom house is about $650 a month, and people frequently work two or three low-wage jobs, she says.

Voters in Colorado and five other states — Arizona, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio — will decide the issue in ballot measures Nov. 7 to raise the minimum wage.

Nine years after Congress last raised the federal minimum wage, "states are realizing families can't support themselves on a little under $11,000 a year," says Liana Fox, an analyst with the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank in Washington, D.C. By December, Fox says, this will be "the longest stretch without an increase since 1938, when the minimum wage was first enacted."

Nationally, about 5.6 million workers would benefit from an increase in the minimum wage; 835,000 of them are in the states with ballot initiatives, estimates the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal Washington think tank. The Labor Department says about 1.9 million people are paid the minimum wage or less but says that figure is "understated" because it includes only hourly, not salaried, workers.

The department says about half of minimum-wage workers are younger than 25, and about three-fifths work in the hospitality and leisure industries, mostly in restaurants and bars.

Backing the state campaigns to raise the minimum wage are labor unions, advocacy groups for the working poor — such as the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now and 9to5, the National Association of Working Women — and religious organizations.

"A lot of us who work in the low- and middle-income communities hear regularly from folks about the cost of housing, gas, child care and health care. And we're tired of waiting for the politicians to wake up and discover this might be an important issue," says Bill Vandenberg of the Colorado Progressive Coalition.

Opponents include chambers of commerce and associations representing hotels, restaurants and small businesses.

In Colorado, opponents argue that raising the minimum wage would cut entry-level jobs. They also say they're defending the state constitution.

Jan Rigg, a spokeswoman for Respect Colorado's Constitution, says if Colorado's minimum wage rises to $6.85, it would be among the highest in the country. She says the measure has no exceptions for small businesses or young workers, as some other states have. She also says if the state's economy falters, "we have no ability to fix it" through legislative action.

Polls in several of the states show strong support for raising the minimum wage. In Missouri, a St. Louis Post-Dispatch poll this month found 68% favored the increase. In Nevada, a survey in the Las Vegas Review-Journal last month showed 74% support. In Arizona, a poll in March showed 81% support.

"There are a lot of voters who are more motivated to get to the polls to raise the minimum wage than by any other issue," says Sara Howard, a spokeswoman for the Give Missourians a Raise campaign. The issue, she says, could help Democrats unseat Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who has not taken a position, and faces Democrat Claire McCaskill, who supports the measure.

Democrats hoping the wage initiatives could tip key congressional races by boosting turnout may be disappointed, says Paul Taylor of the Pew Research Center. He points to the 11 states in 2004 that had ballot measures against same-sex marriage, which supposedly increased GOP turnout. He says both the turnout and the percentage of votes President Bush received in those states were very close to what they were four years earlier.

Even so, there is some "tactical potential" for Democrats in the wage campaigns, Taylor says. "If races are close enough, everything matters."

Minimum Wage Laws Multiply In States (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 13, 2006

DENVER — This year's elections could be a watershed in the nearly 70-year history of the federal minimum wage: For the first time, a majority of states could require higher pay than the federal rate of $5.15 an hour.

This year, 10 states have enacted laws mandating a higher minimum than federal law requires. Twenty-three states and the District of Columbia are now above that threshold.

On Nov. 7, voters in six other states will decide ballot measures that would raise the minimum wage to as much as $6.85 an hour with automatic adjustments for inflation. Some of the states would allow lower pay at small businesses and for workers who receive tips.

Initiatives to change the base pay rate — by amending the state constitution or changing state law — will be on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio.

If they all pass, it would equal the number of minimum wage ballot measures adopted in the 14-year span ending in 2004, says Jennie Bowser, a policy analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures. “I expect to see most or all of them pass,” she says. “I imagine it's going to be a pretty popular subject.”

The battles over the minimum wage come as government figures show wages are not keeping up with inflation and amid fierce contests to control Congress.

Supporters for raising the minimum wage such as Liana Fox with the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank, say inflation has eaten away the last increase by Congress in 1997. Raising the wage from $5.15 to $6.85 an hour would boost a worker's annual pay from $10,712 to $14,248.

Opponents say the pay raise would hurt businesses such as restaurants that depend on lower-wage workers, and would be a setback for entry-level employees.

“There will be fewer jobs for teenagers and low-income workers who come in to get a skill,” says Jan Rigg, spokeswoman for Respect Colorado's Constitution, a business coalition opposing the increase. “This isn't a debate about haves and have-nots, it's about what we all want: a good workforce.”

All six states with minimum wage increases on the ballot are major election battlegrounds this fall. Montana, Ohio and Missouri have Senate contests rated as tossups by The Cook Political Report. Arizona, Ohio, Colorado and Nevada have competitive governors' contests. Arizona, Colorado and Ohio have some of the most closely watched House elections in the country.

Brookings Institution scholar Matt Fellowes says Democrats hope the wage initiatives will draw more of their voters to the polls and underscore “that under Republicans, financial insecurity has increased.”

The minimum wage measures also reflect frustration with Washington and state legislatures that have failed to approve raises, Fellowes says. Republicans control Congress and one or both legislative branches in four of the six states with ballot measures this fall.

In July, the House approved a GOP-led effort to tie a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage to a permanent cut in the estate tax and other tax breaks. Senate Democrats blocked the measure. In June, the Senate defeated a Democratic effort to raise the wage to $7.25.

Chafee Beats Back Senate Challenger In Rhode Island (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rhode Island Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee beat back a very tough primary challenge from Cranston, R.I., Mayor Steve Laffey to run for re-election, an outcome national Republican Party officials believe will give them the best chance of holding the seat in midterm elections.

Mr. Chafee's victory was substantially aided by a roughly $1 million infusion of cash from Washington Republican Party committees to run ads and flood mailboxes with fliers criticizing Mr. Laffey, a tough-talking social conservative. It is a strategy of lavish spending Republicans used earlier this year to hold onto to the House seat of California Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who pleaded guilty to bribery. That race cost the national party $5 million.

But it remains unclear if the Republicans can spend that kind of cash to defend a growing list of contested incumbent elections in the general election. In Rhode Island, the two candidates spent more than $2 million apiece, and the race, while not the most expensive, is considered one of the Ocean State's most negative and bitter contests.

Mr. Chafee, 53 years old, was appointed to the Senate in 1999 after his father, Sen. John Chafee, died in office. He won election the following year and quickly staked out a fiercely independent profile. He voted against the Iraq war, many of the White House tax cuts and publicly admitted he didn't vote to re-elect President Bush, writing in a vote for the president's father, former President George H.W. Bush, instead. While his positions frustrated his party, most analysts believed they reflected the state's electorate and made him the only Republican likely to hold the seat.

Mr. Laffey, 44, a former investment banker, had tapped into that anger to rally the party's core conservatives to his campaign. He was supported by the conservative Club for Growth, a Washington-based antitax group that funneled more than a half-million to his campaign. He conceded the race with roughly 70% of the voting reported and trailing 54% to 46%.

The Rhode Island seat isn't safe yet for Republicans, though. Early polls have shown a close race between Mr. Chafee and Democratic nominee Sheldon Whitehouse, a popular former attorney general who is flush with cash.

R.I.'s Chafee Fends Off GOP Challenger (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, beat back a tough primary challenge Tuesday from conservative Stephen Laffey.

Chafee had been imperiled by the same forces that cost three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman the Democratic nomination in neighboring Connecticut last month. Lieberman, one of the Senate's most conservative Democrats, lost to anti-war candidate Ned Lamont and is now running as an independent.

Chafee used his maverick record to appeal to independent voters, who are allowed to vote in the Rhode Island primary.

"The message is that Rhode Island is still a more liberal Republican Party than the Republican Party nationally," says Victor Profughi, a retired political science professor at Rhode Island College. "And it means we'll have a competitive race in Rhode Island" for the Senate in November.

He said Chafee's stiff challenge reflected anti-incumbent sentiment and a push by Democratic and Republican activists to draw sharper partisan lines this year.

At a victory party, Chafee thanked "Republicans, independents and disaffiliated Democrats" for supporting him. "Strict party discipline must not prevail over the spirit of compromise that is so essential to our American democracy," he declared to cheers.

Chafee's battles aren't over: He now faces former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination.

The race is rated a toss-up, and Democrats have targeted it as one of the six Republican-held seats they need to pick up to win Senate control.

Backed by the anti-tax Club for Growth, Laffey, the mayor of Cranston, attacked Chafee for voting against tax cuts and in favor of spending projects that Laffey labeled pork. Chafee also has riled some Republicans by opposing the Iraq war and the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito.

Still, Chafee benefited from what political scientist Darrell West of Brown University calls "a golden name" in Rhode Island: Chafee's late father, John, served as governor and senator.

Moderate GOP Senator Beats Conservative Challenger In R.I. (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Zachary A. Goldfarb
The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I., Sept. 12 -- Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee, a moderate who has frequently clashed with the Bush administration, beat back a strong conservative challenger Tuesday night in the GOP primary in Rhode Island.

The victory came amid heavy turnout, after the same Republican establishment that Chafee has so often defied rallied to his side with money and logistical support for a vigorous get-out-the-vote effort. While there is little personal affection for Chafee at the White House, operatives there and in the Republican Party leadership calculated that he is the GOP's best chance of holding the seat in a Democratic-leaning state in November.

The Chafee win represented a rare bit of political good news for Republicans, who are struggling to retain control of both houses of Congress in a highly volatile election year, as polls showing voters to be increasingly frustrated with GOP leadership. President Bush's dismal approval ratings, fueled in large part by public frustration with the war in Iraq, threatens Republican incumbents around the country who are on the ballot this year.

Stephen Laffey, the blustery, populist mayor of Cranston, had sought to become the second challenger to topple a senator in a primary this year, after Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman's loss to Ned Lamont in Connecticut's Democratic primary last month. In the end, however, a race that for weeks had been widely viewed as neck and neck fell decisively in line for Chafee, who was commanding 54 percent of the vote with 99 percent of returns counted.

Chafee's hurdles are hardly over. Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, who like Chafee is a well-known Rhode Island political figure, also secured his party's nomination Tuesday night over negligible opposition. Whitehouse was not a top choice of Democratic Party recruiters,but has led Chafee in recent polls.

Although Chafee escaped the Laffey threat, Democrats believe he compromised his general election chances by waging a negative campaign marked by pointed attack ads and by accepting such high-profile Republican Party help. The senator himself expressed regret last week that the tone of the campagn had turned nasty. But, he pointed out, "negative ads do work."

But they also clash with his low-key, almost diffident personal style and expressed loathing of glovers-off partisanship. "When Lincoln Chafee -- an incumbent Republican senator -- can barely win his own primary, you know he'll have trouble in the general election," said Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Senate Democrats' campaign committee.

National GOP officials feared that if Chafee lost, Democrats would almost certainly win the Senate seat in November, one of six they must pick up to reclaim control of the chamber. National Republican officials who are backing Chafee announced last week that they would pull their resources out of Rhode Island should Laffey prevail, effectively conceding the election to Democrats.

"This is my 10th run for office . . . and I've never had one like this," said Chafee, the son of the late senator John H. Chafee and a former Warwick mayor and City Council member. He said the vote was an endorsement of the "spirit of compromise" that he has tried to uphold. Then he reminded supporters that a whole new battle is beginning. "It will take everything we've got," Chafee said.

Rhode Island was one of nine states that held primaries Tuesday, the last big day of party battles before the November elections. The GOP faced a similar intraparty conflict in Arizona in the contest to succeed retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R), a longtime member of the House Appropriations Committee. Republicans chose between Randy Graf, a conservative firebrand running hard against illegal immigration, and state Rep. Steve Huffman, a moderate who was backed by Kolbe and the national party.

In New Hampshire, Democrats who oppose the Iraq war showed their strength again, just as they had in the Lieberman-Lamont election. In the 1st Congressional District, Carol Shea-Porter stressed antiwar themes in her upset victory over party-backed Jim Craig in the contest to take on Rep. Jeb Bradley (R).

Meanwhile, Arizona state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords and former Tucson anchorwoman Patty Weiss battled for the Democratic nomination. Democratic officials say they are confident that if Graf wins the GOP primary, either Giffords or Weiss could beat him in November in the race for the swing seat.

But the contest in Rhode Island has the most potential to change the political map. With control of the Senate seat at stake, the national Republican Party recently began a series of television commercials and mobilized its get-out-the-vote effort in a bid to save Chafee from defeat. The maverick senator has opposed President Bush on many issues and voted against the president in 2004.

But the national party rallied behind Chafee, nonetheless, convinced that Laffey was too conservative to win in the heavily Democratic state. A huge final-hour turnout effort appeared to have paid off, with over 63,000 ballots cast, by far a state record for a GOP primary.

In contrast to Chafee's patrician and somewhat diffident style, Laffey was assertive and hard-charging, and he proved highly effective on the campaign trail. He argued that Chafee's independence from the GOP has made him almost irrelevant and that his unpredictable voting patterns suggest a political identity crisis.

The race turned ugly in the final days, with accusations of dirty tricks, and the harshest attacks aimed at Laffey. The intense atmosphere was highly unusual in a state that barely rates on the national political radar. Voters reported receiving a dozen pieces of mail in one day and their phones ringing 15 times in 10 minutes, all political pitches.

Laffey's strong campaign suggested a worrisome trend to Republicans about their base supporters: that intolerance for moderates had grown so intense that they were willing to sacrifice a Senate seat -- and possibly control of the Senate -- to punish unreliable politicians.

The mayor's core supporters were Republicans who disliked Chafee's moderate views, but he also also appealed to middle-class independent voters who are uneasy about Congress's inattention to issues they care about, such as education and health care. Those voters think only an outsider can shake up Washington, and in Laffey's case, they were willing to overlook ideological differences.

"I ran as a reformer," Laffey told supporters Tuesday night, conceding the race and endorsing Chafee. "We take ideas any day."

Meanwhile, in Minnesota, Democrats chose state Rep. Keith Ellison from a field of four main candidates for a Minneapolis House seat being vacated by retiring Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D). In a heavily Democratic district, he is on track to become the first Muslim to serve in Congress.

In New York, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) was nominated for a second term, while Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer won victory as the Democratic nominee for governor.

In a majority-black district in Brooklyn, City Council member David Yassky, the only white candidate in a four-way contest that raised racial tensions, lost to Yvette Clarke in the Democratic primary to replace retiring Rep. Major R. Owens.

In Setback For Democrats, Incumbent Wins Republican Senate Primary (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island won the Republican primary there on Tuesday, fending off a bid from a populist challenger that the national Republican Party had feared would cost it a seat it had held since 1976 in an overwhelmingly Democratic state.

The race was the most closely watched contest in the nine primaries across the country on Tuesday, in a year when Democrats are hoping to capitalize on anti-incumbent sentiment to take control of one or both houses of Congress.

Mr. Chafee's victory, with 53 percent of the vote, dealt the Democrats a big setback in their bid for control of the Senate. The state is crucial to their goal of winning six seats. Polls had shown Mr. Chafee's challenger, Stephen Laffey, running far behind Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination on Tuesday, and the national Republican Party said it would cede hopes of keeping the seat if Mr. Laffey won.

Mr. Chafee's nomination keeps the race alive until November, with polls showing him and Mr. Whitehouse running even, and guarantees that the national parties will continue to pour money into what has already been a nasty and expensive contest.

Mr. Chafee, the most famously liberal Republican in the Senate and a scion of one of the state's "five families," told supporters gathered at the Biltmore Hotel in Providence that his victory had been a groundswell of "diehard Republicans, independents, and disaffiliated Democrats," who "united behind the cause of honest, independent leadership." He spoke of Republicans' "proud history" in New England.

"Our goal has always been to find the common ground for the common good," he said. "Polarization, partisanship and strict party discipline must not prevail over the spirit of compromise that is so essential to our American democracy."

National Republican organizations spent vast amounts of money on either side, with antitax groups deriding Mr. Chafee as a "Republican in name only" and the National Republican Senatorial Committee overlooking his rejection of much of the party's agenda to campaign fiercely on his behalf. The committee started running pro-Chafee advertisements nearly a year ago, and spent $750,000 on his behalf in the last month alone.

Senator Elizabeth Dole, the committee's chairwoman, congratulated him in a statement for a "hard-earned victory," and added, "Senator Chafee's independent, honest leadership drove a historic turnout and clearly shows he is in a great position to win in November."

More than 63,000 votes were cast, far outpacing the previous record of about 45,000 votes in a Republican primary in Rhode Island.

Democrats were in no mood to give up the fight.

"When Lincoln Chafee, an incumbent Republican senator, can barely win his own primary, you know he'll have trouble in the general election," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is leading the Democrats' effort to win the Senate. "Rhode Islanders, more than voters in any other state, know we need a new direction and real change in this country, which is why Sheldon Whitehouse will be the next U.S. senator from Rhode Island."

Mr. Laffey, who campaigned door to door across the state in a recreational vehicle with his wife and five children in tow, even as the national Republicans ridiculed him, conceded shortly before 11 p.m., saying he would vote for Mr. Chafee in November. "The voters have spoken," he said, and added, with a nod to his family and the citizens of Cranston who elected him mayor, "A lot of things have worked out very well. This election didn't."

In the District of Columbia, Adrian M. Fenty, a City Council member, defeated Linda W. Cropp, the Council's longtime chairwoman, with 57 percent in the Democratic mayoral primary, making him the presumptive mayor in the heavily Democratic city.

In Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, easily won the Republican nomination in the contest to replace Senator Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat who is retiring after 30 years.

Mr. Steele, a rising star in the party who would be the first black Republican in the Senate if elected, declared victory in the primary at his campaign headquarters in Greenbelt shortly after 10 p.m. He will face either Representative Benjamin L. Cardin or Kweisi Mfume, the former head of the N.A.A.C.P., who led 16 other Democratic candidates.

The results in Maryland were coming in slowly after election problems early in the day. Some polls opened late, and voters were turned away at others.

A Circuit Court judge in Montgomery County ordered that polls be kept open an hour later, until 9 p.m., as did one in Baltimore, after a lawsuit filed by the Maryland Democratic Party and the N.A.A.C.P.

In Minnesota, Keith Ellison, a state legislator, won the Democratic Congressional nomination in the heavily Democratic Fifth District, defeating three rivals to put him on a path to become the first Muslim member of Congress.

Chafee Wins In Pivotal R.I. Race (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Sen. Lincoln Chafee, with the backing of the national Republican Party, last night secured a solid victory over conservative Republican challenger Stephen Laffey in the most closely watched race on a night when nine states and the District held primaries.

With 99 percent of precincts reporting, the liberal Mr. Chafee had 34,042 votes, or 54 percent, to 29,431 votes (46 percent) for Mr. Laffey, the Cranston mayor who was backed by the free-market advocacy group Club for Growth.

"To the voters of Rhode Island, thank you," Mr. Chafee told a screaming crowd of supporters at the Biltmore Hotel in Providence. He said the victory was a validation of independent-minded Rhode Island and an endorsement of leaders who have the "guts" to take difficult votes and work across the aisle.

Mr. Chafee's Democratic challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse, got 82 percent of the vote against two other candidates in the Democratic primary.

Elsewhere, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton easily beat anti-war challenger Jonathan Tasini in that state's Democratic primary, clearing the way for a November matchup against Republican underdog John Spencer, the former mayor of Yonkers.

In Vermont, independent Rep. Bernard Sanders won the Democratic nomination for the Senate seat of retiring Sen. James M. Jeffords, while businessman Richard Tarrant took an early lead in the Republican Senate primary.

In Arizona, four Republicans, including Don Goldwater, nephew of the late Barry Goldwater, competed for the nomination to challenge Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano. In Minnesota, Democratic state Rep. Keith Ellison was leading in his race for an open House seat that would make him the first Muslim in Congress.

The battle between Mr. Chafee and Mr. Laffey was in the spotlight yesterday because national Republicans said it was key to their party's hope of maintaining its Senate majority. They insisted that Mr. Chafee, who has bucked his party on issues such as tax cuts and abortion, has the only shot in this left-leaning state to beat a Democratic challenge and win the general election in November.

National Republicans ran ads, sent volunteers and gave resources to help Mr. Chafee win.

But Republicans in Rhode Island were split. Mr. Chafee faced a notable challenge from Mr. Laffey, who is pro-life, pledged to cut taxes and won the support of the Club For Growth. The national group spent $500,000 in Rhode Island and ran ads bashing Mr. Chafee as a tax-and-spend liberal.

The bitter primary here highlighted an ideological fight within the Republican Party, which played out along the same lines in an Arizona primary to fill the House seat left open by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe. Local Republicans were angered when the national party intervened to support state Rep. Steve Huffman, a moderate who in a recent poll was trailing a former state lawmaker, Randy Graf, who is focused on halting illegal immigration.

The Republican infighting has been compared to the test Democrats faced in Connecticut last month, when they ousted Joe Lieberman in favor of a more liberal Democrat who they felt was more in line with their party's values.

Likewise, some Rhode Island Republicans are tired of Mr. Chafee's left-leaning tendencies.

"Chafee, to me, is a Democrat in a Republican jacket," said 37-year-old Michael Camardo of Cranston, who supported Mr. Laffey. Mr. Camardo said Mr. Chafee probably has a better chance of winning in November, but added, "I have to vote my conscience."

But Mr. Chafee, known for his maverick stands against President Bush and his party, retains support in this Democratic state where most voters register as independent -- known locally as "unaffiliated."

"I like his independence," Barbara Brogan, 74, of Cranston, said of Mr. Chafee yesterday, after she voted for him at the Daniel D. Waterman Elementary School.

Club for Growth President Pat Toomey said that regardless of the outcome, the close primary contest showed that "voters still care about pocketbook issues like lower taxes, lower spending and less government waste." The strength of Mr. Laffey's challenge "shows that the power of our ideas will be an influential factor in this election cycle."

Mr. Chafee still faces a tough challenge in November, with polls showing a close race between him and Mr. Whitehouse.

Voters In Nine States Pick Candidates For November (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Voters from Arizona to Vermont cast ballots in hard-fought primary battles on Tuesday, soundly renominating New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and effectively choosing Adrian Fenty as mayor of the nation's capital.

On the busiest primary day of the year, Rep. Ben Cardin was leading former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic Senate nomination in Maryland. The winner will face Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the Republican Party's best hope for electing an African-American to major statewide office this year.

Voting glitches in Baltimore and Montgomery County, Maryland's largest voting jurisdiction, prompted Circuit Court judges to order polls there to stay open for an extra hour, until 9 p.m.

In Montgomery County, a Washington suburb, election officials had failed to deliver computer cards to start electronic voting machines when polls opened at 7 a.m., forcing some voters to use paper ballots. In Baltimore, some election judges failed to show up on time.

In Arizona, conservative Republican Randy Graf, a former state legislator and pro golfer, was tapping voter concern about illegal immigration in a race against state Rep. Steve Huffman, a moderate Republican backed by party leaders for a tossup House district that stretches from Tucson to the Mexican border.

Meanwhile, a Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday had good news for Democrats hoping to pick up the 15 seats they need to regain control of the House. By 53%-41%, registered voters in a generic ballot test — that is, one without candidates' names — said they were inclined to support the Democratic candidate in their district over the Republican.

The Democratic advantage on the question was 6 percentage points in January and surged as high as 15 points in the spring. Three weeks ago, it had narrowed to 2 points. That survey was taken in the wake of arrests in London of suspects accused of planning to blow up American airliners.

"This election cycle was defined six months ago and nothing has really changed it," said Chuck Todd of the online political newsletter Hotline.

"The only question is whether it's going to be a good year or a great one to be a Democrat."

Democrats are more energized: By 47%-42%, they said they were more enthusiastic about voting in November than usual. By 47%-40%, Republicans said they were less enthusiastic.

The telephone survey of 1,002 adults has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points. The subsample of 925 registered voters has an error margin of +/-4 points.

The race that got the most national attention Tuesday was the Republican primary in Democratic Rhode Island, where Sen. Lincoln Chafee beat back a challenge from Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey.

Among contests in eight other states — Arizona, Delaware, Maryland, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York, Vermont and Wisconsin — and the District of Columbia:

·In D.C., Fenty decisively defeated City Council Chairwoman Linda Cropp for the Democratic bid for mayor. His victory in the overwhelmingly Democratic city all but guarantees election in November.

·In Minnesota, state Rep. Keith Ellison was leading former state Democratic-Farmer-Labor party chairman Mike Erlandson in a battle for the Democratic nomination for a House seat in Minneapolis and its suburbs. If nominated and elected, Ellison would be the first Muslim in Congress.

·In New York, in a battle for a Brooklyn House seat that spotlighted racial divisions, New York City Councilwoman Yvette Clarke and City Councilman David Yassky were leading. Yassky was seeking to become the first white representative from the district since political pioneer Shirley Chisholm won it four decades ago. The other contenders included Chris Owens, who hoped to succeed his father, Major Owens.

·Also in New York, Clinton swept more than eight in 10 votes, trouncing anti-war challenger Jonathan Tasini. Ex-Yonkers mayor John Spencer won the GOP nomination to face her.

Spitzer And Cuomo Win In N.Y. Primary (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer won the Democratic nomination for New York governor tonight, with his party hoping he will lead it to a potentially historic moment this November: a sweep of top statewide offices.

Andrew M. Cuomo won the Democratic nomination for attorney general, and Senator Hillary Clinton won renomination for a second term in the Senate. In the day's most closely contested major race, Yvette D. Clarke won the primary for a Congressional seat in Brooklyn.

The election in New York was one of nine primaries around the nation. In Rhode Island, Lincoln Chafee, the Senate's most famously liberal Republican, held off a conservative challenger, Stephen Laffey, in a nasty contest fueled by huge amounts of money from national Republican groups on both sides. With 83 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Mr. Chafee had 54.4 percent of the vote to Mr. Laffey's 45.6 percent, and Mr. Laffey conceded defeat.

Mr. Spitzer's battle ended with a concession speech by his opponent, Nassau County Executive Thomas R. Suozzi, who said he would support Mr. Spitzer's fall campaign. Mr. Spitzer had 81 percent of the vote, while Mr. Suozzi had 19 percent, with 95 percent of the precincts reporting.

Mr. Cuomo won 52.8 percent of the votes in his contest against a fixture of New York City politics, Mark Green, who had 32.5 percent of the vote with 96 percent of the precincts reporting. Sean Moloney had 9.5 percent of the votes, and Charles King received 5.1 percent.

The Cuomo-Green race was among the most bitter of the year: Mr. Green, a former city public advocate and candidate for mayor in 2001, ran television ads excoriating Mr. Cuomo's ethics, while Mr. Cuomo aggressively sought the restoration of his family's political dynasty — in decline after his father, Mario M. Cuomo, the state's last Democratic governor, lost in 1994, and Mr. Cuomo lost his own bid for governor in 2002.

Mrs. Clinton's contest carried broad significance as well. By showing strength among a relatively liberal, antiwar primary electorate, she demonstrated that her vote for military action in Iraq in 2002 did not damage her political standing as it did with Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, who lost his bid for a third re-nomination last month to an antiwar challenger, Ned Lamont.

Her little-known opponent in the New York race, a union organizer named Jonathan Tasini, tried to tap into antiwar sentiments in New York, yet he had little money and did not effectively turn the race into a message-sending moment about Iraq. With 95 percent of the precincts reporting, Mrs. Clinton had 83.2 percent of the votes and Mr. Tasini had 16.8 percent.

In the Republican race to challenge Mrs. Clinton this fall, John Spencer, a conservative former Yonkers mayor, defeated a former Reagan administration aide, Kathleen Troia McFarland, a moderate. Mr. Spencer had 60.3 percent of the votes to 39.7 percent for Ms. McFarland with 95 percent of precincts reporting. The Republican candidates for governor and attorney general, John Faso and Jeanine F. Pirro, did not face primary contests.

With a degree of unity, endorsements and money that they have rarely enjoyed before, New York Democrats appeared positioned to become an exceptionally dominant party in the state. They have never held the top statewide offices and both Senate seats in modern history; indeed, Republicans came closer during the Rockefeller era in the 1970's, when Jacob K. Javits and James L. Buckley were senators and Louis J. Lefkowitz was attorney general. (Only State Comptroller Arthur Levitt was a Democrat.)

The last time one party controlled the statewide offices and both Senate seats was 1949 — all Republicans.

Democrats have been growing in number faster than Republicans since 2000, adding 530,000 for a total of 5.5 million party members, compared with 54,000 more Republicans for a total of 3.1 million. Yet a Democrat has not held the governor's office since 1994 and the New York City mayor's office since 1993.

Mr. Spitzer has proved exceptionally popular for his prosecutions of white-collar crime, and his running mate, State Senator David A. Paterson, and Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi are also well-regarded. Mrs. Clinton and the state's senior senator, Charles E. Schumer, have high approval ratings.

Turnout appeared relatively light across the state, with Mr. Green and Mr. Cuomo hanging on whether Democrats would turn out to vote in closely fought races in Queens and Brooklyn — and cast ballots in the attorney general's race as well. In one mistake, roughly 200,000 New York voters who had recently moved were given the wrong information about where they could vote, according to officials at the city's Board of Elections.

Mr. Green, who has also run for United States Senate twice before, has not said if a loss will end his quest for elective office. At 61, he has said only that he will continue to teach and write if he loses, yet has not ruled out running again.

He had hoped to overcome Mr. Cuomo's financial and labor advantages by leveraging newspaper endorsements, including one from The New York Times, and riding relatively high turnout in a Brooklyn race. That four-person contest for a historically black Congressional seat in Brooklyn was won by one of three black candidates, Ms. Clarke. She and a white candidate, David Yassky, both members of the City Council, had been favored in polls in recent days. With 93 percent of the precincts reporting, Ms. Clarke had 30 percent of the votes and Mr. Yassky had 27 percent. Carl Andrews had 22 percent, and Chris Owens had 20 percent.

The Republican candidate for governor, Mr. Faso, a former State Assembly leader, spent the day campaigning in Plattsburgh and courting donors, as well as trying to dampen the glow of the Spitzer victory in the coming news media coverage.

"I know what the conventional wisdom says, and I know there's a desire on the part of some to cancel the general election and just coronate Mr. Spitzer," Mr. Faso said in a phone interview.

"But I think when people figure out that he has pursued a lot of dubious cases as A.G., at the expense of the public interest, and at the expense of going after Medicaid fraud, and when they realize his agenda will mean much higher taxes for New Yorkers, I don't think they'll vote for them," Mr. Faso said.

Mr. Spitzer, his advisers noted, has repeatedly said he has no plans to raise taxes. The Democratic candidate has made billions of dollars in spending promises during this campaign, however, and his advisers said that Mr. Spitzer would continue offering details this fall to show how he would pay for his proposals.

Mr. Spitzer plans to continue his television ad campaign for at least another week, though he has no new commercials yet for the general election. He had about $12 million on hand at the start of September. He is not re-calibrating his political message for the general election, his advisers say; he will focus this fall on delivering more policy speeches, preparing for his two debates against Mr. Faso in Ithaca and Buffalo, and wrapping up his work as attorney general for the last eight years.

Mr. Faso said he was planning an aggressive campaign strategy centered on two themes: Cutting taxes and criticizing Mr. Spitzer's performance in office, which has been criticized by some Wall Street executives and legal analysts — as well as Mr. Suozzi — as coercive and destructively anti-business.

Yet Mr. Faso also acknowledged that he is not nearly as well known as Mr. Spitzer, and he may face the same problems as Mr. Suozzi in spreading his message and raising his profile.

Mr. Suozzi spent more than $8 million this year and never moved in the opinion polls. Mr. Faso has struggled to raise money, and reported having only $1.5 million on hand in his last campaign finance report, in July. He has not been able to afford to buy television time since his starting announcement on Valentine's Day; Republicans close to Mr. Faso said he may start broadcasting ads as early as next week.

Spitzer advisers declined to say if they would expend some of their new political capital on Democratic allies in tight Congressional and State Senate races. Democrats need to win five seats to take control of the State Senate, which would make governing far easier for Mr. Spitzer if he won.

But the Spitzer camp also does not want to become bogged down and perhaps tainted by losses at the hands of the Republican Senate leaders, who are the one faction in the state party that still has significant stature. Mr. Pataki is leaving office after three terms with relatively poor approval ratings, and he has been increasingly preoccupied with exploring whether to run for president in 2008.

Travels With Eliot (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

The following story didn't get much play outside the pages of the feisty New York Sun. But a recent episode involving New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a gambling mogul with business before the state and use of the latter's Gulfstream jet for political campaigning is revealing.

Yesterday Mr. Spitzer won the Democratic nomination for Governor in a rout, and on the campaign trail he's spent a lot of time talking about ending "the pay-to-play culture in Albany by making it against the law for those who do business with the state to give gifts to state employees or to donate to candidates for state office." But it turns out that the Spitzer campaign hasn't been practicing what it preaches.

Mr. Spitzer has accepted discounted rides to fund-raisers nationwide on the private jet of Richard Fields, a casino developer whose companies have donated $200,000 to Mr. Spitzer's campaign. Mr. Fields represents a Wisconsin Indian tribe attempting to win approval to build a casino in New York's Catskills region. The tribe has sued New York state to reclaim what it says are ancestral lands. As AG, Mr. Spitzer represents the state. Mr. Fields is also part of a group bidding to operate thoroughbred racing at New York's Aqueduct, Saratoga and Belmont race tracks. The next Governor will likely play a major role in the outcome of both matters.

The Spitzer camp initially side-stepped the obvious conflict-of-interest questions by insisting that it "has followed the letter of the law when it comes to reimbursement for air travel." And it's true that under federal regulations, which the Spitzer campaign says it followed, the AG is required to reimburse Mr. Fields for the equivalent of a first-class plane ticket, even if that amount represents a fraction of the actual cost of chartering a jet.

This "letter of the law" line is nonetheless rich coming from Sheriff Spitzer, who's spent the past half-decade patrolling private business for similar behavior and rejecting letter-of-the-law defenses from his targets. As the Sun noted in a recent editorial, "General Spitzer has zealously pursued all sorts of alleged conflicts of interest, from investment advisers and stock analysts to insurance brokers to Richard Grasso's compensation as head of the New York Stock Exchange."

Mr. Spitzer remains the favorite in November. But under pressure from his GOP rival, John Faso, he recently decided to pay "all the costs" when chartering flights in the future. That's very big of Mr. Spitzer, but the whole episode calls into question the sincerity of his calls for reform in Albany. Campaign speeches notwithstanding, his behavior suggests that a vote for Mr. Spitzer is a vote for the status quo.

Cardin Leads In Maryland's Senate Race (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin last night was leading the Democratic nomination for a U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, topping former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume in a widely watched contest in which race was a key issue.

With 49 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Mr. Cardin had 46 percent of the vote, and Mr. Mfume had 37 percent. A total of 18 Democratic candidates were vying to succeed Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat who is retiring.

DOJ_NMG_0062487

In November's general election, Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman, would face Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who easily bested nine rivals for the Republican nomination. Mr. Steele received about 85 percent in the Republican primary.

When early results showed Mr. Cardin leading Mr. Mfume, cheers and applause erupted from the roughly 300 people at Mr. Cardin's planned victory party at a ballroom in the Wyndham Baltimore hotel.

The results scrolled across three large projection TV screens above the stage where Mr. Cardin was expected to deliver his victory speech late last night.

Among the revelers were state Democratic Party leaders, including House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer and Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger.

Also in the crowd was the Rev. Jeff P. Williams, a black Miami minister who organizes get-out-the-vote drives for the national Democratic Party aimed at black religious communities.

The Mfume rally was lightly attended, with only about 100 people in a largely empty ballroom at the France-Merrick Performing Arts Center in Baltimore.

Mr. Mfume had not taken the stage by 10:40 p.m.

The mood was somber, with one of Mr. Mfume's top strategists' admitting that he thought the candidate would lose.

But Mfume campaign spokesman Mark Clack remained optimistic.

"We're feeling very good. We weren't expected to be here," Mr. Clack said. "We've proved ourselves to be a pretty resourceful and resilient campaign."

In other statewide contests, Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler was leading in the Democratic primary for attorney general, topping Baltimore lawyer Stuart O. Simms.

Mr. Gansler had 55 percent of the vote, and Mr. Simms had 43 percent. They were competing to succeed Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., a Democrat who is retiring.

In November, Mr. Gansler would square off against Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle, who ran unopposed for the Republican nomination.

Meanwhile, Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens was leading in the Democratic primary for comptroller, besting the incumbent -- William Donald Schaefer -- in a contest marked by personal gibes and stinging remarks by both candidates.

Mrs. Owens had 42 percent of the vote, and Mr. Schaefer had 32 percent. Delegate Peter Franchot of Montgomery County also had 32 percent.

Mr. Schaefer called Mrs. Owens "Mother Hubbard" and "little prissy miss," and she said Mr. Schaefer, 84, was "too old" for the job.

Mrs. Owens, 62, likely will face former Montgomery County Council member Stephen N. Abrams or Anne M. McCarthy, dean of the University of Baltimore Merrick School of Business, who were competing for the Republican nomination.

Mrs. McCarthy had about 44 percent and Mr. Abrams had about 36 percent in early results.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and his running mate, Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, were unopposed in the Democratic primary for governor and lieutenant governor. They will face Republican nominees Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and his running mate, state Disabilities Secretary Kristen Cox in November.

Many voters in Montgomery County and in Baltimore were delayed -- and even turned away -- because some election officials did not show up on time to open polls and others forgot to provide voter-access cards for the electronic voting machines that were used statewide for the first time yesterday.

"This might not be over tonight," said a state Democratic Party official who asked not to be named. "It seems like whenever voters can't vote, the election is affected."

Elections officials in Montgomery County and Baltimore petitioned the circuit courts to keep the polls open an extra hour last night.

Polls closed at 8 p.m. statewide, and complete results were not available by press time.

The U.S. Senate contest between Mr. Steele and Mr. Cardin will be one of the most closely watched races in the country.

A rising star among Republicans, Mr. Steele was recruited to run by the national Republican Party. He is the party's first truly competitive Senate candidate in Maryland in a quarter century, largely because of his potential to win votes from blacks who are usually loyal to the Democratic Party.

Two operatives for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee were fired last year after they illegally obtained Mr. Steele's credit report. One of the operatives pleaded guilty in federal court to a misdemeanor charge of computer fraud stemming from the credit-report scandal.

The national Democratic and Republican parties say that they will put vast amounts of cash and other resources into the Maryland Senate campaigns.

Race was a factor in the primary contest and promises to become an even more potent element in the general election.

For nearly a year, Mr. Mfume, who is black, has complained of Maryland's "old-line party bosses" discouraging his fundraising and trying to "coronate" Mr. Cardin, who is white, as the nominee.

Maryland's top Democrats, including Mr. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., who are white, have supported Mr. Cardin.

Even the party's black leaders were slow to get behind Mr. Mfume's campaign. U.S. Reps. Albert R. Wynn and Elijah E. Cummings, both Maryland Democrats, did not endorse him until late last month.

Blacks make up the Democratic Party's most loyal voting bloc, and black leaders say the dismissive treatment of Mr. Mfume has embittered their constituents and may drive them to support Mr. Steele.

Cardin Far Ahead In Senate Primary; Leggett Has Big Lead In Montgomery (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And John Wagner

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Maryland's Democratic primary voters gave Baltimore Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin a commanding lead over former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume last night in the race to be the party's candidate for U.S. Senate, but chaos at polling sites delayed final results for that and other key races.

In Montgomery County, Isiah "Ike" Leggett maintained a strong lead over Steven A. Silverman to become the party's nominee for county executive, even though hundreds, possibly thousands, of provisional ballots sat uncounted at election headquarters in Rockville.

And Montgomery State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler defeated Baltimore lawyer Stuart O. Simms to be the party's nominee for attorney general.

As returns trickled in, they showed a surprisingly close contest for Prince George's county executive, with incumbent Jack B. Johnson holding a slight lead over former state delegate Rushern L. Baker III with half of the votes counted. Johnson declared victory about 1 a.m., but Baker told supporters that he wasn't ready to concede.

Also tight was a race that became a referendum on the patriarch of Maryland politics, William Donald Schaefer, the 84-year-old comptroller and former governor, who was on the verge of seeing his five-decade career come to an abrupt end. His fate awaited returns in Montgomery, where rampant voting problems slowed a final count.

Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens and Montgomery Del. Peter Franchot both held leads over Schaefer at times yesterday. Last night, Franchot predicted the uncounted ballots in Montgomery could determine the outcome.

"It has been an exciting election day with lots of twists and turns," he said in a statement released early this morning. "This election will not be over until every vote is counted."

All morning, confusion reigned as outraged voters were turned back from voting sites in Montgomery County because an election worker failed to provide key cards needed to make the electronic voting machines functional.

The snags reportedly included voting machines with no power cords at one Baltimore precinct, provisional ballots issued only in Spanish at a Silver Spring site and poll workers who arrived hours late in Anne Arundel County. At Piney Branch Elementary School in Takoma Park, officials quickly ran out of paper ballots and began telling voters to use scraps of paper. The impediments to voting prompted legal challenges and resulted in court orders to extend voting by an hour in Montgomery County and Baltimore.

Those votes, as with many cast while machines were down, were recorded on provisional paper ballots that won't be counted until Monday. While Republicans had only a handful of contested races, Democrats who reached working voting machines encountered a primary ballot that included a new generation of candidates.

Veteran Democrat Rep. Albert R. Wynn faced a spirited challenge from Donna Edwards but maintained a solid lead. Reps. Chris Van Hollen and Steny H. Hoyer easily won their nominations.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and his Democratic competitor, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, ran unopposed yesterday -- the first time in years that neither party's nomination for governor was contested. Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) pulled out of the race in June.

With questions swirling about disruptions to voting, Ehrlich appeared at a Prince George's County church wearing a white polo shirt with "Ehrlich for Governor" stitched on the front and immediately pointed the finger at Democrats. He said the party's aggressive pursuit of changes to the state elections apparatus left local officials befuddled.

He refused to accept an apology from Nancy Dacek, the former Montgomery County Council member he appointed to the county's top local elections post. Democrats fired back. House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) said if the governor "wants to blame somebody for this, he should look in the mirror."

State Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), who had no primary challenge, compared the elections official who forgot to include the electronic voting cards to "someone going to work with no pants on."

"It's a hideous mess," Frosh said.

Cardin and Mfume supporters hunkered down at locations four blocks apart in downtown Baltimore all evening. Shortly after midnight, Mfume briefly appeared before a crowd of supporters to say the race wasn't over. Mfume political adviser Walter Ludwig said that though Cardin's lead was sizeable, the Mfume team still saw "a path to victory" because so many votes in Baltimore remained uncounted.

After a day spent darting from one polling station to another, Cardin returned to Capitol Hill in the evening to cast votes in Congress before heading to the hotel where his supporters mingled in a large ballroom dominated by a pair of projection-screen TVs.

A victory by either candidate will set up what looks to be one of the most costly and combative Senate races in Maryland in a generation. The winner will replace Paul S. Sarbanes (D), who is retiring.

From the outset, Mfume lagged far behind Cardin in raising money. Cardin had spent $3.8 million on the race as of Aug. 23, more than four times the roughly $800,000 Mfume spent, according to campaign finance reports. In the end, though, the matchup was between Cardin, a steady legislative technician with 40 years in public life, and Mfume, an electric orator who had led both the Congressional Black Caucus and the NAACP.

Now the Democratic nominee faces Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who had nominal primary opposition. Steele was pulled into the campaign by a who's who of national GOP leaders, but he has distanced himself publicly from his deep party roots, instead investing heavily in an effort to convert fence-sitting Democrats and unaffiliated voters.

Steele took the unusual step of visiting both Johnson and Baker's election night parties. After visiting Baker's hotel suite, Steele told a reporter he was there as a "Prince Georgian" and he firmly believes "you can't let the party line blur the friendship."

Steele has also hoped to capitalize on unease among some black voters about how sincerely the Democratic Party has valued their longstanding allegiance.

Four years ago, Steele became the first African American to be elected statewide in Maryland, and now he makes no secret of his strategy to peel away black votes from the Democrats.

But Johns Hopkins University political science professor Matthew Crenson said Democrats may have "ducked a big bullet" on the subject of race, because Mfume and Cardin have assiduously avoided the issue, focusing instead on the war in Iraq, the plight of the nation's uninsured and ethics reform in Washington.

When the two debated during the final days of an 18-month contest, the toughest swipe Mfume took at Cardin had to do not with race but with the special interest and lobbyist money invested in his campaign.

"The big worry of the Democrats and the big hope of the Republicans was that the [primary] campaign would become racially polarizing," Crenson said. "But it's been a fairly muted and mutually respectful campaign."

Democrats have planned a series of "unity" events for this week, and party leaders have pledged to bring Cardin and Mfume together onstage in an effort to help soothe any concerns about racial division. But the party will have to address primary results that show a ticket dominated by white men.

Unity may be tougher for those involved in some of the primary's more bitter contests, including the race for state comptroller, in which Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens and Montgomery Del. Peter Franchot both threw some hard punches at Schaefer.

Schaefer, who began his public life in 1955 on the Baltimore City Council, sought one more term. But his close ties to Ehrlich and controversial remarks on immigrants and women have not endeared him to the state's mostly liberal Democrats. Franchot focused his assault on Schaefer's unabashed praise of the Republican governor, claiming to be the only "real Democrat" in the contest. Owens emphasized Schaefer's age .

Schaefer was the only statewide official on the Democratic side who sought reelection. Gansler, the Montgomery County state's attorney, and Simms, a former Baltimore state's attorney, battled over the seat being vacated by veteran Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (Montgomery County Council member Tom Perez's name appeared on the ballot, but the state's high court ruled him ineligible to compete for the post.)

Simms had signed on to be Duncan's lieutenant governor candidate, but when Duncan left the race, Simms and others, including those who believed the Baltimore region should not be without a candidate for attorney general, encouraged him to shift his target. He drew a number of high-profile supporters, but his campaign was hindered by a lack of money and a late start.

Gansler, by contrast, has been planning his campaign for years. He has a Web site filled with proposals on combating gangs and pursuing polluters, and he has raised almost $2 million. Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle ran unopposed on the Republican side.

Two other vitriolic contests were centered in Prince George's County, where winning the nomination usually means election. Incumbents Wynn and Johnson faced aggressive challenges.

Wynn battled Edwards, who mounted a challenge from the left, accusing the seven-term incumbent of coddling business interests and knocking him for voting to support the Iraq war.

Edwards put Wynn on his heels at a caustic NAACP debate, which ended with a Wynn supporter being arrested on suspicion of striking an Edwards volunteer during a skirmish over campaign signs. Wynn campaigned as someone who could deliver projects to his district, rattling off a long list of improvements that were financed with federal aid.

Johnson, meanwhile, ran hard for a second term by emphasizing an economic boom and rising property tax revenue, which have brought added services and school construction money.

But Baker, who lost to Johnson in a five-man race four years ago, took after the incumbent, saying he ignored the county's rising crime problem and knocking a series of county contracts Johnson handed to friends and campaign supporters.

Nothing that dramatic occurred during the Montgomery county executive contest, which largely focused on the question of which candidate could be better trusted to ease traffic and check the efforts of developers.

Leggett said that he would do a better job of controlling growth and standing up to developers who have been generous to Silverman's campaign. Silverman, in turn, has cast himself as the more decisive leader and said he would be more aggressive in funding road projects and the proposed Purple Line.

Election Board Workers' Error Hinders Voting (WP)

By Christian Davenport And Miranda S. Spivack

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

The most basic of human errors threw Maryland's primary election into chaos yesterday: Someone forgot the wallet-size plastic cards needed to operate the voting machines in Montgomery County, frustrating early morning voters who lined up outside polling places and often were turned away without voting.

Courts ordered polls to remain open an extra hour in the county and in Baltimore, where at least two dozen polling places opened late, but it seemed doubtful that the extensions would resolve the confusion.

Some Montgomery County polling places didn't receive word of the order to remain open until minutes before 8 p.m., when they had been scheduled to close. Others ran short on the paper ballots that the court instructed be used during the extended hour of voting, with voters scribbling their choices on scraps of paper in Takoma Park.

"You had to laugh. It got more and more ludicrous," said Dennis Desmond, who cast his "vote" on a discarded flier handed to him by election officials after ballots ran out in Takoma Park.

He said election workers rushed to a nearby pharmacy to buy envelopes in which the makeshift ballots could be sealed.

The number of paper ballots cast won't be known until today. They will not be counted until Monday.

When all of the county's 238 polling places opened in Montgomery, the state's most populous jurisdiction, the electronic voting machines were inoperable. Many precincts handed out provisional paper ballots as soon as the precinct doors opened at 7 a.m., but at some polls those ballots ran out, and at others election officials didn't know that paper ballots were an option. They just told people to come back later.

Although the cards necessary to activate most of the voting machines arrived by 8:30, election officials said some of the machines weren't working until 10 a.m. -- three hours after polls opened. Voters said some didn't start operating until even later.

Partisan bickering broke out, with the governor blaming the Democratic legislature, and the Democrats pointing the finger at the governor.

Nancy H. Dacek, who was appointed as president of the county's Board of Elections by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), apologized for the error.

"We regret what happened this morning. It was just a fluke," Dacek said. "There was a glitch. It's now been taken care of."

The cards that went astray are called voter access cards and look like white ATM cards with a golden computer chip embedded in them. They are issued to voters once election judges verify they are registered to vote. When the cards are placed into the voting machines, the ballot appears on the touch screen.

County election officials said they simply forgot to include the cards in the supply bags provided to the chief election judge of each polling place.

The trouble began Friday when eight county election employees and a supervisor met in a locked room on the first floor of the election headquarters building at 751 Twinbrook Pkwy. in Rockville.

They packed the large canvas bags that were to contain the items needed to operate the computerized voting system. But the stacks of the critical voter access cards were forgotten, locked a few feet away behind a caged door. Once the bags were packed, they were padlocked for security, and polling place judges were prohibited from opening them until yesterday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0062491

About 6 a.m., the judges realized the cards were missing, said Margaret Jurgensen, the county's elections director. She said the county has checklists to keep employees from forgetting to pack any of the items, but she did not know whether they were used.

Jurgensen said the error "was a team effort."

Linda H. Lamone, chairman of the State Board of Elections, said she was appalled by the day's events and said it was the work of poorly trained election judges.

"We push the information out to them," said Lamone, who was appointed by Ehrlich's Democratic predecessor, Parris N. Glendening. "If they choose not to follow it, there's nothing we can do."

Ehrlich's initial reaction on learning of the problems was: "That's negligence. That's inexcusable."

Later in the day, the governor added: "The training is Linda Lamone's responsibility, period. The apology should come from her. . . . She's going to have to answer a lot of questions tomorrow."

But Douglas F. Gansler (D), the Montgomery state's attorney who is running for attorney general, joined several other candidates who lambasted the county election board yesterday.

"The level of incompetence that led to this is almost surreal -- especially in Montgomery County," he said.

When David Belkin showed up to vote at a polling place in Bethesda at 8:30 a.m., he was told he could vote by provisional ballot, but the line was too long and he was late for a meeting.

"The degree of incompetence is beyond belief," he said. "It's just incredible. It's not like this was a surprise. They knew the election was coming. And whoever is responsible should be fired today."

Gareth Rosenau, a lawyer with the Federal Railroad Commission, said the voting cards arrived shortly after he did at the polling place in Takoma Park. But when the registered Democrat put his card into the voting machine, a Republican ballot appeared on the screen, he said.

Other voters were having the same problem, he said, and complained to election officials, who didn't know how to fix the machines so they would produce the proper ballots.

"I felt like I was in a Third World country," Rosenau said.

Baltimore was also plagued by election day problems, prompting a judge there to extend voting by an hour as well.

The Maryland Democratic Party alleged in a court filing that at least 75 precincts in Baltimore opened late because election officials failed to show up on time and struggled with the electronic voting machines the city was using for the first time.

Baltimore Elections Administrator Gene Raynor said there were problems with some judges showing up on time. But he said the number of affected precincts was closer to "two dozen."

"When you have 1,500 [election judges], you're going to have problems with some of them," he said.

States across the country scrambled to revamp their election systems after the debacle in Florida during the 2000 presidential election. In an attempt to avoid hanging chads that plagued that election, many states, including Maryland, moved to an electronic voting system. Montgomery has been using the electronic voting machines since 2002 without significant problems.

Critics have described the electronic systems as vulnerable, and a report in June by Common Cause concluded that they "are highly vulnerable to machine malfunction and human manipulation." It also found that Maryland was one of 17 states with voting systems that are at "high risk" because their machines don't have a paper ballot backup system.

In Prince George's County, about 15 to 20 of the county's 206 precincts were delayed an average of about 25 minutes yesterday morning, according to Alisha Alexander, deputy elections administrator for the Prince George's County Board of Elections. Most of the precincts were in the northern part of the county, including Beltsville and University Park.

Alexander said about 20 technicians, who were scheduled to deliver and set up electronic poll books by 6 a.m., quit yesterday morning, resulting in long lines and frustrated voters at numerous polling places.

"We had to find other staff and send them out," said Robert J. Antonetti, the interim Prince George's elections administrator.

Mehlman To Spend $60M, Five Times Dean's $12M (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 13, 2006

The Republican National Committee (RNC) will spend its entire bank account, $60 million or more, helping Republicans try to retain control of Congress in the midterm elections.

The looming spending spree appears to have spurred Democratic House leaders to reach agreement over how much the Democratic National Committee (DNC) will help counter this onslaught.

The relationship between the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and DNC has been rocky. There is dispute over whether it took House Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn's (S.C.) intervention to broker the deal announced yesterday under which part of the DNC's $12 million will be funneled to 40 House races. Targeted House Democratic candidates will receive about $60,000 from the party committee.

One Democratic official said Clyburn had to bring the sides together, but another official denied it.

The DNC money will also be spent on Senate and gubernatorial races, and voter turnout activities in battleground states.

It is an open question whether the deal between the DNC and DCCC will be enough to offset the financial advantage that the RNC cash will give Republican candidates this fall.

RNC chairman Ken Mehlman has put in place a plan to raise money aggressively throughout the fall and has made clear that he will not hold back any money for the 2008 presidential election.

In total, the RNC plans to spend more than $60 million on targeted federal races, a record for a national party committee in a midterm election, according to a GOP official familiar with their plans. The funds are "targeted for competitive federal races," the official said, adding that half would pay for get-out-the-vote operations

Democrats, however, say they are counting on a major boost from their union allies. The AFL-CIO is planning to spend $40 million on get-out-the-vote operations, said Democratic officials.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean said yesterday's deal shows the party is unified. He is still negotiating with Democratic Senate leaders over how DNC money will be spent to help Senate candidates. .

"We're busy talking to them," said Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), when asked about the DNC's role.

One GOP source familiar with Mehlman's plans said the committee would raise money aggressively through the fall and would probably collect $15 million to add to its account. The RNC had $43.6 million in the bank at the end of July.

The DNC reported $11.3 million in cash on hand at that time.

Although national party committees are commonly thought of as focused on raising money for White House campaigns and building party infrastructure for presidential election cycles, the RNC has morphed into a complement to the congressional fundraising committees, the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

Mehlman can afford to focus on congressional races this year because fundraising for gubernatorial contests has been largely segregated from the national party committees. The Republican Governors Association has raised $25.9 million for Election Day, according to Political Money Line, a nonpartisan organization that tracks fundraising. Its Democratic counterpart has raised $17.9 million.

Republican lawmakers and political strategists believe that Mehlman cannot risk losing control of the Senate or House by a seat or two and still have any money left in his accounts. Even a million dollars could make the difference in a close race that determines control of either chamber.

"I'm sure every penny he's got between now and November will go into those races," said Republican strategist Charlie Black. "I think it will make some difference."

Frank Donatelli, White House political director under Ronald Reagan, said there is little doubt the RNC's focus is on Congress.

"They're spending a heck of a lot. I didn't know that they're emptying the bank accounts but they're being very aggressive on fundraising and are spending a heck of lot of money on House and Senate races," he said. "It's a huge amount of money."

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), who had weighed chairing the NRSC next year, praised Mehlman's tactics.

"He's going to pull out all the stops because Ken is a great tactician, he knows what needs to be done," said Thune. "He knows that the House and Senate are going to be won or lost in the ground game, that's what he has perfected in the last couple of elections and it takes money to implement that.

"You don't want to end an election with money in the bank because people are going to say 'Why didn't you put more into the ground? Why didn't you put more into the mail? Why didn't you put more in television?' So I think he's going to raise it and he's going to expend it in places where it makes a difference."

Political spending has been a contentious subject among Democratic leaders this cycle as Dean has sought innovative ways to raise and invest party funds. Dean paid less attention to wealthy donors than past party chairman did, focusing instead on raising cash through the Internet and from small-dollar donors.

Dean's 50-state strategy has spread money to solidly Republican states where the Democratic party structure has atrophied in recent years. Some Democrats think the money would be better spent in swing states and districts where their party has more opportunity for immediate victories.

Schumer and DCCC chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) have challenged Dean this year over the strategy. Emanuel stomped angrily out of a contentious meeting with Dean and Schumer in May, according to press reports.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer declined to discuss Dean's strategy but dismissed the impact of Republican spending.

"God bless them if they want to spend $60 million," said Singer. "A field program is only as good as the amount of enthusiasm there is for the Republican Party. It's clear that the Republican base is dispirited, unenthused and withdrawn. If people are not energized behind what they're selling, and they are not, it won't make a difference."

But one expert predicts it will make a difference.

"The wildcard in the remaining weeks of this midterm election is the substantial amount of money the RNC has on hand," said Michael Toner, the Republican-appointed chairman of the Federal Election Commission. "That money could make the difference down the stretch in a number of competitive House and Senate elections.

Survey Says: Voter Anger May Not Result In Anti-GOP Tsunami (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

National polls are showing high — and in many cases, increasing — levels of voter frustration with the direction of the country, politics as usual and the Republican leadership.

But in Out There's second unscientific poll this year of state capitol reporters from around the country, we find surprisingly few indications that voter anger is translating into a national anti-Republican — or even an anti-incumbent — wave.

During August, Out There sent a survey to a range of members of capitol-beat, a national association for reporters who cover politics and government in the state capitals. Twenty-six reporters in 20 states responded.

The study merits some major caveats. This obviously is not a substitute for professional polls. The reporters' assessments will be subjective, and the view from a statehouse press room can be somewhat limited.

In addition, of the 20 states represented in this survey, 13 are red states, compared to just seven blue states. However, many of the Congressional seats that the Democrats must win are located in red states.

Of the 36 Republican-held House seats deemed to be in play by handicapper Charlie Cook, 15 are located in states with at least one survey respondent, as are eight of the 10 Democratic-held House seats that Cook considers in play. Four states represented in the survey have competitive Senate contests this fall and nine have highly competitive gubernatorial races.

Where state Capitol reporters can be helpful is that they have their finger on the outside-the-Beltway pulse better than many Washington, D.C., reporters do. And according to our survey, they generally detect a modest sentiment against Republicans, but not one that inevitably will translate into political gains for Congressional Democrats.

Asked "Do you sense a wave of anti-incumbency developing in your state (that is, an urge to 'throw the bums out,' irrespective of party)?" only five respondents gave a "strong yes," while 14 offered a "weak yes." Seven answered "no."

The results were slightly more negative when the following question was asked: "Do you sense a wave of specific anti-Republican sentiment?" On that question, five respondents gave a strong yes, 12 gave a weak yes and nine said no.

"There is clearly a feeling against incumbents, but not much chance to vote against them in state legislative races — too many are unopposed — and very little opportunity in Congressional races," said one Florida reporter.

Moreover, this reporter said, "although there is some anti-Republican sentiment afoot in the state, I'm not sure how much it will impact the races because the Democrats have failed to field good candidates in many instances."

The question that garnered the clearest response was one that asked whether voters were dissatisfied with Congress as an institution. On that question, 15 respondents offered a strong yes and seven gave a weak yes. Only three said voters were generally satisfied with Congress.

But this view dramatically was tempered by the answers to a follow-up question. Asked, "Do you sense voter dissatisfaction with their particular Member of Congress?" not a single respondent gave a strong yes. Nine gave a weak yes, while a whopping 17 said voters were not dissatisfied with their Member of Congress.

"There's strong dissatisfaction with Congress, but it's that old, 'We hate them as a group — but don't touch my local guy,'" the Florida reporter said.

A North Carolina journalist added that dissatisfaction with Congress is "a bit heightened, but mostly the usual background late-night-comic frustration with the 'bums in Washington.' Congress has been such a do-nothing group this year, they don't seem to have left a strong impression, good or bad."

All Politics Is Local — Mostly

Another finding from the survey that should comfort Republicans is that state Capitol reporters see voters paying more attention to local issues than national issues so far this campaign season. Eleven respondents said voters were paying more attention to local issues, compared to six who said national issues are predominating. Another nine chose neither or both.

The survey also looked at the issue landscape right now, and the findings offer somewhat mixed results for the two parties.

Far and away, the issue voters are focusing on the most is gasoline prices, respondents said. No less than 24 of them said voters felt "very strongly" about gas prices, while two others said voters felt "somewhat strongly."

DOJ_NMG_0062494

The next-highest ranked issues were Iraq and immigration. Interest in Iraq was called very strong by 16 respondents and somewhat strong by eight. Immigration earned 15 very strong votes and seven somewhat strong votes.

If the voters are indeed focusing on these three issues more than than any others, it probably helps Democrats more than Republicans. Gas prices are a clear rhetorical winner for Democrats. And the Iraq War may be the biggest cause of President Bush's plunge in popularity.

"We're a big military state," said a North Carolina journalist, "and even around military bases, people are related to or are friends with folks who have had to ship out or got killed. That's making for some unhappy voters who might take out their frustrations by either voting Democratic or by simply not showing up."

But a front-and-center role for the Iraq War also could heighten voter sentiment in support of the troops — a plus for the GOP.

"In a flag-waving state that has provided much manpower to the struggle against terror, many folks still equate opposition to the war to denigrating our troops," said one Georgia journalist.

In the meantime, the immigration debate's impact likely will depend on whether voters demand a tough crackdown on immigrants or whether they are more eager to see politicians implement a broader, more comprehensive policy like the one sought in pending Senate legislation.

If it's the former, the GOP could benefit, and if it's the latter, it could be more of a wash. At least two reporters said they sense a sentiment in favor of the latter.

"The immigration debate seems like it would be out of place in the upper Midwest," said one Iowa journalist, but voters "are very concerned about national security, and they see porous borders as a disaster waiting to happen. There are a few racists among them, but in large they just want the immigration service to know who is coming into this country."

A North Carolina journalist called immigration "an issue where folks are looking for national leadership and not getting it. It's not so much an anti-immigrant sentiment as it is that the system isn't working, and it's having adverse affects on the job market and public safety."

Mixed News for Both Parties

The next tier of issues offers bits of comfort for both parties.

Health care — where Democrats tend to have the historical edge — was cited as a very strong issue by 11 respondents and as a somewhat strong issue by another 13.

In the meantime, "culture war" issues such as abortion and stem-cell research were cited as having very strong resonance by eight respondents and as having a somewhat strong resonance by 13 respondents. Republicans tend to get a turnout boost when social issues are high on the agenda, but it's also possible that this trend could be undercut by a backlash that energizes liberals and moderates.

And interest in the economy was cited as very strong by eight respondents and as somewhat strong by 15 respondents. By the numbers, the national economy seems fairly healthy, but voters in general appear to be downbeat about the nation's economic prospects, suggesting that this level of interest in economic conditions could benefit Democrats.

In certain states, such as Michigan, the economy is a major flashpoint, and in that case, the incumbent Democratic governor, Jennifer Granholm, arguably faces even greater ire than does the GOP in Washington, D.C.

"The economy, the economy and the economy round out the top three," said one Michigan reporter. "Throw in gas prices once or twice there as well."

Other issues being touted by the parties seem to be inspiring more modest levels of interest, according to our poll.

Corruption, a key issue for Democrats for most of this year, is attracting moderate interest, with seven respondents saying voters felt very strongly about it and 13 saying that voters felt somewhat strongly. Often, voters are more concerned about scandals in state government than scandals at the federal level, which could mean that any voting impact in federal races would be diluted.

Respondents cited similar levels of voter interest in the Medicare drug benefit's shortcomings, another key Democratic issue. This topic attracted seven votes for very strong and 16 votes for somewhat strong.

Interest in the environment, another traditional Democratic issue, came in even lower, with four choosing very strongly, 13 choosing somewhat strongly and nine choosing not strongly.

At least one Republican "base" issue also fared poorly in the poll. Judicial nominations, a top issue for conservatives, received less support than any other issue in the poll, with 21 respondents saying there was no interest at all in the issue.

Then again, the poll suggests that if you don't like the findings, just wait a few weeks.

Said one Georgia journalist during the August recess, "I get the strong sense that people are not thinking about politics at all."

Sparring Democrats Strike A Deal On Financing To Get Out The Vote Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Chicago's Rep. Rahm Emanuel likes to speak of "Kumbaya" moments when referring to political rivals coming together. Finally, after months of sometimes expletive-laced sparring, the architect of House Democrats' election efforts seems to be having his moment with Howard Dean. The Democratic Party chairman apparently has agreed to pony up $12 million for get-out-the-vote drives aimed at capturing control of Congress Nov. 7.

The sum, together with the House Democrats' own money and the $40 million that the AFL-CIO has said it will spend to mobilize voters for Democrats in the most hotly contested congressional races, could effectively put the Democrats on par financially with the vaunted Republican "GOTV" program, for which party Chairman Ken Mehlman has pledged about $40 million. And that would blunt the Republicans' one clear advantage in an otherwise bleak election year for the party in power.

The agreement comes none too soon. Yet another shoe still hasn't dropped: Mr. Dean remains in talks with New York's Sen. Chuck Schumer, Mr. Emanuel's counterpart, over funds for Senate races. The process of identifying potential voters, contacting them at home or by phone, getting them to vote early in states where that is allowed, or on Election Day when it's not, is one that has to be under way months before November arrives. That means now.

Democrats insist the spat between Chairman Dean on one side and Messrs. Emanuel and Schumer on the other hasn't hobbled their efforts; the well-funded House and Senate campaign committees had enough money to get started with field operations in the 15 states and 40 congressional districts with marquee election contests. Democrats need to net 15 House districts and six Senate seats to claim majorities. Their nightmare: the prospect of running short of money in the campaign's crucial final weeks.

At issue is the conflict between Mr. Dean's emphasis on a long-term "50-State Strategy" of financing party-building efforts everywhere, even in the reddest of states, and congressional Democrats' immediate demands to target money in the places where the party has its best shots of breaking Republicans' 12-year reign. The Democratic National Committee chairman currently is left with about $11 million on hand.

Mr. Emanuel had sought about $20 million just for his House races. "Money is not a philosophical argument to me," he said at one point. "You either have it or you don't."

He wanted to control any money he got; Mr. Schumer has been willing to let the DNC funnel money to state parties for statewide voter mobilization. The long-simmering dispute exploded publicly last May, when word leaked that Mr. Emanuel had bolted from a meeting of the Democratic trio, cursing at the failure to come to agreement. "The way you build long-term is to succeed short-term," he said at the time. For months after, he and Mr. Dean hardly spoke, Democrats say. Another House Democratic leadership figure, Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, is said to have helped broker this week's deal between Mr. Dean and Mr. Emanuel's Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

As for Mr. Schumer, Mr. Dean told DNC members at their summer meeting in mid-August that he'd reached tentative agreement with the senator, and soon would with Rep. Emanuel; Schumer staffers immediately refuted Mr. Dean's claim. A month later, on word of the Dean-Emanuel pact, the senator said in a statement Tuesday, "We're still in the process of negotiating and we're hopeful that we'll have an amicable agreement that makes everyone happy."

Meanwhile, his Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee -- which has out-raised Sen. Elizabeth Dole's National Republican Senatorial Committee -- has been at work for 18 months in what a staffer called "the most extensive GOTV operation ever" for Democrats. Mr. Schumer has positioned operatives in 15 states where Democrats have targeted Republican seats or are defending a few of their own, and plans to send upwards of $30 million for field operations there. Additional money from Mr. Dean would mean "water and nutrients" to grow that effort through Nov. 7, one Democratic Senate strategist said.

For Democrats generally, an end to the infighting can't come soon enough. Most say both sides are right -- the party needs a permanent 50-state strategy that quits ceding whole regions to Republicans, but it also must target resources now to take advantage of this year's opportunities. Only egos stood in the way of compromise, as many Democrats saw it.

The Democrats' saga has been rare entertainment for beleaguered Republicans. Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, Mr. Emanuel's opposite as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, often would contrast his "partnership" with RNC Chairman Mehlman with what seemed the Democrats' dysfunctional family. On Monday, Mr. Mehlman said his party's turnout operation, with its proven results in 2002 and 2004, would protect Republicans' House and Senate majorities.

If indeed the Democrats have now joined hands -- and funds -- to boost their own turnout efforts, that is bad news for Republicans. As the song goes, "Someone's crying, Lord, kumbaya/Oh Lord, kumbaya."

Dean Pledges November Aid (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean has pledged $12 million to his party's 2006 campaign efforts — with at least $5 million going to House and Senate Democrats — in a move that may help soothe tensions between the national party chief and his Congressional counterparts.

Dean struck a deal with Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) on Tuesday to devote roughly $60,000 to get-out-the-vote efforts in 40 targeted House races.

Dean and Emanuel have differed sharply on election-year strategy, and their feud has been well publicized in the press. It has been previously reported that the two men are not on speaking terms.

The deal was brokered by DCCC Executive Director Karin Johanson and DNC Executive Director Tom McMahon. One source familiar with the discussion indicated that initially Dean wanted to seek assurances that Emanuel would stop attacking Dean and his 50-state strategy in return for the financial commitment, but that never materialized.

The massive financial shortfall of the DNC in comparison to the Republican National Committee has been a source of concern for Emanuel and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.). While the Democrats' House and Senate committees are ahead of or at cash parity with their GOP counterparts, as of July 31 the DNC had $11.3 million in reserve compared to the RNC's $43.6 million.

This week, RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman touted an overall $47 million edge of Republican campaign entities over Democrats, when all of the committees and state parties are taken into account.

In a statement, Dean touted the party's unity heading into November and also alluded to the fact that the $12 million effort comes on top of the DNC's 50-state strategy spending.

"Democrats are unified and prepared to win up and down the ballot, all across America this November," Dean said. "Building on successful efforts over the past year, we're in the final stretch and the DNC is making unprecedented investments to ensure that Democrats retake control of Congress and are elected at every level of government."

A deal has not yet been reached between the DNC and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee as to how much of the $12 million will be allocated to Senate races.

But Senate Leadership sources said that the DNC will commit at least $2.5 million to GOTV efforts in targeted contests.

The DNC's contributions for field operations will be doled out to state parties and coordinated campaign efforts.

Much of the money will be spent in key states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania, which have highly competitive gubernatorial and Senate races as well as several top tier House races.

Democratic aides called the effort historic, noting that the AFL-CIO has pledged to spent $40 million in the midterm elections.

"This is a record-breaking amount to focus on field for Congressional races in 2006. This has never been done before," said DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg.

"I think this is going to be a pretty historic, multimillion turnout operation," added another party operative.

Still, the brokering of the deal gave Republicans an opening to the highlight how the intraparty divisions among Democrats contrast with the GOP's turnout efforts. The RNC already has said it will fund the turnout operations for all House contests through its 72-hour program.

"It's nice that less than 60 days before election the DCCC chairman and the DNC chairman have decided to set aside their egos, speak and make nice," said National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Carl Forti. "While the NRCC chairman and RNC chairman have been coordinating on turnout programs for months."

From the beginning of the cycle, Emanuel has been focused on raising the money to fund a massive TV air war for the fall campaign, and expressed concern that Dean would not have enough money to fund the ground war.

One party operative familiar with the situation said Dean's priority all along has been funding the GOTV efforts.

"Dean was confident that if we didn't have money for the field operation, that would be critical," the operative said.

But both the DSCC and DCCC have taken measures to help implement field operations for their candidates.

The DSCC has been transferring money to state parties that are hosting key Senate races to help build the early infrastructure for a field operation.

Likewise, many Democratic House candidates have been carrying out a field plan for months and one operative noted that the DCCC's top staff have come from a field background.

DOJ_NMG_0062497

"Do they really think Karin Johanson and Michael Whouley needed to hear from Howard Dean that we should have a field program?" the operative said. "If we needed Howard Dean to tell us we needed a field plan then why were our House candidates executing their field plans months ago?"

But Dean sympathizers say that the money that has been already been spent through their 50-state strategy efforts will benefit Congressional candidates as well. For example, the DNC has spent $8 million to update voter files around the country and has had paid organizers in Indiana since last year.

Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), who is personally very close to Dean, helped to broker the deal, sources indicated. Clyburn met with Dean several months ago to talk about his belief that the field operation will be key.

Dean Agrees To Finance Some Programs For Turnout (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Ending a long and cantankerous standoff with House Democratic leaders, Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, has agreed to a limited program to finance get-out-the-vote operations this November, party officials said Tuesday.

But Mr. Dean remained at loggerheads with Senate Democrats, who continued to insist he provide more money.

The committee said it would provide $12 million to finance turnout operations for candidates running for the House and the Senate, and for state races. Just $2.6 million would go to finance turnout operations in 40 House races, far less than House Democratic leaders had asked for.

By contrast, the Republican National Committee has said it will spend more than $30 million of the $176 million raised this cycle to finance Republican turnout efforts, most of it going to House and Senate races.

Mr. Dean had staved off demands for more money from Democratic leaders in Congress, saying it was in the long-term interest of the Democrats to instead use the nearly $100 million he has raised this year to build strong Democratic organizations in all 50 states by giving them money to hire staff members.

The disagreement had sparked a lively feud between Mr. Dean and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is leading the Democratic effort to win back the House. Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Dean stopped speaking to each other several months ago.

Mr. Emanuel's aides said he was satisfied with the deal. "Yeah, we're happy," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Between our effort, the D.N.C. effort, the labor effort and what other Democrats are doing, we're going to have what we need for voter turnout."

Mr. Emanuel's counterpart in the Senate, Charles E. Schumer of New York, did not share his assessment. "We're still in the process of negotiating," Mr. Schumer said. "We're hoping that we'll have an amicable agreement that will make everyone happy."

Democratic Forces Salve Wounds (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

After months of behind-the-scenes infighting and public name-calling, leaders of the Democratic National Committee and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee reached agreement yesterday on a funding program to underwrite get-out-the-vote operations in the November elections.

The national party agreed to put $12 million into voter-mobilization efforts this fall, with $2.4 million of it earmarked for 40 key House districts that are seen as competitive. The rest of the money will go to help candidates for Senate and governor and for outreach to the party's key constituencies.

"Democrats are unified and prepared to win up-and-down the ballot, all across America this November," DNC Chairman Howard Dean said in a statement.

"We feel good," said DCCC spokesman Bill Burton. "We're going to have the money we need to get out the voters we need in the places we need them."

Dean said the national party is making an unprecedented investment in the fall elections, but other Democrats said the $12 million figure is roughly the same as what it spent on House and Senate races in 2002. That year, the DNC spent millions more on gubernatorial races and redistricting and lent the DCCC close to $5 million in the final weeks of a losing campaign.

Dean and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the congressional campaign committee, have clashed throughout the year over the DNC's spending priorities. Dean has staunchly defended his "50-state" program, aimed at rebuilding state parties across the country. Emanuel has argued that the national party should target its resources this fall on those states and races that will determine who controls the next Congress.

Emanuel has engaged in expletive-laden shouting matches with Dean, walking out of one meeting with the former Vermont governor. But the DNC leader has rallied state party leaders, who are appreciative of the national committee's financial assistance, to defend his approach.

DNC officials talked about trying to include a clause in the agreement that would have provided additional assistance if Emanuel stopped bad-mouthing Dean, the blog Hotline reported yesterday, but a party source said it was never a serious proposal.

The Democratic Senate Campaign Committee also has pressed Dean to put more money into the fall campaigns. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the committee chairman, said in a statement he remains hopeful that an amicable agreement for more money can be achieved.Hacking Denied in Leak

The saga of how California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's private comments about a Latina legislator became public took another turn yesterday when the campaign manager for his Democratic challenger admitted the campaign had leaked the tape to the news media. But she denied hacking the Schwarzenegger computer system to get it.

"No one hacked," Cathy Calfo, campaign manager for California comptroller Phil Angelides, told reporters, according to the Associated Press. "They accessed information that was accessible to the public."

Schwarzenegger spokesman Adam Mendelsohn said the information was in a private area on the governor's Web site. Another gubernatorial official, legal affairs secretary Andrea Lynn Hoch, said the file was protected by a password.

It was all reminiscent of the 1988 presidential campaign, when then-Massachusetts Gov. Michael S. Dukakis (D) admitted that his campaign manager had leaked a tape damaging to Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) to the New York Times. His campaign manager, John Sasso, was forced to resign.

Schwarzenegger apologized for his remarks after they were published in the Los Angeles Times. They came in a private meeting, during which he and a top aide were speculating whether Republican Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia's heritage was Cuban or Puerto Rican.

"They are all very hot," Schwarzenegger said. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

Calfo said Angelides did not know that two of his staffers had passed the file on to the newspaper and said she was unhappy they had acted without her knowledge.

Democrats May Not Need A Contract With America To Win (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - If they're still looking to close the deal on November's midterm elections, why haven't the Democrats rolled out their own 2006 version of the Republicans' Contract with America, which was widely credited with helping that party win control of Congress in 1994?

One reason could be the influence of Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who thinks the contract is overrated.

Mellman is a Democratic insider who's long advised leaders of his party and worked for all three of the Democrats' national political operations as well as state parties and officials. He doesn't just crunch numbers about today's voters, however. He has a keen eye for history. And his professorial take on 1994 is that the conventional wisdom is wrong, that the contract did not work as advertised.

To refresh your memory, Newt Gingrich and about 340 Republican House candidates unveiled the contract on the steps of the Capitol on Sept. 27, 1994. The contract promised that, if given power, House Republicans would enact eight proposals on their first day, then vote within 100 days on each of 10 more. The agenda promised votes on such poll-tested and popular issues as welfare restructuring and a child tax credit.

Sealing the legend, the Republicans went on to win 54 seats and take the House for the first time in 40 years.

Yet, as Mellman notes, the contract didn't transform the campaign.

Weeks later, the Times Mirror Center for the People & the Press - now the Pew Research Center - found that only 29 percent of registered voters had heard of the contract. Of them, half said it made no difference to their votes, a quarter said it made them more likely to vote Republican and a quarter said it made them less likely to vote Republican.

Said poll director Andy Kohut: "The much-ballyhooed Republican Contract with America has failed to do much to improve the prospects of Republican candidates."

One reason the contract might have cost as many Republican votes as it delivered was that it became a big juicy target. Democrats launched a $2 million ad campaign against it and hammered Republicans who signed on to it.

DOJ_NMG_0062499

Republicans today would love to see a Democratic contract so they could line up ads against it.

Many Democrats think there's no need for a contract-like set of bumper-sticker proposals this year. The key to victory in November, they say, is the same force that drove the 1994 elections: anger and disappointment with the president and his party.

In 1994, Americans had turned against Democratic President Bill Clinton and the Democratic Congress. They didn't like gays in the military, an assault-weapons ban, tax hikes and Clinton's big-government health-care proposal.

They felt that way both before and after the contract was unveiled. Clinton's approval rating in the Gallup poll was 42 percent before the Republican agenda was announced and 46 percent the week before the election, statistically unchanged.

President Bush's approval rating now is 39 percent.

So rather than roll out a contract, Democrats might just heed the lesson of 1994, stick with the agenda they already have (raise the minimum wage, help pay for college, enact security revisions recommended by the Sept. 11 commission) and hope to ride anger at Bush into power.

Or they might just go with the bumper sticker that Gingrich himself suggested several months ago: "Had enough?"

That might not help them govern. Regardless of its impact on voters, the contract served as a blueprint for what Republicans would do in power and gave them claim to a mandate to do it.

But the slogan could be a winning strategy.

Nation: New Democrats' PAC Aids 'Red To Blue' Team (RC)

By Various Writers

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

As the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee showcases the candidates in its "Red to Blue" program tonight in Washington, D.C., members of the New Democrat Coalition will announce today that they are contributing at least $120,000 to the program's recipients.

Several top-flight Democratic challengers and open-seat candidates will be in town tonight as part of House Democrats' "March to the Majority" events.

Already the political action committee of the NDC has given $263,000 to Democrats in competitive House races.

Today, the NDC, through Member contributions, will give $5,000 each to Darcy Burner, who is challenging Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.); Phyllis Busansky, in the race to replace Rep. Mike Bilirakis (R-Fla.); Joe Courtney, challenger to Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.); Tammy Duckworth, the Democrat in Illinois' open 6th district race; Diane Farrell, who is in a rematch with Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.); Gabrielle Giffords, who was expected to win the Democratic primary Tuesday in Arizona's open 8th district; Ron Klein, who is challenging Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.); Lois Murphy, who is in a rematch with Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.); and Ed Perlmutter, the Democrat in Colorado's open 7th district race.

In addition, Rep. Adam Smith (Wash.), the chairman of the NDC PAC, is giving $1,000 to each of the Democrats who are getting money from the PAC today, plus $1,000 each to Michael Arcuri, the Democrat in New York's open 24th district; John Cranley, who is challenging Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio); ex-Rep. Baron Hill, who is in a rematch with Rep. Mike Sodrel (R-Ind.); Christine Jennings, the Democrat in Florida's open 13th district; ex-Rep. Ken Lucas, who is running against Rep. Geoff Davis (R-Ky.); Joe Sestak, who is challenging Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.); and Heath Shuler, who is challenging Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.).

NDC leaders expect to parcel the rest of the money out as Election Day draws nearer.

Bernie and Willie Team in New Senate TV Ad

Country icon and political activist Willie Nelson appears in the latest commercial for the Senate campaign of Rep. Bernie Sanders (I).

The spot was taped during Nelson's Aug. 8 visit to the Green Mountain State on Sanders' behalf. The two had met before at one of the Farm Aid rallies that Nelson had organized.

Interestingly, one shot taken during the rally for family farmers held in Charlotte, Vt., puts Sanders, Nelson and state Rep. David Zuckerman into the frame.

Zuckerman is the legislator who weighed a bid to succeed Sanders as the state's lone Congressman on the Progressive ticket — a move that seriously would have hindered the chances of state Sen. Peter Welch (D).

Sanders, and national and state Democrats, implored would-be Progressive candidates to stay out of the House race so as not to enhance the chances that the Progressive and Democratic candidate would split the left-leaning vote, opening the door for a Republican to win the seat.

DOJ_NMG_0062500

Republicans have high hopes that retired Maj. Gen. Martha Rainville (R), who was heavily favored to win the GOP primary Tuesday night, can give Welch a run for his money even in a two-way race. But a new poll conducted for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee found Welch leading Rainville, 52 percent to 42 percent. The survey of 400 likely voters, taken Sept. 5-7 by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, had a 4.9 percent margin of error.

Sanders appears to hold a commanding lead over Republican Richard Tarrant in the Senate contest.

Abortion Is Focus of Stender's First TV Ad

State Assemblywoman Linda Stender (D) on Tuesday launched her first TV ad in her bid to unseat Rep. Mike Ferguson (R). The ad, produced by All Points Communications LLC, focuses on the Congressman's position on abortion rights.

The ad features an unseen interviewer asking women on the street whether they knew of Ferguson's opposition to abortion "even in cases of rape and incest" and that he "wants to change the Constitution to make abortion a crime."

"These women are not criminals," one young woman responds. "They are not criminals at all. What does he want to do, send them to jail?"

A graphic then comes on the screen that reads, "Do You Really Know Mike Ferguson?" and directs viewers to a Web site, whymikewhy.com.

The north-central New Jersey 7th district voted narrowly for President Bush in 2000 and 2004, but national Democrats believe Stender has a real chance there this year, especially if she emphasizes her positions on social issues. The ad is expected to run on local cable TV channels for an indefinite period.

EMILY Adds Jennings to Its Candidate List

EMILY's List announced Tuesday that the organization is endorsing bank executive Christine Jennings (D) in the open-seat race to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris (R).

Jennings won the Democratic primary last week and faces what is still viewed as an uphill battle against wealthy car dealer Vern Buchanan (R) in November.

"Christine Jennings is a perfect fit to fill the leadership void suffered by the 13th district under Rep. Katherine Harris," EMILY's List President Ellen Malcolm said in a statement.

Harris is vacating the seat to run for Senate. The 13th district voted 56 percent for President Bush in the 2004 presidential election. Harris, however, won two terms in the House with 55 percent of the vote each time.

Porter Distances Himself From Manager's Words

Rep. Jon Porter (R) told the Las Vegas Review-Journal this week that his campaign chairman lied about his opponent — sort of.

Earlier, campaign manager Mike Slanker had told the paper that Tessa Hafen (D), former press secretary to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), had never made a mortgage payment in Nevada and had never held a job there.

"There's no question he should have qualified it," the paper on Monday quoted Porter as saying about Slanker.

Then he zinged her anyway.

"The bottom line is, she hasn't lived in Nevada for 12 years," Porter told the paper. "Voters need to know our backgrounds."

For the record, Hafen is a native of Henderson, and her father sits on the city council there. She also owns a home in the 3rd district and previously has worked in the state.

Sen. Joe Lieberman (D) and Democratic nominee Ned Lamont continue to draw attention for the marquee names they attract on their way to their Nov. 7 showdown.

Singer Moby has signed up with Lamont, while Michael Bloomberg, New York City's Republican mayor, will headline a Lieberman fundraiser, The Associated Press reported.

Moby, a Connecticut native, said he will host a concert or star at some other sort of event to help Lamont.

VIRGINIAPoll Indicates 'Macaca' May Have Hurt Allen

DOJ_NMG_0062501

A Mason-Dixon Polling & Research poll released last weekend showed Sen. George Allen (R) with a slim 46 percent to 42 percent lead over former Reagan administration Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D).

The poll of 625 likely voters was conducted for a group of newspapers in the state. It had a 4 percent margin of error.

A July Mason-Dixon poll showed Allen with a 48 percent to 32 percent lead over Webb.

The new poll was taken after Allen's highly publicized gaffe while campaigning in August. That's when the Senator, at an event in southwestern Virginia, pointed to a Webb campaign volunteer of East-Indian descent, called him "macaca" and said, "Welcome to America."

Macaca is a type of monkey and is considered a racial slur in some languages. The volunteer, S.R. Sidarth, was born in Northern Virginia.

Both Allen and Webb currently are airing TV ads. Allen has been on TV for several weeks, while Webb went on the air this week.

The new Mason-Dixon poll showed that 20 percent of likely voters did not recognize Webb's name.

Midterm Loss Could Be '08 Gain For GOP White House Hopefuls (HILL)

By By Elana Schor And Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 13, 2006

A growing number of House Republicans are taking to the trail warning swing voters that a Democratic takeover would hand key chairmanships to the party's liberal wing. But some strategists see a silver lining to a GOP loss in November: its White House hopefuls can don the mantle of outsiders.

"The best possible thing for Republicans in 2008 would be Democrats controlling the House," conservative strategist and Weekly Standard editor William Kristol said earlier this year on Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report."

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) becoming Speaker, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) leading the Ways and Means Committee and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) chairing Judiciary, Kristol added, would help "[Sen.] John McCain [R-Ariz.] or Rudy Giuliani or [Massachusetts Gov.] Mitt Romney (R) become president."

As both parties prepare for the best and spin for the worst, 2008 could find Republicans turning a Democratic House majority into bogeymen or Democrats continuing to link GOP majorities to the Bush administration. Political analyst and University of Virginia professor Larry Sabato wondered whether Democrats would find success in a narrow electoral failure.

"You can [argue] that Democrats would be much better if they got 217 seats in the House and 49 in the Senate, just enough to make sure nothing was done but not enough to be held accountable," Sabato said. "Republicans, by contrast, will benefit almost certainly from a Democratic takeover … because they can not be in charge of everything and can respond that Democrats are causing gridlock."

Among Kristol's trio of 2008 centrist GOP frontrunners, Giuliani and Romney could distance themselves from Washington regardless of the party controlling Congress. Although McCain could be more likely than other presidential hopefuls to maintain comity with a Democratic-controlled chamber, he would be forced to relinquish a chairman's gavel if Republicans lose the Senate.

"It all depends on the mood of the country," McCain said when asked if having an opposition majority to criticize could bear fruit in 2008. "If the party in power and the president in power have high approval ratings, no. If not, yes."

McCain's midterm forecast, issued last month on NBC's "Meet the Press," called for continued Republican control of the Senate but an uncertain House. "I think [Republicans will keep the majority], but it's just too early," McCain said.

Across the aisle from McCain, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is not in line for a chairmanship if Democrats defy the odds and win the Senate. But a Democratic-controlled Congress that seeks to further expose the Bush administration's mishandling of the Iraq war, even if centered in the House, could subject Clinton's vote to authorize the war to more scrutiny in a presidential primary.

Clinton made her own 2006 predictions during a campaign swing last month in upstate New York. She saw Democratic success "as long as we don't have candidates who fade when the heat is strong. ... If we don't elect one or both houses Democrat, we will not be able to do what we need to do in Iraq or anywhere else."

Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), also eyeing a White House run, acknowledged that Democrats would face policy pressures if they took back one or both chambers. Still, he took an optimistic view of congressional control as a springboard to the White House.

"The burden will be on us to prove we can do better, prove we can deliver the results Americans expect," Bayh said. "It's a burden we want. With governing comes responsibility, and we will need to give the public a taste of what they can expect if we were really leading the country."

Recalling his run as the Hoosier State's governor, during which Democrats controlled the legislature and later faced a 50-50 deadlock, Bayh added, "I'd much prefer having a majority to work with."

Jennifer Duffy, editor of the Cook Political Report, cautioned that the "burden" Bayh's party seeks could saddle them with a short record to run on in 2008.

"If Democrats have one or both chambers, with that comes the responsibility to govern," Duffy said. "But they won't have the majorities to govern and they have a president of the other party, [so] whatever does reach his desk probably gets vetoed. That puts them in a weaker place as far as '08 goes."

One prominent Democratic pollster, who asked to remain anonymous speaking so close to the election, also raised the specter of tense gridlock in the wake of narrow Democratic victory this fall. That outcome would favor Democratic outsiders who can decry both parties' inaction, he added, a camp led by former vice-presidential nominee and Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Still, the pollster said, "It's better to win than to lose."

Republican pollster Bill McInturff, of Public Opinion Strategies, dismissed any link between 2006 and 2008.

"There is little evidence that even significant off-year elections have any impact on the following presidential election," McInturff said via e-mail, citing former President Clinton's win two years after the Republicans swept into power and former President Reagan's landslide victory after a GOP stumble in 1982.

Yet, both Clinton and Reagan scored those wins running for re-election. McCain, Giuliani, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) have topped recent White House polls, and Clinton's fundraising advantage makes her a formidable opponent for any Democratic challenger, but with Vice President Cheney not seeking to step up, neither party has anointed an obvious heir.

Grover Norquist, the longtime Republican operative who heads Americans for Tax Reform, emphasized that uncertainty in arguing that smart candidates would not bet on their opponents handing them ammunition.

"You always want to have as much power as possible because it allows you to shape events," Norquist said. "We don't know what's going to happen."

Former Rep. Vin Weber (R-Minn.), now a lobbyist and frequent GOP political adviser, questioned the strategy of finding an upside to losing.

"You hear this calculation that you'd be better off losing, but no candidate or party can conduct themselves on that basis. … You cannot go into the campaign cycle [saying it is] better off to lose," Weber said.

Most presidential hopefuls, from McCain to Clinton to Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), have sought to stave off White House speculation until after the midterms. But the notion that party leaders are focusing on this fall and leaving presidential plans aside, however, did not wash with Duffy.

"Thinking about it?" she said. "They're obsessed with it."

How To Win By Losing (NYT)

By Ramesh Ponnuru

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Washington

CONSERVATIVES are dreading the November elections. The Republican capture of the House of Representatives in 1994 was one of modern conservatism's signal political accomplishments. Now the Democrats are poised to take back the House. If that happens, however, conservatives will find several silver linings in the outcome.

It would be worse for conservatives if Republicans actually gained seats. The Congressional wing of the party lost its reformist zeal years ago and has been trying to win elections based on pork and incumbency. An election victory would reward that strategy, leaving the congressmen even less interested in restraining spending, reforming government programs and revamping the tax code. Political incompetence and complacency, sporadic corruption and widespread cynicism: having paid a price for none of it, Republicans would indulge in more of the same.

Of course, that's just a thought experiment. Almost nobody thinks that Republicans are going to pick up seats. The question is whether they will have a reduced majority or no majority. And outright loss might be preferable. A narrower House majority would most likely accomplish even less than the current one has. The party's small moderate caucus would gain in power and use it to frustrate conservatives. With no conservative reforms on the horizon, congressmen would revert to the pork strategy.

A straight loss, on the other hand, would make the Republicans hungrier and sharpen their wits. Freed from the obligation of cobbling together thin majorities for watered-down legislation, Republicans would be able to stand for something attractive. Some conservatives worry that Republican officialdom will see defeat as a reason to turn left. But that didn't happen after the last major Republican defeat in 1992. Then, conservatives were able to persuade the party that it had not lost power because it was too far right. They would make the same case this winter, but with more voices in the news media than they had back then.

The effects of victory on the Democrats may also be helpful to Republicans. Powerlessness has stoked Democrats' rage. If the party wins the House, its left-leaning "net-roots" may grow more enraged still, because the Democrats would then have the illusion of power without its reality. Even under their most optimistic calculations, they would have the smallest Democratic majority since 1957 — and they will have to deal with a Republican president and (probably) Senate.

House Democrats could initiate countless investigations of the administration and schedule votes to make Republicans look bad. But they could not do much to affect either the conduct of foreign policy or the composition of the courts, which are the areas where their most fervent supporters most desperately want influence. If the Democrats try to appease their base by impeaching the president, they will probably increase President Bush's poll numbers, much as Republicans once improved President Bill Clinton's.

So the policy tradeoffs for Republicans are not especially troubling. They would still be able to set foreign policy and appoint judges. They would be blocked only from making domestic-policy reforms they show no sign of attempting anyway.

There is also the matter of the 2008 elections. Do Republicans really want to go into 2008 running a unified government? The last time an election maintained unified party control from one presidency to another was in 1928. And the 2008 elections matter more than the 2006 elections, because, again, the president has more say over foreign policy and the courts than the House does. If Democrats win the House now, the next Republican presidential candidate will be able to run against Nancy Pelosi and the liberal committee chairmen who would suddenly be in the headlines.

Winning in 2006 will make it harder for Democrats to address their long-term structural problems. It has happened before. They confused the Watergate landslide of 1974 for a mandate to embrace McGovernism for 20 years. If they win because of high gas prices, bad war news and conservative discontent now, they will be less likely to adopt new approaches to national security and social issues. That, too, will help Republicans in 2008.

Who knows? If Republicans play their cards right, and the Democrats prove unequal to the task of running the House, the voters could put the Republicans back in power on Capitol Hill in 2008. After a few years in the wilderness, maybe they will be disposed to using that power for conservative ends.

Citing Ethics, Rep. Mollohan Seeks To Turn Tables On Wakim (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W. Va.) faulted Republican state Del. Chris Wakim's ethics in a recent television advertisement alleging that Wakim, a bar owner, illegally paid winnings on video poker machines.

The allegations stem from 1996 when a patron of Wakim's bar, Knotty Pines, in Wheeling, W. Va., sued Wakim after being charged with driving under the influence of alcohol. In testimony from the deposition obtained by The Hill, Wakim's wife, Jeannette, said the bar paid winnings to patrons who gambled on video machines. Under state law, this was illegal.

The plaintiff's lawyer asked Jeannette Wakim if bartenders would loan cash to patrons to play the poker machines.

"Yes, it is [accurate]," she said.

Asked if people who played the machines were paid in cash, she replied, "Yes, they are," and the lawyer continued to press Wakim on whether patrons drank free when they played the video poker machines.

Will Holley, a spokesman for Wakim, defended the business practice, saying, "Everybody was doing it."

Gerry Griffith, a spokesman for Mollohan's campaign, disagreed.

"I would like to see Mr. Wakim prove that everybody did it. Everybody didn't do it. That argument doesn't hold water when our teenagers use it. It doesn't hold water when a man who wants to be a lawmaker uses it."

In 2001, West Virginia's then-Gov. Bob Wise (D) signed legislation that legalized and taxed video poker gambling, and banned the games from convenience and grocery stores and gas stations.

West Virginia newspapers criticized Wakim for aligning a coalition of pub owners with religious groups who opposed making gambling legal.

"Chris opposed the bill because it gave preferential treatment and unfair tax advantages to large, out-of-state corporations who would take the money out of West Virginia at the expense of small businesses and fraternal, community-oriented organizations," said Holley.

Democrats also raised questions about whether Wakim paid sales tax on revenue earned from gambling machines. Holley said that tax records do not exist because they do not have to be saved for more than three years.

"Every dollar that was put into those machines was recorded and the city, state and federal governments all had access to those records to ensure tax compliance," he said. "Moreover, Chris's corporate records for 2000 were audited by the state government and there were no discrepancies found, whatsoever."

Allegations of ethical misconduct define the race, which is one of the few bright spots for Republicans in an otherwise terrible political climate. Federal investigators are scrutinizing Mollohan, a senior appropriator, for allegedly steering federal money to nonprofit organization and business interests run by family members and campaign supporters. Mollohan, a 12-term lawmaker, represents a district President Bush won in 2004 with 58 percent of the vote. Mollohan won 68 percent of the vote in 2004 and ran unopposed in 2002.

The media has raised questions about the accuracy of Wakim's resume. Wakim amended his campaign website biography in August because he had implied that he earned a master's degree in public policy from Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Instead, he earned a master's degree in liberal arts from Harvard's Extension School.

Democrats and a veterans group also criticized Wakim for claiming that he is a Gulf War veteran even though he never served in combat or overseas during his 11-year career in the Army. Wakim served on an Army base in Massachusetts during the first Gulf War.

Now Democrats are raising questions about Wakim's business acumen. On his campaign website, Wakim writes that as an investment banker in Chicago, he managed a $180 million fund. He worked for the Prospect Heights, Ill.-based Household International, a bank that specialized in high-interest loans to customers with poor credit histories. HSBC, the British banking concern, purchased Household in 2002.

Other documents obtained by The Hill show that the West Virginia Alcohol Beverage Control Administration fined Wakim on two occasions.

In April 1996, the Alcohol Beverage Control Administration received a letter of complaint that Knotty Pines violated state liquor laws. Agents entered the bar at 4 a.m., and patrons were drinking and playing the machines. Wakim's wife waived a hearing and paid a $200 fine and $50 in court costs.

In November 2000, the state's Alcohol Beverage Control Administration cited Wakim's bar, the Tropicana Club, for "immoral conduct."

The agents' written notes say that they watched patrons play the video machines. At first, the poker machines would not take the agents' money. But the machine was fixed and they won and were paid by the bartender from a grey box and the cash register. The winnings were recorded in a booklet.

They also wrote in the report that they asked for a Jack Daniels and Coke to take away. According to the written report, the bartender mixed a "Crown and Coke in a Styrofoam cup and put a lid on it. She said she was not supposed to do it. She handed him the drink. We left the bar at 11:55 p.m."

Courtney Unveils New Ad On 'bush's No.1 Fan' (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Democratic House challenger Joe Courtney (Conn.) unveiled his first campaign commercial yesterday, tagging incumbent Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) as "George Bush's No. 1 supporter" on energy, healthcare and Iraq.

The TV spot, which began running in the Hartford media market, underscores Courtney's effort to publicize Simmons' record of votes supporting the White House, which a recent study ranked first in the state delegation. The ad, set at a baseball game, features 30 people waving foam No. 1 fingers to represent Simmons' state ranking.

In New Mexico, A Horse Race (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- A Rhodes Scholar with a doctorate from Oxford, Rep. Heather Wilson has never faced doubts about her smarts. But proving her independence to the voters of New Mexico's First District gets harder with each passing day of the Iraq war.

Polls show the 45-year-old Republican running neck-and-neck with her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid, New Mexico's attorney general and a proven vote getter. As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, Ms. Wilson is feeling public anger over faulty prewar assumptions and the U.S.'s costs and casualties.

"The people understand: We want the troops home and the regime change here," says Terry Riley, a local activist for Veterans for Peace. "It is a good day to be on the street."

For President Bush, the election here poses a two-part test. First is public support for the war: "The eyes of the nation will be on this race," said Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who flew in Saturday to help Ms. Wilson. Second is the administration's fall offensive on national security, with which the White House hopes to knock Democrats back on their heels. But unless Mr. Bush calibrates his demands for additional powers from Congress, he risks smothering endangered Republicans just when they need to show some independence.

Ms. Wilson isn't alone in this regard. Other Republicans, such as Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays, are also paying a political price for supporting the president's Iraq policy. But Rep. Wilson's military background, past White House service under the president's father, and position on the Intelligence panel make her unique, and her race largely dominates this Southwest state.

"Sometimes the leaders of my party in Congress and in the White House don't agree with me, but I've always been willing to stand up and fight for things," Ms. Wilson says in a television ad. A Madrid ad counters: "Heather Wilson is on the Intelligence Committee but she never questioned George Bush on the war. That's not independence. Not by a long shot."

Ms. Wilson has begun to say more publicly that she had early doubts about prewar intelligence. But even as she tries to separate herself from the White House, this Air Force Academy graduate is being drawn into the fight over expanding the president's authority to conduct warrantless surveillance of electronic communications to and from the U.S.

Her legislation, introduced this summer, will be the starting point for House Republicans beginning committee markups today. The National Security Agency had input, Ms. Wilson says, noting that she didn't share the final proposal with the agency before the bill was filed.

"This is not an administration bill," Ms. Wilson says. But by subtly changing the definitions of electronic surveillance, the legislation, according to critics, gives the NSA license to intercept a broad range of international communications without a warrant. The political question -- for Congress and potentially Ms. Wilson -- is whether the administration will insist on even more flexibility than she has offered.

Her bill permits the president to go outside existing law to tap domestic calls for 60 days after a terrorist attack. But the Justice Department last week asked for similar authority before an attack.

"We think the president cannot and should not wait for thousands of Americans to die before initiating vital intelligence collection," Steve Bradbury, head of the department's office of legal counsel, told the House Judiciary Committee. Noting that Mr. Bush has operated until now without authorization from Congress, Ms. Wilson responds: "It is surprising that five years after 9/11 that the administration realizes it doesn't have the legal authority to keep us safe."

Asked if she felt pressure to avoid confrontation with the White House, Ms. Wilson said: "I can be educated, I can be persuaded. I negotiate, but pressure doesn't work with me. It never has."

Republicans have held this House seat for decades, but John Kerry carried the First District in the 2004 presidential elections, and the Hispanic vote has grown to more than 30%. In eight years, Ms. Wilson has survived tight elections, but this is her first against a woman and looks closer.

In 2004, the congresswoman led by six points in a similar poll by the Albuquerque Journal at this juncture. Now, her margin is half that -- 45% to 42% -- after hammering Ms. Madrid for weeks with ads alleging the attorney general is cozy with casino interests, and has turned a blind eye to corruption in state government.

Ms. Madrid says, "It's a diversionary tactic, and I don't think it's worked, because I'm still even in the polls after they've spent a tremendous amount of money trying to discredit me." Asked what she thinks the campaign is about, she answers: "The war in Iraq."

"I believed that from the day I announced," Ms. Madrid says. "People are very frustrated that 'Stay the course' really means paralysis....This race is beyond our particular personalities, Heather and I. I can feel the mood of the country in my district....There's a bit of the flavor of the '60s."

In her Stetson and bolero, the 59-year-old attorney is very much the picture of old New Mexico, a black-clad figure walking in the state-fair parade in Albuquerque.

Ms. Wilson, a native of New Hampshire in pink polo shirt and khakis, appears more the transplanted Anglo walking the same parade route. The parking lot where marchers gathered beforehand was a composite of New Mexico: Apache tribesmen, Hispanic high-school military-cadet bands and white evangelical Christians.

"It's definitely a very interesting place," says Philip Muller, a political consultant transplanted from the Bay Area in California. "Even though it's a Democratic state, the Native Americans and Hispanics are very patriotic. It's conservative, but they are Democrats."

Ms. Madrid has two brothers who served in the Vietnam War. "This Driver is a Vet" reads the sign on the truck pulling her float in the parade.

"I feel very comfortable and confident," Ms. Wilson says. But there is anecdotal evidence that her fabled ground organization is having trouble this year, and state Republicans even sued county election officials, demanding changes in the locations of early-voting satellite sites.

The costly air war has Ms. Wilson tapping supporters in the oil industry for donations, including at a fund-raiser in Houston this week. She has resisted Democratic efforts to pressure companies to pay higher royalties for energy extracted from federal lands. She is among the top recipients of oil money in the House this year -- a fact Democrats have sought to exploit amid voter concern about fuel prices.

Voters Riding A Blue Wave (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2006

The percentage of Illinois voters who call themselves Democrats is at its highest pre-election level in more than a decade, posing a problem for Republicans trying to win the governor's mansion and key congressional seats, a Tribune/WGN-TV poll shows.

The poll found 43 percent of voters identified themselves as Democrats while a little more than a quarter of the voters identified themselves as Republicans. The 17 percentage point difference ranks among the most polarized partisan spreads in more than 16 years of Tribune surveys taken prior to an election day.

The results of the poll echo surveys taken nationally that show an increase in voters lining up in the Democratic column, a factor attributed to dissatisfaction with the Republican White House and GOP-led Congress on issues ranging from the war in Iraq to economic uncertainties.

The findings of the Tribune poll indicate the potential for trouble in Illinois for Republicans trying to revitalize a political party beset by scandal and infighting. The survey was conducted in the days following the sentencing of former Gov. George Ryan, whose corruption-tainted tenure helped end a quarter century of Republican administrations.

Because Illinois has no true partisan registration procedure, survey respondents were asked if they "considered themselves" to be a Democrat, a Republican or an independent/middle-of-the-road voter.

The findings largely represent the mood of the voter, which can fluctuate greatly due to a variety of political or news events. The survey of 600 registered voters likely to vote Nov. 7 has a margin of error of 4 percentage points. The results are considered very fluid and could change closer to the election.

Yet the findings of the poll, conducted Thursday through Sunday, could be problematic for Republican governor candidate Judy Baar Topinka (who faces a 12 percentage-point deficit in her challenge to Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich), for GOP candidates in the suburban congressional races and for Republicans in down-ballot races.

Chris Mooney, professor of political science at the University of Illinois at Springfield, said the poll findings reflected recent dissatisfaction with President Bush's administration and anti-war sentiment on top of the state's longer-term demographic trend toward the Democrats.

"The population has become more and more urban, it's become more and more non-white," Mooney said. "This [national] short-term bump toward Democrats is exacerbating the long-term trend."

Previous Tribune polling conducted during the last 16 years by Market Shares Corp. of Mt. Prospect, covering seven previous general elections, found nearly the same trend toward Democrats in the 1996 presidential election year. That year, President Bill Clinton was seeking re-election against a backdrop of investigation and criticism.

In 1996, 42 percent of Illinois voters identified themselves as Democrats in the October preceding the election while 27 percent aligned with Republicans—a 15 percentage point spread. Clinton ended up winning Illinois in 1996 with 54 percent of the vote and Democrats retook control of the Illinois House from Republicans after a two-year hiatus.

Traditionally, Democrats have enjoyed a plurality of the state's voters, meaning Republicans need to capture the support of their party faithful as well as a healthy majority of self-described independents to win.

In 1994, when the GOP kept the governor's chair and swept all statewide offices and control of the General Assembly, the percentage of voters who identified themselves as Democrats fell to 33 percent while Republicans were at 31 percent and independents were at 33 percent.

But the most recent Tribune poll found that even in longtime Republican-leaning regions, the GOP no longer might have the upper hand. In the collar counties, 31 percent of voters aligned themselves with Republicans while 29 percent identified with Democrats. Outside the Chicago metropolitan region, voters split equally at 36 percent between Democrats and Republicans.

"Here in Illinois, the Republicans are doing nothing to stop the bleeding so people will move more toward Democrats and the Democratic label to reaffirm their concerns at the national level," said Steve Brown, a spokesman for House Speaker Michael Madigan, the veteran Southwest Side lawmaker who also chairs the state Democratic Party.

Andy McKenna, the state's Republican chairman, acknowledged the GOP in Illinois suffered "tough years" in 2002 and 2004. But, he said, with Democrats in control of the state, "they're going to be judged by their leadership and I think the deficiencies in their leadership are beginning to show up" in the form of investigations into the Blagojevich administration.

Mooney, the U. of I. at Springfield professor, said he believed the party identification among voters might not be a significant factor in high profile races such as governor, where the candidates and their positions are well known.

"The partisan effect is the default when [the voters] don't have anything else to judge a candidate by," Mooney said. "You don't get that at the gubernatorial level. People know who Rod Blagojevich is and who Judy Baar Topinka is and more people will know by Election Day."

Some House Members Seeking Higher Offices Miss '06 Votes (HILL)

By Tyler Kirtley And Ari Ruben

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Reps. Jim Davis (D-Fla.) and Butch Otter (R-Idaho) are both running for governor. Davis has missed 152 votes in 2006; Otter has missed 3.

They are among 16 members of the House that are running for a higher office this year. Statewide campaigns require time, money, and a great deal of energy. For some House members, it also leads to a lot of missed votes.

The 16 congressmen have missed an average of 50 floor votes in 2006. Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), who is running for the Senate, has been absent on 113 votes while Rep. Jim Nussle (R-Iowa), who is in a tight race for governor, has missed 110 votes.

Davis last week won the Democratic primary and hopes to replace term-limited Jeb Bush as governor of the Sunshine State.

Josh Ernest, the campaign's communications director, said, "[Davis] has worked very hard to balance his responsibilities as a member of Congress and his responsibilities as a state-wide candidate in Florida …. Over the course of his 10-year career in Congress, his attendance record is 93 percent."

When such a significant focus is placed on the campaign for the next office, missed votes can often resurface as political liabilities. In the 2004 presidential election, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and John Edwards (D-N.C.) were consistently criticized for missing votes on the Senate floor in favor of holding campaign events across the nation.

Already in 2006, Ford has been criticized for spending too much time away from D.C. as he battles to be the next Senator from Tennessee. In early July, the Tennessee Republican Party released a statement highlighting Ford's missed votes: "No respected employer would hire someone like Ford, who has a history of not showing up for work. I predict Tennessee voters will follow suit."

But the move backfired when further research showed that former Rep. Van Hilleary (R-Tenn.), who recently lost to Bob Corker in the Senate GOP primary in Tennessee, had missed more votes than Ford when he unsuccessfully ran for governor in 2002.

Otter has tried to avoid these problems by focusing on his duties in the House, saying, "If you do your best with the task at hand, folks tend to give you the benefit of the doubt when you ask for a promotion. My commitment to constituents has always been that representing them in Congress would remain my first priority, and it has."

However, Otter – unlike Davis — faced minimal opposition in his primary.

A pair of Republican congressmen has taken a more nuanced position in attempting to balance campaign necessities with the duties of serving in the House. Mark Green (R-Wis.) and Mark Kennedy (R-Minn.) knew that they needed to spend considerable time on the campaign trail in order to win this fall, and would inevitably miss votes. They have volunteered to return the salary that they would have earned for each day's worth of votes that they miss.

Both Green and Kennedy had stellar voting records in 2005. Green missed only seven and Kennedy missed none, being one of nine members to make every vote. While Kennedy has missed 20 votes in 2006, his office emphasizes that only 4 were missed because of campaigning.

Some of the 16 candidates running for higher office did not comment for this article.

Others were upfront. Gerry Fritz, spokeswoman for Rep. Katherine Harris's (R-Fla.), said, "She certainly tries to make as many votes as she can … [but] the campaign for Senate is the priority."

Harris is leaving the House in the long hopes of unseating Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.).

Casey College Speech Irks Some Catholics (WT)

Some Catholic conservatives are accusing the Catholic University of America of publicly favoring Democrat Bob Casey Jr. over Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania two months before an election that could decide who controls the Senate next year.

With the explicit permission of Catholic University's president, the Rev. David M. O'Connell, Mr. Casey will give the prestigious 38th annual Pope John XXIII Lecture tomorrow at the university's law school, Veryl Miles, the law school's dean, confirmed. Mr. Casey is an alumnus of Catholic.

Mrs. Miles acknowledged that Mr. Casey "has positions that differ from the church's teachings, but he is not being invited to speak on that."

"The university is clearly taking sides and has no business doing this in one of the most important elections in the country," said Bob Destro, a professor and former acting dean at the law school.

"The race is one of the most hotly contested and important in the country ... and the votes of the Catholic community are likely to provide the margin of victory," Mr. Destro said yesterday in a letter to Father O'Connell.

Other prominent people have been barred from formal addresses on the campus because their views differed from Catholic teaching, Mr. Destro and others noted.

"Casey should not be given a free pass to speak at a Catholic institution, given his public opposition to the church's teachings on some critical life issues and on 'homosexual marriage,'" said Joseph Cella, president of Fidelis, a Catholic activist group.

The Cardinal Newman Society issued its own protest, saying that by "choosing a Catholic dissenter and active U.S. candidate for a prestigious lecture on public morality, the Catholic University of America law school is compromising its academic purpose, Catholic mission and political neutrality."

Mr. Santorum, a Republican, is a pro-life Catholic who opposes same-sex "marriage." He has steadily narrowed the gap with his challenger and now trails Mr. Casey by 4 percentage points in the latest John Zogby poll.

Through an aide, Father O'Connell declined to say whether he thought the invitation to Mr. Casey would be read by many Catholic voters in Pennsylvania as a signal that the hierarchy of one of the nation's top-rated Catholic universities was embracing Mr. Casey's candidacy.

"Whoever selected Casey for this honor must have known the impact it could have on his political campaign, and that violates academic neutrality," said Cardinal Newman Society President Patrick J. Reilly in an e-mailed statement. "They also must be aware that, regardless of politics, inviting a public dissenter to speak on 'America's Moral Compass' is a scandal to the faithful and undermines [the university's] Catholic identity."

Father O'Connell could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Mrs. Miles said that in June, when she decided to invite Mr. Casey to lecture on the importance of pro bono work for Catholic lawyers, she didn't think a speech to be given in an academic setting in the nation's capital would have much to do with a Pennsylvania election.

"I did know he was running for the Senate, but we are not in Pennsylvania, and this is not an election that would impact this community in Washington," she said.

Angelides Camp Says It Gave Arnold Tape To Times (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

SACRAMENTO — The campaign of Democratic gubernatorial candidate and state Treasurer Phil Angelides today said it was the source of audiotapes of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that were published last week by The Times.

Campaign officials said a researcher obtained the tapes legally from Schwarzenegger's website.

A day earlier, Schwarzenegger administration officials had said the tape was downloaded from a password-protected section of the governor's computer system and thus was unauthorized and "a breach of one or more security protocols."

The administration also said the California Highway Patrol, which is responsible for safeguarding state property, would investigate.

David Garcia, director of media relations at The Times, reiterated today that the newspaper "does not reveal its confidential news sources."

Angelides campaign manager Cathy Calfo said her camp came by the audiotape easily without a password or hacking. She said an Angelides campaign researcher who downloads documents daily from government websites got the material by backtracking from a link sent out Aug. 29 by Schwarzenegger's press office.

The link was suppose to connect listeners with a tape of Schwarzenegger discussing Hurricane Katrina and other topics at Cal State Long Beach.

"They're, I think, trying to distort the issue, make this an issue about someone 'hacking' when no one hacked," said Calfo. "They made a mistake and now they're trying to cover it up."

Schwarzenegger campaign manager Steve Schmidt, in a conversation with reporters today, offered no evidence that the audiotape had been downloaded from a password-protected site. He referred to a statement issued Monday by Schwarzenegger legal affairs secretary Andrea Hoch that described the site as private and requiring the use of passwords. Schmidt also questioned why the Angelides campaign would leak the tape if it was publicly available.

Calfo said the researcher used the link in the Schwarzenegger press release to download four hours of tapes that included six minutes of Schwarzenegger bantering last spring with his chief of staff, a speechwriter and a speech coach.

In that casual conversation, the governor described Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City) as "hot" — a fiery personality — and attributed that temperament to a mix of "black blood" and "Latino blood."

On the recording, the governor and his staff also comment on other lawmakers: Republican Assembly members Kevin McCarthy of Bakersfield and George Plescia of San Diego, calling McCarthy "Bakersfield boy" and comparing Plescia to a startled deer.

After The Times published the audiotape last week, the governor apologized and said reading a transcription of his comments made him cringe.

Calfo said that she did not know that campaign workers had obtained the audiotape until Monday afternoon, and she added that she was "not happy" about it. She described Angelides as "surprised" and "disappointed."

"The information was accessible on a public website," said Calfo. "I can say I would have handled it very differently. I think that I would have directed reporters to that public website.

"I feel like a decision like that should have been made at the highest levels of the campaign and it wasn't," she said.

Angelides spokeswoman Amanda Crumley identified the two campaign workers involved in the downloading and leak as researcher Sean Sullivan and press spokesman Dan Newman.

On Monday, the communications director for the Schwarzenegger campaign called on Angelides to denounce "the unethical actions" taken on his behalf.

"Phil Angelides has a long history of gutter politics," said Katie Levinson in a statement, "and it is clear this most recent example was a calculated effort to smear the governor's reputation." nancy.vogel@latimes.com

Rival Admits Leaking Schwarzenegger Tape (AP-Y)

By Laura Kurtzman

AP, September 12, 2006

The campaign of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's Democratic rival acknowledged Tuesday that it downloaded — and leaked to the media — a recording of a private meeting in which the governor described a Hispanic legislator as having a "very hot" personality.

But Cathy Calfo, campaign manager for Democrat Phil Angelides, said the campaign had done nothing wrong because the file was available publicly on the governor's Web site.

"No one hacked," Calfo said at a news conference to address the role played by the Angelides campaign, first reported by The Sacramento Bee. "They accessed information that was available to the public."

Schwarzenegger spokesman Adam Mendelsohn said someone would have had to snoop to find the audio file.

"The file that was leaked to the Los Angeles Times was in a private area of the governor's server not accessible to the public without manipulation of information," he said.

Schwarzenegger's legal affairs secretary, Andrea Lynn Hoch, said the sound file was stored in a password-protected area. She said she forwarded the Internet Protocol address used to download the file to the California Highway Patrol, which is investigating.

Calfo said she was unhappy that two campaign staffers had passed the audio clip to the Times without her knowledge. Angelides did not know about it, either, she said.

"We're looking into it now," she said. "Am I happy? No."

Earlier Tuesday, Schwarzenegger campaign spokeswoman Katie Levinson called on Angelides to "denounce the unethical actions taken on his behalf" and accused him of trying to smear the governor. Schwarzenegger is seeking re-election in November.

The recording of the governor's comments caused a minor controversy, with some Democrats complaining bitterly and others saying the remarks were playful and not offensive.

The recording was made during a speech-writing session in the governor's office last March. In it, Schwarzenegger and his chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, speculate lightheartedly about the ethnic background of state Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia.

After they chat about whether she is Cuban or Puerto Rican, Schwarzenegger says: "They are all very hot. They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

With Garcia by his side, the governor apologized for his remarks on Friday, saying he cringed when he read them. Garcia said she was not offended.

Schwarzenegger, who was in Los Angeles on Tuesday to sign a bill raising the minimum wage, said of the controversy: "I don't really want to interfere with all this little, trivial things."

Asked whether the recording could have been on a public part of the governor's Web site, Schwarzenegger said, "Let the experts deal with that."

Governor's Comments Were Leaked By Foe's Camp (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 12 — The campaign of the Democratic candidate for governor, Phil Angelides, said Tuesday that it was the source of audio files containing impolitic remarks by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. Those remarks were the subject of a front page article last week in The Los Angeles Times, which led to an apology by the governor.

Mr. Angelides's campaign manager, Cathy Calfo, said at a news conference in Sacramento that the files had been culled from a Web site accessible by the public and that campaign staff members had not trespassed into a secure area of the governor's office.

The California Highway Patrol, at the request of Mr. Schwarzenegger's office, is investigating whether the files were obtained illegally. Mr. Schwarzenegger's communications director, Adam Mendelsohn, said Tuesday that while the Web site with the audio files was not as secure as it ought to be, it was not publicly accessible.

"That area was password protected," Mr. Mendelsohn said, "but the administration knows that with enough manipulation, it could be accessed."

Last week, The Los Angeles Times reported that in a private meeting with his chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, and one of his speechwriters, Gary Delsohn, Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, surmised that a Republican colleague of Puerto Rican descent was passionate because of her ethnicity. The exchange had been recorded by Mr. Delsohn to use as reference material.

"I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot," Mr. Schwarzenegger said, comparing the colleague, Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia, to a bodybuilder he once knew. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

While Ms. Garcia said she did not mind the remark, the Angelides campaign sharply criticized the governor, who called a news conference on Friday and offered an apology. The matter was then referred to the Highway Patrol, which is in charge of policing state facilities.

Speaking to reporters on Tuesday, Ms. Calfo called the Schwarzenegger camp's characterization of the episode "politically motivated" and "outrageous" and added, "We believe these audio files accessed through a public Web site requiring no password are a matter of public record."

She said that anyone who received a news release e-mailed by the governor's office in August with an audio file about Hurricane Katrina could have clicked on a link and with a few strikes of the backspace key have been linked to the audio files. Those files, she said, have since been removed from the site.

Ms. Calfo said two members of the campaign staff — one in the press office and another in the research department — gave the downloaded files to The Los Angeles Times without her knowledge. She was "not happy about it," she said.

The episode is perhaps the singular snapshot of the sleepy governor's race, in which Mr. Schwarzenegger has trotted far ahead of Mr. Angelides but once again has found that his biggest liability can be the space between his nose and his chin.

His remarks about Democrats, women, nurses and others since taking office in 2003 have caused controversy many times, and dogged him during his first campaign.

"This reminds us that Arnold Schwarzenegger is capable of verbal self-destruction at any point in the campaign," said Bruce E. Cain, the director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley.

At the same time, Mr. Angelides, has been unable to use a weak moment for Mr. Schwarzenegger to define his own campaign better. Instead, he has been put on the defensive and his campaign forced to fend off claims of being underhanded.

"Voters know that Arnold has a penchant for saying things he shouldn't say," said Garry South, a Democratic political consultant. "But they don't have a clue who Phil Angelides is."

Thad Kousser, a professor of political science at the University of California, San Diego, said that neither side had emerged particularly well from the episode, but that that could change if it was determined whether the Web site was publicly accessible.

DOJ_NMG_0062511

"If it turns out that the tape was hacked," Mr. Kousser said, "it feeds into the feeling about the Angelides campaign that he is too political and too negative."

Either way, it is not the stuff of a great policy debate, he said.

"This is California politics," Mr. Kousser added, "so it always seems ridiculous."

Colorado Rule Limits Union's Contributions (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

DENVER -- Colorado Secretary of State Gigi Dennis is taking on the state's powerful unions over their anonymous donations on behalf of their members to political campaigns.

Mrs. Dennis, a Republican, ruled last month that small-donor committees, the source of most union contributions, must have permission from contributors before they can use dues money for political campaigns.

She also required such committees to attest that the donations came from U.S. citizens, as mandated by the state constitution. Small-donor committees typically bundle contributions of less than $20, which are not subject to disclosure laws.

State Democrats and union leaders have fired back with a lawsuit that goes before a hearing tomorrow in Denver District Court.

Clear Peak Colorado, a left-leaning 527 group, is running radio ads accusing Mrs. Dennis of "trying to muffle thousands of Coloradans -- teachers, nurses, firefighters, workers of all kinds." A 527 is an independent political advocacy group so named for the section of the IRS code that governs its nonprofit status.

"She's clearly using her office as a platform to advance the Republican agenda," said John Willard, spokesman for Clear Peak Colorado.

But state Republicans, who have long complained about the lack of transparency in union giving to Democrats, cheered the move as a necessary step in ridding the political system of potentially illegal donations.

"It is time to Colorado's unions to stop collecting political money from people who are illegally in this country," said Colorado Republican Party Chairman Bob Martinez.

Republican political consultant Rob Fairbank said small-group committees gave $1.5 million in bundled, anonymous donations in the 2004 legislative races. Democrats took over both houses of the legislature that year after a surge in campaign spending.

Before the Aug. 5 ruling, unions had contributed $1.35 million to Democratic legislative candidates, accounting for more than 40 percent of Democratic fundraising in key legislative races, according to a Rocky Mountain News analysis.

"You have this large amount of anonymous money that goes into campaigns at a rate of 10 times more than individuals can give," Mr. Fairbank said. "There's a reason to believe that some of this is coming from noncitizens."

Mr. Fairbank, a former state legislator, has filed his own complaint with the Secretary of State's Office against the union Mountain West Regional Council of Carpenters, arguing that the small-donor committee knowingly accepts donations from illegal aliens.

The union differs from others in that it lists members who give political contributions of less than $20. Mr. Fairbank's consulting group, Politically Direct, did a spot check of those donors and found four noncitizens.

He was tipped off to possible abuse by union executive Jim Gleason, who was quoted two weeks ago as saying that his union is trying to recruit immigrants to bolster its membership.

"When you have union bosses in Colorado stating that large numbers of their members are not U.S. citizens, then the secretary of state has a responsibility to do something," Mr. Fairbanks said.

Not so, said critics, who say Mrs. Dennis is more interested in cutting off Democratic campaign funding than catching a few illegal donors.

Democrats also argue that Mrs. Dennis has overstepped her authority, noting that the state legislature recently defeated a so-called "paycheck protection" bill that would have required unions to ask permission before using dues for political campaigns.

Mrs. Dennis said she was following the orders of voters, who in 2002 approved Amendment 27, a campaign-finance reform initiative that requires the secretary of state to "promulgate such rules ... as may be necessary to administer and enforce" the amendment.

New Stem Cell Ethics Issue Emerges (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062512

UC San Francisco researcher Renee Reijo Pera has a well-equipped laboratory, generous funding and an ample staff of scientists working to create new lines of embryonic stem cells.

She has everything she needs to do cutting-edge work except one thing: fresh human eggs.

While the world debates the morality of stem cell research, scientists are grappling with a more basic issue — a shortage of eggs that they say is crippling their work.

"Without eggs, there's no research," said Dr. Robert Lanza, medical director of the biotechnology company Advanced Cell Technology Inc.

Women routinely provide their eggs to fertility clinic patients, who pay $5,000 to $50,000.

But stem cell researchers are forbidden to pay for eggs by ethical guidelines from some of the most influential scientific organizations in the world, including the National Academies, which advises the U.S. government on scientific issues. California, Massachusetts, Canada, South Korea and the European Union all have passed laws barring payments.

Laurie Zoloth, a bioethicist at Northwestern University's Feinberg School of Medicine, said payments to donors would create an exploitative trade, taking advantage of women who might be so desperate for money that it clouded their judgment about the medical risks of the harvesting procedure. Bone marrow and kidney donors are unpaid for that reason, she said.

But stem cell researchers argue that it is only fair to pay donors because of the time, discomfort and risks involved. They note that research subjects are compensated for their time.

Researchers have so far complied with the payment restrictions, but the shortage has become so acute that some scientists are beginning to contest the ethical underpinnings of the status quo.

"We need to make a decision: Do you want the research to proceed or not?" Lanza said.

Though much stem cell research can be conducted without human eggs, they are key to one of the most important areas: the creation of stem cells that are genetically matched to patients.

These cells could generate replacement tissues for damaged hearts, spinal cords and other organs without requiring patients to take anti-rejection drugs. Researchers also say they would be able to create cells with the genes for specific disorders to study without risking a patient's safety.

Traditional embryonic stem cells are derived from fertility clinic leftovers. Their genetic makeup is left to chance. Customized stem cells are given a specific genetic identity from a particular patient. They are clones of a patient's cells.

Creating them requires a bit of biochemical magic. Scientists remove the DNA from an egg and replace it with DNA from the patient. Then the egg must be tricked into dividing as if it had been fertilized.

The technique, called somatic cell nuclear transfer, produced Dolly the cloned sheep in 1996. It has since been used to clone horses, cats, one dog and other animals.

Stem cell researchers aren't interested in cloning babies. They only want the cloned cells to divide for a few days until they form a cluster of about 150 cells, known as a blastocyst. Then they can harvest the stem cells.

The problem is that getting cells to reach that point is difficult. Disgraced South Korean scientist Hwang Woo-suk went through 2,236 eggs, and as government investigators later discovered, he did not produce a single embryo.

British researcher Alison P. Murdoch at Newcastle University created three human embryo clones, but none lasted long enough to produce stem cells.

Acquiring thousands of eggs will take more than an appeal to the altruism of volunteers, scientists fear.

Extracting eggs involves weeks of psychological and medical testing, followed by more than a week of hormone injections. When the time is right, the donor is sedated as a doctor uses a long needle to extract eggs in their follicles. One cycle typically produces seven or eight usable eggs.

The procedure, though routine, includes such possible risks as bloating, headaches and ovarian hyperstimulation, which can be fatal.

Despite opposition from some social conservatives, paying women to donate eggs for in vitro fertilization has become a largely accepted practice, partly because the goal is to help a someone have a baby.

Stem cell research, on the other hand, is steeped in controversy, and the idea of donors profiting from a process that ultimately destroys embryos is viewed by many as unseemly.

The first explicit prohibition on paying egg donors appeared in Proposition 71, the 2004 California initiative that authorized $3 billion in state spending on stem cell research. In an effort to prevent the exploitation of women and to make the measure more appealing to voters, it specifically ruled out compensation to publicly funded researchers, though it does permit reimbursement for some expenses.

That policy influenced the National Academies, which warned in a 2005 report that payments to egg donors "might undermine public confidence" in stem cell research.

Although the organization can't enforce its guidelines, they became the ethical blueprint for most American universities and private labs.

The controversy has delayed UCSF's plans to accept donor eggs for research. The result is that Reijo Pera's lab must rely on leftover eggs that didn't merge with sperm in the university's in vitro fertilization clinic.

Such "failed-to-fertilize" eggs have become the workhorse of nuclear transfer experiments, even though researchers suspect the eggs are too flawed to produce cloned embryos.

Scientists have been speaking out, testifying before legislators in Massachusetts, where compensation was outlawed last year, and California, where a bill banning all compensation was sent to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Aug. 31.

The controversy prompted the American Society for Reproductive Medicine's ethics committee to revisit the issue. The panel concluded that if it was permissible for fertility patients to pay women for their eggs, stem cell researchers should be able to do so too.

"Regardless of the application of the eggs, the process was still the same," said the committee's chairman, Dr. Robert G. Brzyski, a reproductive endocrinologist at University of Texas Health Science Center at San Antonio.

So far, the lobbying efforts haven't made much difference. The payment restrictions in California's Proposition 71 have become the de facto standard throughout the world, in large part because researchers elsewhere have to play by those rules if they want to collaborate with state-funded scientists.

Proposition 71's rules cannot be changed until three years after its passage.

That has forced researchers to get creative. Murdoch, of Newcastle University, is offering to fund fertility treatment for women who are willing to give half their eggs to scientists.

Though critics see the bargain as tantamount to paying women for their eggs, Murdoch notes a key difference: The women are already seeking in vitro fertilization, so they aren't taking on medical risk for money.

Researchers also are pursuing scientific solutions, such as trying to artificially ripen immature eggs that are discarded by fertility clinics. Scientists also have considered salvaging eggs from ovaries that are removed during routine surgeries and growing them from scratch using human embryonic stem cells.

"The egg bottleneck will be overcome," said Dr. Irving L. Weissman, director of Stanford University's Institute for Stem Cell Biology and Regenerative Medicine. But "it will take time."

In the meantime, Advanced Cell Technology is relying on newspaper ads to recruit egg donors. Several women responded to the ads, which began running in December, but backed out when they learned they could not be compensated, Lanza said.

After 10 months, one woman has passed the physical and mental health exams. She was scheduled to begin the egg retrieval regimen last week and could have eight eggs ready to harvest in early October.

Senator May Ease View On Portfolios Of Fannie, Freddie (WSJ)

By Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a move that could clear the way for congressional passage of legislation toughening the regulation of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, Senate Banking Chairman Richard Shelby indicated new flexibility on the most divisive issue: specific limits on the mortgage giants' portfolios.

Mr. Shelby said that as long as the risks posed by the companies' size are addressed, it might not matter if specific portfolio limits are written into law or if this is overseen by a strong new federal regulator. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, emerging from separate accounting scandals, together hold more than $1.4 trillion in their mortgage portfolios. "There has to be some concern about the growth of the portfolios, because that's where the risk is," Mr. Shelby said in an interview.

The Treasury Department also signaled more flexibility yesterday. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has "clearly indicated a willingness to discuss meaningful alternative solutions" to address risks posed by the companies, said Randal Quarles, undersecretary for domestic finance. In the past, Mr. Shelby has pressed for specific limits on the companies' portfolios. Last year, his committee narrowly passed a bill to establish a new regulator and force the companies to strip certain assets from their portfolios.

Separately, Freddie Mac said the Justice Department's investigation into the company's $5 billion accounting scandal is inactive, and it doesn't expect to face charges. Freddie Mac spokesman Doug Duvall said federal prosecutors have "not initiated contact with us in well over two years and it is our understanding that the matter is inactive. Accordingly, we expect no further action in this matter." A spokesman for Chuck Rosenberg, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, declined to comment. News that the investigation into Freddie Mac appeared to have ended was reported earlier by the Washington Post.

Flush With Jobs, Wyoming Woos Rust Belt Labor (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0062514

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

GILLETTE, Wyo., Sept. 6 — Houston Mellentine, 10, held up the rattlesnake tail he kept in a box. "Killed it right over there," he said, pointing to the edge of his family's dirt front yard.

His mother, Melissa, sat in a folding chair as the sun set one recent evening, eyeing the snake's tail in her son's hand. "They don't have rattlesnakes in Michigan," she said somewhat longingly, at least not in her old front yard.

But then, Michigan has few of the types of jobs that brought the Mellentines here.

Labor-starved Wyoming, with its energy boom in coal, oil and natural gas, is vigorously courting the workers of the Rust Belt — in particular, those in Michigan's struggling auto industry. And the workers are responding, and adjusting to a very different life in the West.

Wyoming economic development officials and company representatives are planning their third recruiting trip this year, visiting job fairs next month in Flint, Lansing and Grand Rapids. A billboard depicting a lush Wyoming will go up on the highway outside Flint later this month and be seen by an estimated 65,000 people a day.

"Michigan has been very good for us," said Ruth Benson, the director of the Campbell County Economic Development Corporation, who has twice led recruiting expeditions to depressed cities in Michigan.

So far, about 1,500 Michigan residents have signed up to receive job postings through the Wyoming work force Web site, and at least several hundred, employers and recruiters say, have moved to the state.

Mrs. Mellentine's husband, Joe, is one of those who heard the call. Mr. Mellentine, 35, a former ironworker and landscaper from Chesaning, just outside Flint, moved here in March after hearing about Wyoming at a job fair. "I came to get a piece of the American pie," said Mr. Mellentine, who works for a company that prepares sites for natural gas drilling.

Mrs. Mellentine and their two sons joined him in July, and he has since talked three of his childhood friends in Michigan into heading West as well.

They are all still very much adjusting to the change. But many former Michigan residents say their Wyoming experience — voting for change with their feet, trading the comfortable and familiar for a boomtown life more than 1,000 miles from home — has reaffirmed their faith that good things can still happen with a little gumption.

"A lot of people are afraid to take a chance," said Eric Chapdelaine, 33, who was lured here by Mr. Mellentine and is now driving a cargo truck to coal mines and drilling sites. "But you've got to make it happen — or sit back and let it happen."

The local police are also aware of the Michigan labor pool. Chief Richard Adriaens of the Gillette police was hired in 2004 from a suburb near Detroit. Since then, he has returned and found three more fellow Michiganders to add to the town's 48-officer roster, with another recruiting swing planned for later this year.

Michigan is attractive, Chief Adriaens said, because the police training is excellent, but the job market is not. "We've tried some other areas that had depressed economies, but they weren't the same," he said.

Officials in Michigan, where the unemployment rate was about 7 percent in July, said they were unconcerned about the Wyoming employment campaign, mostly because it had involved only a small fraction of the state's workers and had not signaled a wholesale migration. The state also has some experience with this situation: in the early 1980's, thousands of laid-off auto workers moved to Texas during the oil boom there.

"It's a good thing that people that have salable skills use them, even when we have to lose them," said Michael Shore, a spokesman for the Michigan Economic Development Corporation.

By the standards of the nation's past great labor migrations — the industrial revolution in the late 1800's that filled urban factories with former farmers, the Dust Bowl diaspora to California in the 1930's, the tide of blacks from the South in World War II seeking work in northern factories — what is happening here is an aberration, historians and geographers say.

Economic trends have mostly gone the other way since World War II, they say, anchoring blue-collar life. Families that require two incomes to make ends meet are less able to leave, even when one income is lost. A college education increases knowledge of options that may exist elsewhere, but many blue-collar workers do not have a degree.

"People with high education and skills are the first to leave a declining area," said Mark E. Reisinger, an assistant professor of geography at the State University of New York at Binghamton who studies labor mobility. "People who never left home to go to school are more tied to place."

Wyoming recruiters say there is another element to their admiration for Michigan. Not only are the people there akin to Wyomingites in the ways and wiles of work, but they also have an inner toughness, they say, that can only come from surviving harsh northern winters.

The state tried a job campaign in the South last fall after Hurricane Katrina, hoping to draw displaced oil industry workers. But the effort largely flopped when people who were used to working on the balmy Gulf Coast got wind of what life can be like in Wyoming in January.

"People keep talking about the winters, but I'm not scared," said Tami Studer, who moved to Casper this summer from Lansing with her husband, Philip, who now works nights for a company that makes equipment for natural gas drilling. One conversation at the local Wal-Mart, though, did give her pause, she said. A boy was talking about the thermometer hitting 43 below.

The other word often mentioned by the newly arrived is "empty." Wyoming has just about 500,000 people spread across 97,000 square miles. Michigan has nearly 10 million people in 57,000 square miles.

"I thought I was a country girl until I came here," Mrs. Mellentine said. "But I love it."

What happens down the road in Wyoming — whether transplanted lives will take root or last just a season or two — will probably depend on people like Josh Dagen.

Mr. Dagen is 19 and three months out of Byron High School in Michigan. He arrived here in late July, had a job the next day driving a dump truck at a coal mine and now makes about $1,000 a week, including overtime, he said.

When asked if he planned to stay in Wyoming, he said, "I'm not sure yet."

"But if things go well," he added, "I might stay, because nothing is going to happen in Michigan in the next 10 years at least, and there's money out here to be made."

Mr. Dagen said he was encouraging his parents to move.

"We're thinking about it," his mother, Kristine, said in a telephone interview. "Seems like every other person I talk to knows somebody who's going out there, or has gone out there, or is talking about it."

But Harley Mellentine, Houston's 12-year-old brother, is not so sure that Wyoming will be a perfect fit for him.

"Michigan will always be home," he said firmly, sitting outside the family house. "No matter how long we stay here, Michigan is always going to be home to me."

America's Dynamic Workforce (HILL)

By Elaine Chao

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Those who hoped that the collapse of the World Trade Center buildings would collapse the American economy have been greatly disappointed. Five-years after those horrific attacks, America's economy is strong and growing — thanks to the strength, resiliency and competitiveness of our nation's economy and our workforce.

The national unemployment rate (4.7 percent in August) is a full one percent lower than the 5.7 percent average for the decade of the 1990s. Our economy has generated job growth for 36 months straight, with more than 5.7 million net new jobs created since August 2003. In 2005, real hourly earnings were 1.7 percent higher than in 2000, compared to a 1.6 percent decline in real earnings between 1990 and 1995.

Moreover, the average amount of total compensation in 2005 was 7 percent higher than in 2000. Workers know that overall compensation is what really counts because it includes all of the benefits that workers cherish, including health care coverage, paid time off and retirement benefits.

After-tax income, per capita, has gone up by 8.9 percent since the beginning of President George W. Bush's administration. That means more money in the pockets of working men and women.

Specifically, it means that the average American brings home over $2,000 more each year than they did in January 2001. That's real (inflation-adjusted) money that is going to be spent, saved or invested by the people who earned it. Despite the unprecedented challenges that our country has faced over the past five years, the president's policies have created the climate for the steady, consistent growth that is the envy of other major industrialized nations.

Germany and France, for example, have unemployment rates nearly double that of the U.S. and long-term unemployment rates that are nearly three times as high. The median length of unemployment in Germany is more than 52 weeks, compared with 8.9 weeks for Americans. And in Europe, gasoline prices are more than $6 per gallon! A snapshot of our nation's economy and workforce are included in a newly released Department of Labor publication entitled America's Dynamic Workforce.

Today, America competes in a worldwide economy. Some countries are vying with each other to attract the lowest-skilled, lowest-paid jobs. That's not where America's economic future lies. Our country must attract and create the highest-skilled, highest-paid jobs in the world for America's workers.

There are millions of new jobs in industries that did not exist a generation ago. These industries provide high-value, high-paying jobs and demand workers with higher skills and more education. This does not necessarily mean a 4-year college degree, but it does mean that additional specialized training will become the norm for the American worker.

For workers supporting families, making house and car payments and contributing to their retirement, affording the cost of continuing education can seem a stretch. That's why this administration strives to make effective investments in worthwhile education and training programs that prepare workers for jobs. And that's why this administration advocates innovative ways for workers to access career development opportunities.

The president's Career Advancement Accounts proposal would empower eligible workers with up to $3,000 to purchase the education and training that suits them best. Career Advancement Accounts would give many workers a chance to take the next step up the career ladder, increasing the opportunity for them to achieve their American dream. Career Advancement Accounts are Pell grants for workers.

America's greatest economic strengths are our workforce and an economic system that empowers the individual and creates limitless opportunities to build better lives. The challenge is to ensure that our nation's workers have access to the education and skills training they need to thrive and remain competitive in the 21st century economy. With the right tools and skills, American workers can and will out-compete anyone in the world.

Chao is the U.S. Secretary of Labor. For a copy of the America's Dynamic Workforce publication go to www.dol.gov.

Why I Started The Project (USAT)

By Grover Norquist

USA Today, September 13, 2006

In 1989, I read an advertisement placed by a major American corporation, whose central concerns were promoting free trade and low taxes, looking for a chief Washington lobbyist. The ad specified the company was looking for a Democrat. But why? Most Democrats were opposing free trade and low taxes, and supporting trial lawyer abuse of companies such as the one looking to hire.

Why did the ad demand a Democrat? Because the year was 1989 and we were in the 35th year of Democrat Party dominance of the House of Representatives. Businesses were told to hire Democrats and contribute to Democrats (or else!) even though most opposed the goals of American business. Many businesses hired and contributed as they were told. They "paid to play." In his book Honest Graft, longtime journalist Brooks Jackson describes how Democrat enforcer Tony Coehlo operated to get free-market businesses to act against the interest of their shareholders.

That is why, in 1989, I created the K Street Project to encourage trade associations and Washington offices of Fortune 500 firms to hire men and women who share their values and goals: low taxes, less spending, free trade — and to avoid the pressures to hire for "access." The K Street Project is transparent. Its website is www.Kstreetproject.com.

Some partisan Democrats have claimed that the K Street Project is the Republican version of how Coehlo and the Democrat majority acted for 40 years. Here they are just projecting their own misbehavior. If any Republican today says "hire my staff" for access, that is just as wrong as when the Democrat majority did it for 40 years.

My goal is a Washington where labor unions hire big-government, tax-and-spend liberals because that is what they believe in — regardless of whether the presidency or Congress is Republican or Democrat. And where businesses that want simply to be left alone should hire free-market men and women who understand that low taxes, limited government and an end to runaway labor union and trial lawyer abuses are good for America and good for their employees, customers and stockholders.

Hire for principle and sound policy, not access.

Grover Norquist is president of Americans for Tax Reform and founder of the K Street Project.

Amid Scandals, GOP Keeps Lobbyist Machine Humming (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

A snapshot of ethics on Capitol Hill this year is not a pretty picture. Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader known for hardball tactics and coziness with lobbyists, was indicted and resigned. His pal, superlobbyist Jack Abramoff, is set to report to prison Oct. 2. Ex-representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., is already there.

Numerous laws, meanwhile, have been larded with tax breaks and money earmarked for special interests, thanks in part to a burgeoning lobbying community that views Washington less as a seat of government than as a potential profit center.

With all this, one might think that a sense of shame would prompt Congress to clean up the stench, particularly with the elections a mere eight weeks away. Think again. Virtually nothing has changed.

Nowhere is this clearer than in an organization called the K Street Project. Named for the road that is home to many of Washington's biggest lobbying firms, it is dedicated to the proposition that lobbyists — at least those who represent business interests — can be brought into the Republican coalition to keep the party in the majority.

Despite all that has transpired, the K Street Project lumbers on, keeping tabs on who is hired by major lobbying firms and trade associations. The process enables a broader GOP effort to badger those firms into hiring Republicans, and the firms to go to Capitol Hill to ask for favors in return. On Tuesday, the home page of the Project's website reported in bold red letters that

Pulte Homes' new lobbyist has contributed to the Bush/Cheney '04 campaign, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., and the Republican National Committee.

The K Street Project, founded by anti-tax activist Grover Norquist, is more a symbol than a cause of what's amiss in Washington. But it serves as clear illustration of how badly broken Congress is, how little desire there is to fix it, and how far the GOP has strayed from the principles of limited government and unfettered free enterprise. It forces Republicans to abandon core principles by picking winners and losers among industries, based on how willing they are to play along. Results include:

·Micromanaging business. Several recent laws have rewarded some industries and punished others. The most notorious, a 2004 tax bill, granted lavish tax breaks to Oldsmobile dealers and multinational drug companies, among other businesses, while ignoring the film industry, which had dared to hire a Democrat as its top lobbyist.

·Profligate spending. Federal spending, as a percentage of the economy, has risen faster in the past five years than at any time since the New Deal. Among the reasons are lavish giveaways to powerful lobbies, such as energy and drugs, and billions "earmarked" to clients of well-connected lobbyists.

Many Republicans argue the group does nothing that Democrats didn't do when they controlled Congress, and certainly the Democrats' behavior was tawdry for its time. But the philosophy behind the K Street Project takes this behavior to an extreme. It says a lobbyist's political ideology and donations are more important than his or her ability to marshal facts on behalf of the client.

That kind of thinking explains why Washington is such a mess these days — and why visitors might not want to bring a camera.

The Mess In Montgomery (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

UNTOLD NUMBERS of people were turned away from polling places yesterday in Montgomery County. The official responsible for their disenfranchisement called it "a clerical error." We call it gross incompetence that strikes at the very heart of our government. More than apologies are in order.

Election officials in Maryland's largest and richest jurisdiction, one that prides itself on a reputation for good service, forgot to deliver the computer cards that operate the voting machines. Confusion reigned. Some people were told they couldn't vote and should come back later. Others were given paper provisional ballots, but many precincts ran out of the forms. Communication was abysmal. Many voters who could not make a return trip were frustrated -- as were candidates who feared that the debacle could well make the difference in a close race. With important local, state and federal offices at stake, some were questioning the legitimacy of the election even before the polls closed.

The county Board of Elections has one essential job -- to ensure fair elections -- and yesterday that job wasn't done. The system needs to be held to account. Board President Nancy H. Dacek has promised an investigation, but her standing has been so damaged that she must consider whether her continuance in office serves the public good. Election Director Margaret Jurgensen is paid $113,033 a year to run day-to-day operations; part of that must be telling the public exactly who and what went wrong and what the consequences and remedies are.

It's important to keep politics out of this, and to that end, we were sorry to see Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- who controls the majority of appointments on local election boards and who, in fact, appointed Ms. Dacek -- try to lay blame for what was clearly a local mistake with the state elections administrator, with whom he is feuding. Equally absurd is the Democratic claim that the governor is at fault because he opposed early voting that would have brought the problem to the surface sooner.

Voters, Democratic and Republican, want one thing -- for their votes to count. The officials charged with that should take a hard look at yesterday's voting in Montgomery, as well as in Baltimore, which also experienced problems, and make sure there is not a repeat on Nov. 7.

Eliminating Early Admissions (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Harvard did the right thing by abandoning its early admissions program, the first elite college to do so. We hope other institutions follow its lead and eliminate a process that is inevitably unfair and simply increases the frenzy of a college application process that is unnecessarily pressurized.

Early admissions programs allow students to apply early, typically in November, and get a prompt answer, usually in mid-December, before the regular application season begins in January. The most draconian of these programs require students to agree in advance that they will accept admission if it is offered. Those rejected have a couple of frantic weeks to apply elsewhere.

Colleges love these programs because they can lock in students who really want to enroll, gain an early sense of how admissions are going, and spread out the workload of evaluating applicants. For high-achieving students, it means knowing early whether they will get into their dream college. There is some evidence that applying early increases the chance of admission.

But educators have come to realize that the binding programs have two pernicious effects. They discriminate against students who need financial aid and thus can't commit themselves to one university before they have a chance to compare the aid packages offered by other schools. And they force students to pick a college in the fall, rather than make a more considered choice in the spring.

Harvard has long had a relatively relaxed policy that mitigates some of these problems. Students who apply by Nov. 1 are notified by Dec. 15 as to whether they are admitted, rejected or deferred to the regular pool for further consideration. They don't have to answer Harvard's offer of admission until May 1 and can shop around for better offers. Several other schools, including Yale and Stanford, have adopted similar policies.

Now Harvard has decided to go cold turkey and eliminate its early admissions program beginning with the freshman class entering in September 2008. This is a big step given that 38 percent of the students admitted last year were granted early admission. There will be a two- to three-year trial period to make sure the change does not adversely affect student quality.

Harvard cited several good reasons for the change. It will make the system fairer because students from sophisticated backgrounds and affluent high schools are far more likely to apply for an early admission than minority students or those from high schools with few counselors. It will help reduce the frenzy that has high school students worrying about college choices in their junior years. It will give admissions officers another semester of performance to consider instead of basing early admission on the junior-year record. And there will be the collateral benefit of encouraging high school seniors to keep studying well into the spring instead of goofing off the minute they receive early admission.

By delaying its shift until next fall, Harvard hopes that other institutions will join it. The University of Delaware has already announced a similar move. Harried students and parents should welcome these steps toward a more sensible process.

Syrians Fight Off Attack On U.S. Embassy (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, September 12, 2006

Syrian guards foiled an attempt by suspected al-Qaida-linked militants to blow up the U.S. Embassy on Tuesday, exchanging fire outside the compound's walls with gunmen who shouted "God is great" and tried to storm in with automatic weapons and hand grenades.

The brazen, midmorning assault in a heavily guarded neighborhood of the capital could highlight the Syrian regime's weakening grip on militants, who have battled Syrian security forces repeatedly in recent years.

The attack, which left at least 10 civilians and a Chinese diplomat wounded, came amid high tension between Washington and Damascus.

The rapid response by Syrian guards won rare praise from the United States, which accuses President Bashar Assad's government of supporting terrorism in its backing of Hezbollah guerrillas and Palestinian militants.

"I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. No Americans were hurt, and the embassy was not damaged.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also thanked Syrian officials and called for Damascus to "become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists."

But Syria responded with a sharp criticism of the United States, blaming its policies in Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinian territories for increasing Islamic militancy.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," the Syrian Embassy in Washington said in a statement. "The U.S. should ... start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

It curtly said that Syria "performed its duties" under the Geneva Conventions to protect the embassy.

Anti-American sentiment has been rising across the Middle East since Israel's 34-day blitz of Hezbollah in Lebanon that ended nearly a month ago, on top of turmoil in Iraq that many here blame on the United States.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for Tuesday's attack, but suspicion immediately fell on a little-known al-Qaida offshoot called Jund al-Sham, Arabic for Soldiers of Syria.

Syria's ambassador to the U.S., Imad Moustapha, told The Associated Press it was too early to say but "it's logically possible" Jund al-Sham was responsible.

If confirmed, it would be the boldest and most sophisticated attack yet by Jund al-Sham.

DOJ_NMG_0062519

At the State Department, deputy spokesman Tom Casey said: "Clearly, it was an organized terrorist attack on our embassy. But exactly who was responsible for it and who they might be affiliated with and what their motives are, are things that we'll just have to look at as the days go on."

Three attackers and a Syrian guard were killed in the attempted bombing of the embassy, located in the same neighborhood as Assad's office and residence. A fourth attacker was wounded and arrested.

The attackers came in two cars, one of them an explosives-laden pickup truck. The first car pulled up in front of the embassy's entrance and three gunmen burst out. Shouting "Allahu akbar" — "God is great" — they threw hand grenades and fired automatic weapons toward the gate and a Syrian guard post, sparking a 15-minute gunbattle.

At the same time, the truck — filled with pipe bombs rigged to gas canisters — pulled up to another gate on the other side of the triangle-shaped compound. But when the shooting erupted, the driver ran away without detonating it. The driver was shot and arrested, and the truck did not explode.

The three attackers tried to throw their grenades over the embassy's white 15-foot-high walls, but none made it over. One blast peppered the wall with pockmarks.

Three Syrian security agents were wounded as well as the 10 civilians and the Chinese diplomat who was watching the gunbattle from the rooftop of the Chinese Embassy across the street.

After the attack, blood was splattered on the sidewalk outside the embassy, along with the burned-out car used by the gunmen.

The U.S. Embassy has about 40 staffers, but no ambassador. The United States withdrew its ambassador several days after the Feb. 14, 2005, assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in a Beirut car bomb — an attack his supporters blamed on Syria. Damascus has denied any role, but the Hariri's killing further soured U.S.-Syrian ties.

Tuesday's attack raised the question of how strong militant groups have grown in Syria — where the highly closed government rarely releases information on security issues, making assessing the terror threat difficult.

Sunni Muslim extremists such as al-Qaida fiercely despise Assad's regime because of its secular ideology and because his father, the late President Hafez Assad, led a crackdown on Muslim fundamentalists that killed thousands in the city of Hama in 1982. They also reject Assad's rule because he belongs to the Shiite Alawite sect of Islam.

Assad has warned of an increasing Islamic threat against his country, saying al-Qaida militants are taking refuge in neighboring Lebanon.

But some opponents of his regime have claimed he is hyping the threat to score support with the United States, defuse international pressure and provide a pretext for Syrian meddling in Lebanon.

Syrian security forces have battled several times in the past two years with gunmen believed to belong to Jund al-Sham.

In June, anti-terrorism police fought militants near the Defense Ministry in central Damascus in a clash that killed five people and wounded four. In 2004, four people were killed in a gunfight between police and a team of militants believed to plotting to bomb the Canadian Embassy.

Jund al-Sham was established in Afghanistan by Syrians, Palestinians and Jordanians with links to slain al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Syria is a major crossing point for militants from around the Arab world — including Syria and Lebanon — to slip into Iraq to fight in the insurgency. In the face of U.S. pressure, Damascus has insisted it is doing all it can to stop the infiltrations but that the long desert border is too difficult to seal.

Suspected Islamic Militants Attack The U.S. Embassy In Syria (MCT)

By Rhonda Roumani And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria - Armed gunmen believed to be Islamic militants attacked the U.S. Embassy in Syria's capital Tuesday with gunfire and two explosives-packed cars in a rare instance of extremist violence in this authoritarian and largely secular Arab country.

Syrian security personnel killed three of the attackers, and the assault failed to breach the embassy's security perimeter. One Syrian security guard was killed and more than a dozen people were injured, Syrian officials said. No Americans were hurt.

Witnesses said four assailants shouting "Allahu Akbar" ("God is Great") assaulted the embassy at about 10 a.m. local time, exchanging heavy gunfire with Syrian guards.

Syria's interior minister, Gen. Bassam Abdul Majid, told state-run television that the assailants tried to detonate two cars full of explosives next to the embassy. One car exploded, but another one failed to detonate, he said.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but Syrian officials implied that the attack was the work of a militant group known as Jund al Sham, Arabic for "Soldiers of Syria." Little is known about the group, which is thought to have links to the Iraqi branch of the al-Qaida terrorist network.

The attack underscored the complexities of a region that the Bush administration has sought to divide into supporters and enemies of terrorism. Syria has long supported Hezbollah, Hamas and several Palestinian terrorist groups, but one of al-Qaida's aims is ousting secular regimes such as Syria's and replacing them with Islamic rule.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Syrian security forces for helping thwart the attack.

"I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," said Rice, who was visiting Canada.

Syria, run by a secular Baathist Party similar to Saddam Hussein's, fought a virtual civil war with the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood in the early 1980s, and thousands died when government forces leveled the city of Hama, a militant stronghold, in 1982.

In recent years, there have been signs of a reborn radical Islamic movement in Syria, and some Syrians have crossed the border with Iraq to join attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces there.

Still, it remained unclear how a plot could be hatched and carried out in daylight in downtown Damascus, given Syria's pervasive security services.

Syria's embassy in Washington issued a statement condemning the attack, but blamed such incidents on U.S. policy. "It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," the statement said.

U.S.-Syrian relations have been tense since the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, which prompted Washington to recall the U.S. ambassador to Syria, Margaret Scobey.

The wounded included a Syrian embassy guard, a policeman and a security employee of the embassy, seven workers from the Syrian Telecommunications Establishment who were in the area conducting repairs, two Iraqis and a Chinese citizen, Syria's news agency reported.

A State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the attack was bungled and didn't bear the hallmarks of al-Qaida's careful planning.

The embassy in Damascus doesn't meet the State Department's highest security standards, which were imposed after attacks on the U.S. embassies in Beirut in the 1980s and East Africa in 1998. Nevertheless, the Department issued a statement on Tuesday calling the embassy "one of our most heavily defended facilities with multiple physical and technical upgrades".

The low building, surrounded by a whitewashed wall and an 8-foot-high fence and guarded by U.S. Marines, sits on a residential thoroughfare.

The embassy, in a message to U.S. citizens in Syria, said it would be closed on Wednesday. "At present, Americans should maintain a very low profile," it said.

Shortly after the attack, a large plume of smoke could be seen coming from the area surrounding the embassy compound. The charred remains of a car could be seen parked outside of the embassy, along with a trail of blood on a street near the embassy compound.

Syrian security promptly cordoned off the street, forbidding journalists from entering. The area is home to other missions, including the Chinese, Italian and Iraqi embassies, and a school. Mothers were briefly allowed to pass the barricade in order to pick up their children.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said the attackers used improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, packed into the two vehicles. In addition, small IEDs were found in the vicinity of the embassy outside the second, unexploded car, he said.

Casey said he had no information on who was responsible or their motives.

As in Egypt, Jordan and other Arab nations, the Muslim Brotherhood poses the biggest challenge to the Assad regime in Syria. But the Brotherhood, the largest and most respected Islamist movement in the Middle East, in recent years has focused on building its power by participating in elections, prompting complaints from radicals that it's grown too moderate.

Syria Thwarts Attack On U.S. Embassy (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Syrian authorities thwarted a terrorist attack on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus yesterday, winning Washington's praise, but the two governments blamed each other's policies for the incident and ruled out improving their relations.

DOJ_NMG_0062521

Three of the four attackers were killed in a shootout with Syrian police and one was arrested, U.S. and Syrian officials said. There were no American casualties, though one Syrian guard working for the embassy suffered a gunshot wound and another one sustained a minor injury, the State Department said.

"The Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The Syrian Embassy in Washington was quick to blame U.S. actions for yesterday's attack.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," it said. "What has happened recently in Lebanon, the Palestinian territories and Iraq is exacerbating the fight against global terrorism."

But Mr. Casey said it is Damascus that needs to "evaluate its policies and determine whether its continued support for terrorism is, in fact, an appropriate way to proceed."

U.S. officials said it was Syria's duty to protect any diplomatic mission on its territory and that it would take much more than yesterday's action for Damascus to have a better relationship with Washington.

The attackers "were driving in two vehicles with explosives -- one at the front entrance of the embassy and one toward the rear" of the compound, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

"The vehicle near the front of the compound did in fact explode. The other wasn't detonated," he said. "The explosive materials in it were defused by Syrian authorities."

The official Syrian news agency, SANA, said 11 bystanders were wounded, including an Iraqi couple and a senior Chinese diplomat. China's Xinhua news agency said the diplomat was slightly wounded by shrapnel while standing on a garage in the Chinese Embassy compound, near the U.S. Embassy.

Television footage showed a van packed with gas canisters with detonators taped to them, as well as bloodstains on the pavement and several damaged vehicles, including a bullet-riddled white car.

U.S. officials said the Syrian military and the Interior Ministry sent forces to the scene of the attack, which began at 10:10 a.m. The officials attributed the quick response to increased security in the Rawda district, where the embassy is located and where many government officials live.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack, but SANA named "the terrorist group Takfiri," which belongs to an Islamic movement that advocates killing Muslims who do not adhere to strict tenets.

Syrian officials were quoted implicating a smaller group within Takfiri, Jund al-Sham, or Soldiers of Syria. It has been blamed for several attacks on civilian installations, including an attempt to occupy buildings near the government television station in June. Police killed four members of the group on that occasion, SANA said.

A State Department official said the attacker arrested yesterday was "providing information," but it was not clear whether U.S. officials would be permitted to question him.

The Syrian government, which the Bush administration accuses of supporting terrorism, exercises tight control within its own borders and deals firmly with violent dissent, even if it is directed against a country it considers hostile.

The United States has listed Syria as a state sponsor of terrorism because of its backing of groups like Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Washington recalled its ambassador from Damascus in February 2005, following the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, in which the U.S. suspects Syrian involvement.

Embassy Attack Puts Syria On Alert (CSM)

By Dan Murphy And Rhonda Roumani

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2006

CAIRO AND DAMASCUS, SYRIA

An attack in Damascus on Tuesday morning that is being described by Syrian officials as an attempt to take over the US Embassy by "Islamist terrorists" helps to emphasize that while there is confrontation between US and Syria both countries are targets of Islamist militants.

Witnesses described a coordinated attack by a group of militants that involved gunfire, car bombs, and grenades and said some of the attackers shouted "God is great" as they engaged Syrian guards outside the compound a little after 10 a.m. local time.

"The US government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Three militants and one Syrian guard were killed in the attack, with a fourth wounded militant taken into custody. No American citizens were hurt in the assault, though a Syrian guard employed by the embassy was wounded but in stable condition, according to a brief statement by the embassy. A Syrian government guard was in serious condition, according to the official SANA news agency. Attack embarrasses Syrian regime

While this was first and foremost an attack on the US, it is also a major embarrassment for the government in Damascus, a secular authoritarian regime that is viewed by Al Qaeda and its allies as run by apostates.

Local television showed footage of a van that appeared to be loaded with homemade bombs and propane canisters at the scene. The Associated Press quoted witnesses as saying a smaller car bomb did explode.

The US State Department considers Syria to be a supporter of terrorism, largely because of its ties to Hizbullah, the militant Shiite group in Lebanon, and the US government has worked to isolate Syria in recent years. The US ambassador to Syria, Margaret Scobey, was recalled in February 2005 after the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, an attack later blamed on Syria by a United Nations investigation.

But the country has also been fighting its own war on terrorism.

The Syrian ambassador to the US, Imad Mustafa, alleged on CNN that the attackers were from Tanzim Jund al-Sham, a militant group that shares much of Al Qaeda's ideology.

In recent months, a number of former US officials have been quietly urging that the US reach out to the Damascus regime, saying it might be possible to drive a wedge between the secular Bashar al-Assad, a member of the country's minority Alawite sect, and his theocratic allies Iran and Hizbullah.

However, the Bush administration has continued to insist that the Assad regime will have to abandon support for Hizbullah before it's viewed as a possible partner for peace.

Mr. Snow said US gratitude "does not mean they are an ally. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists." Syria's own war on Islamist militants

Damascus has fought Islamist militants off and on for decades, and famously in a crackdown following an assassination attempt against former President Hafiz al-Assad in 1982, that killed approximately 10,000 residents of the town of Hama, then, as now, a bastion for Sunni Islamist thought.

Islamist militancy has been on the rise inside Syria in the past few years, in part fueled by the flow of jihadis back and forth across its border with Iraq. Last June, four gunmen and a Syrian security agent were killed after an attack outside of Syria's state-run television station.

June 9, Syrian forces engaged in a three-hour firefight in southern Damascus at the house of a shopkeeper they alleged was a Tanzim Jund al-Sham cell leader and said they found a cache of weapons and jihadi propaganda there.

April 27, 2004, Syrian forces foiled what they said was an Islamist car-bomb attack in the same diplomatic quarter of Damascus.

The former United Nations' mission in the area was set on fire by rocket-propelled grenades in that assault. Syrian officials later said the ultimate target of the attack was the Canadian Embassy, which was to have been hit by a car bomb that failed to detonate.

Ayman Abdul Nour, who runs All4Syria, an online news service, says many Syrians are worried about what they see as the spread of Salafi ideology - an intolerant brand of Sunni Islam - inside the country.

"We start asking questions about these fanatic Muslim groups moving freely around the country and the region," he says. It raises "a lot of question about how we can secure our country and about how we can secure our future."

Syria Foils US Embassy Car Bombing (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Syria on Tuesday foiled a car bomb attack against the US embassy in Damascus, killing three of the four attackers who tried to storm the building in a van loaded with explosives.

No Americans were hurt but a member of the Syrian anti-terrorism forces guarding the embassy was killed, and 11 people injured.

The US, long at odds with Syria, voiced gratitude to Damascus for its swift response.

“Syrian officials came to the aid of the Americans,” White House spokesman Tony Snow said. “The US government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided in going after the attackers. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists.”

The US withdrew its ambassador last year after Damascus was linked to the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, former Lebanese prime minister. Syria’s support for the Lebanese Shia group Hizbollah and the Palestinian Islamist movement Hamas have also put it at odds with Washington.

Syrian state television said the attackers – believed to be Islamist militants because of the slogans witnesses reported hearing – were armed with automatic rifles and grenades. Television pictures showed a white van rigged with explosives, including pipe bombs, and the charred remains of another vehicle.

DOJ_NMG_0062523

The US has criticised Syria for not doing enough to stop the flow of Islamic militants across its borders into Iraq.

Walid Moallem, Syria's foreign minister, said in a recent interview with the Financial Times that "extremists" had been arrested crossing the Syrian border from Lebanon.

Responding to charges that supplies of arms were still crossing from Syria into Lebanon to rearm the Hizbollah militia, Mr Moallem said the border had been breached by "smugglers" in both directions. He said those arrested were "mainly Arab nationalists".

"We consider these people terrorists because they are aiming to kill and bomb civilian targets," he said.

Syria has indicated repeatedly that it would like to engage in a dialogue with Washington and that it wanted American help in reviving peace talks with Israel. Its success in thwarting the embassy attack is now likely to revive calls from some in Washington who believe in the need to reach out to Damascus. But David Schenker of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy said it was unlikely there would be a shift in American policy. "We're always going to have some problems with this regime," he said. "We have got our priorities. If they were to tone down what they were doing with Hizbollah or stop contributing to the instability then that would be seen in the US as some kind of signal."

Attack On U.S. Embassy Fails In Syria (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria — Attackers tried to blow up the U.S. Embassy in Damascus on Tuesday but were thwarted by Syrian guards in a fierce gunbattle.

Three of the four attackers and a Syrian guard were killed. No Americans were hurt. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but Imad Moustapha, Syria's ambassador to the United States, said it was "logically possible" that an offshoot of al-Qaeda called Jund al-Sham was responsible.

The group's name in Arabic means Soldiers of Syria. Jund al-Sham was established in Afghanistan in the late 1990s by Syrians, Palestinians and Jordanians. It has carried out several attacks inside Syria in recent years, Moustapha said.

The attackers came in two vehicles: a car followed by a pickup packed with explosives. The three gunmen in the car threw hand grenades and fired automatic weapons toward the embassy gate, prompting an intense, 30-minute gunbattle.

When the firefight erupted, the driver of the bomb-laden truck fled but was shot and arrested by Syrian forces. The truck did not explode.

Afterward, U.S. officials had rare words of praise for the government of Syrian President Bashar Assad. "The Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The State Department lists Syria as a supporter of terrorists, specifically Hezbollah in Lebanon. The United States withdrew its ambassador to Syria several days after former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri was assassinated in Beirut in February 2005. The United Nations has linked the attack on Hariri to Lebanese plotters with ties to Syria.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also thanked Syria and said it should "become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists."

Syria responded with a stinging statement from its embassy in Washington that blamed U.S. policies in Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinian territories for increasing Islamic militancy.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," it said. "The U.S. should … start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

The attack raised questions about the strength of Islamic militant groups in Syria. Though the United States accuses Syria of supporting terrorism, Assad's secular regime has long been in conflict with such groups. Assad's father and predecessor as president, Hafez Assad, killed thousands in the city of Hama in 1982 during a crackdown on Islamic militants.

Islamic militancy has been increasing inside Syria in the past few years. Syria is a major crossing point for militants from around the Arab world heading into Iraq to fight in the insurgency there.

Pressured by the United States to seal its border with Iraq, Syria has said that it is doing all it can to stop the infiltrations but that the long desert border is too difficult to close completely.

In June, anti-terrorism police fought militants near the Syrian Defense Ministry in Damascus in a battle that killed five and wounded four.

Ayman Abdul Nour, who runs All4Syria, an online news service, says many Syrians are worried about what they see as the spread of an intolerant strain of Sunni Islam in the country.

U.S. Praises Syria Actions After Embassy Attack (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

The U.S. offered rare praise for the Syrian regime after its security forces killed three men who attacked the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, though Syria responded coolly to Washington's remarks.

The exchange between the countries came after four Islamic militants in two vehicles rigged with explosives tried to storm the U.S. embassy compound with automatic rifles and homemade explosives, according to a State Department account. Syrian security guards waged a fierce defense of the building, killing three of the assailants and wounding the fourth. Syrian news outlets said one Syrian guard was killed and three others wounded, along with 11 bystanders who were wounded. No Americans were hurt.

Senior Bush administration officials immediately applauded the Syrian help and suggested a possible rapprochement with Damascus, which the U.S. has long criticized as a sponsor of terrorism and instability in the region. "We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice offered condolences for security personnel killed in the attack and thanked Damascus for its help in defending the American embassy.

In a statement, the Syrian Embassy in Washington called the assault "a heinous terrorist attack by an extremist group." But it also lay the underlying blame on U.S. policies in the Middle East, which the embassy said "have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment." The statement urged Washington to "take this opportunity to review its policies in the Middle East and start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace" for the region.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

The incident comes at a time of high anti-U.S. sentiment in the region as well as increased turbulence for Syria and its relations with the West. The U.S. was criticized by many for not reaching out to Damascus this summer during the fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite Muslim group. Many Arab states have hoped to enlist U.S. help in weaning Syria away from its growing ties to Iran, which also supports Hezbollah.

Syrian political analyst and writer Faiz Sara said the attack could either boost or further undermine Syrian-U.S. relations, partly depending on how the Syrians handle the investigation.

"If the Syrian government conducted a transparent and objective investigation and publicized the political side of the attack, this might bolster its position as someone fighting terrorism," he said. On the other hand, if the U.S. administration wants to increase its pressure on Syria, it can argue "that the regime orchestrated this operation and ... in that case the gap [between the two countries] will increase."

Some experts said the attack may illustrate the increasing spread of small clusters of militant groups with a shared ideology but limited -- if any -- connection to al Qaeda. "Al Qaeda has been transformed from a military organization with a particular base to an ideology that is being exported to local groups through the Internet and satellite channels," said Mohammed Salah, Cairo bureau chief of the pan-Arab al-Hayat newspaper, who closely monitors Islamic groups.

The Israel-Hezbollah war has put Syria at odds with the West and even with some Sunni Muslim Arab regimes. Already accused of not doing enough to stop the flow of foreign fighters from its territory into Iraq, Syria drew renewed scrutiny recently with Israeli officials complaining that Hezbollah receives arms via land convoys that enter Lebanon from Syria.

Some analysts said yesterday's attack offered Syria an unusual opportunity to boost its stature. "They will say that they too are victims of terrorism and that they want to fight terrorism as much as anyone else, and use this as a chance to show how they're ... doing their job as a government protecting Western interests," said Rami Khouri, a commentator and editor-at-large at the Lebanese Daily Star newspaper.

Gunmen In Syria Hit U.S. Embassy (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria, Wednesday, Sept. 13 — Four gunmen attacked the American Embassy here early Tuesday, storming the compound with grenades and automatic weapons before being repelled by Syrian security forces. Three of the gunmen were killed and a fourth was wounded, Syrian and American officials said.

One Syrian security official was killed and about a dozen people were wounded, including three Syrian security officials and a Syrian guard employed by the embassy. No American personnel were injured and the attackers failed to detonate a vehicle packed with explosives.

The wounded attacker was being questioned by Syrian authorities. The identities of the attackers were not disclosed.

The attack, a rare instance of terrorist violence in the tightly controlled Syrian capital, marked the first time the American Embassy had been a target.

DOJ_NMG_0062525

Coming a day after the anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States and after recent threats by Al Qaeda, the attack sent shudders through a region already reeling from a season of violence. Anger toward the United States has surged in recent weeks over its support for Israel during the war in Lebanon this summer.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said it was too early to say who might have been behind the attack. But she praised Syria for responding quickly. "The Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Ms. Rice said Tuesday during a visit to Canada.

Syria, however, was quick to blame the United States. "It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," said a statement on Tuesday from the Syrian Embassy in Washington. "What has happened recently in Lebanon, the Palestinian territories and Iraq is exacerbating the fight against global terrorism."

Relations between Syria and the United States are strained. The United States recalled its ambassador after the assassination of Prime Minister Rafik Hariri of Lebanon in February 2005, because Washington believes Damascus played a role. United States diplomatic representation has since been downgraded to the level of chargé d'affaires.

More recently, the United States has blamed Syria for helping to arm Hezbollah, whose attack on Israeli soldiers along the Lebanese border set off the war in July.

"I think you have to take a look at who is really responsible for the violence in the region," said Tom Casey, the State Department's acting spokesman, responding Tuesday to Syria's statement. "The violence is the responsibility of those who do believe that the only response to any questions or concerns is to throw bombs, is to shoot bullets, is to assassinate people."

He said Washington continued to consider Syria a sponsor of terrorism, alluding to its support for Hezbollah and the Palestinian group Hamas, both of which are considered terrorist organizations by the United States and many allies.

The attack on the embassy began at 10:10 a.m., when two vehicles approached, one drawing up in front of the compound, the other to an employees' entrance in the rear.

The minister of information, Mohsen Bilal, said in a telephone interview that one man approached embassy guards with a bouquet. The man said "he would like to hand these flowers over to someone from the embassy, to show his solidarity with them and the victims of 9/11," Mr. Bilal said.

He said that when the guards refused him entry, the attack began.

Ayman Abdel Nour, a Syrian political analyst, said he was about 25 yards away when he saw two men running away from the embassy, and heard gunfire and men shouting, "God is great!" He took refuge in another embassy nearby.

The sound of gunfire and explosions continued for about 15 minutes, he said. There was a second exchange of automatic-weapons fire and single gunshots after a few minutes of calm, he said, but it ended quickly.

When he emerged, the attackers' car at the rear of the embassy had been gutted by fire, apparently after having been hit in the gun battle.

Mr. Abdel Nour said friends at the Italian Embassy nearby had seen the attackers lobbing grenades over the high wall surrounding the American Embassy and had seen smoke coming from inside the compound.

Television images from the scene showed pools of blood on the pavement and the remains of the burned-out car. A vehicle with explosives at the front of the embassy was apparently abandoned when one attacker ran to the back to aid other gunmen.

The television also showed Syrian security officials inspecting what appeared to be large propane gas canisters with pipes taped to them.

Mr. Casey, the State Department spokesman, said after the attack "some small unexploded improvised explosive devices" were found, in addition to those in the second vehicle.

"This is a flourishing business today," Mr. Abdel Nour said of the attack. "If you want to open a terrorist cell here, it's an easy business. You'll find a lot of money because of the frustration in the region."

Syria's interior minister, Bassam Abdel Majeed, visited the embassy after the attack and met Tuesday with the new chargé d'affaires, Michael H. Corbin.

By nightfall, residents could see the rear wall scarred by bullets and the roadside blackened by the car fire. Syrian sentry boxes were riddled with shots, as was a window near the employee's entrance.

The Rawda district, where the attack occurred, is one of the most heavily guarded parts of the capital. It houses security installations and the homes of many government officials. A number of foreign embassies are near the American compound, including the Chinese, Italian and the Iraqi missions, while the presidential palace is only about 150 yards away from the Americans.

At least 11 people were wounded in the attack. The local embassy employee wounded was hit by gunfire while checking the attackers' cars when the assault began. The State Department said another embassy guard was slightly injured.

Seven Syrian telephone company employees working in the area were also wounded, as well as an Iraqi man and woman. A senior Chinese diplomat was hit by shrapnel while standing on top of a garage within the Chinese Embassy compound, the New China News Agency reported.

Syria, a strictly secular state, has had trouble with Islamic extremists. In April 2004, four people were killed in a clash between police officers and suspected bombers in the diplomatic quarter of Damascus. Authorities accused Islamic militants of trying to blow up an explosives-laden car near the Canadian Embassy.

The Syrian ambassador to the United States, Imad Moustapha, said Tuesday on CNN that the attackers might have links to a group known as Jund al-Sham, which means Soldiers of the Levant. Last year five of the group's militants were killed in Hama when security agents raided their hideout, uncovering a stash of weapons and explosives.

American intelligence officials in Washington said it was too early to know with confidence who was responsible for the embassy attack, and said there was little evidence yet to support the claim of the Syrian government that Jund al-Sham might have carried it out.

Officials said there was also no evidence linking the attack to the recent message from Al Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, who said in a speech broadcast Monday that Al Qaeda would be carrying out attacks in the Middle East.

"This attack would be small beer by Al Qaeda standards," said one intelligence official.

The United States Embassy was closed after the attack and said it would operate with a reduced staff on Wednesday. It issued a statement advising Americans in Syria to keep a low profile and it dismissed students at the Damascus Community School, which is affiliated with the embassy.

Four Armed Men Attack U.S. Embassy In Damascus (WP)

By Rhonda Roumani

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria, Sept. 12 -- Four armed men attacked the U.S. Embassy on Tuesday, killing one Syrian security guard and wounding several people in what authorities said was an attempt by Islamic guerrillas to storm the diplomatic compound.

Just after 10 a.m., gunmen yelling " Allahu akbar " -- "God is great" -- opened fire on the Syrian security officers who guard the outside of the embassy in Damascus's Rawda district, witnesses said. The attackers threw grenades at the compound, according to witnesses, and shot at the guards with assault rifles during the 15- to 20-minute clash, which left three of the gunmen dead and the fourth reportedly wounded.

In addition to the slain security officer, another guard was wounded, along with a Chinese diplomat and several civilians, including seven Syrian workers and two Iraqis. No Americans were wounded, the embassy said in a statement.

Syria's interior minister, Gen. Bassam Abdel Maguid, said on state television that the attack was a "terrorist operation" carried out by Islamic militants who tried to detonate two cars filled with explosives in front of the embassy.

Syrian authorities said they disarmed a small truck that had been rigged with gas canisters and pipe bombs but had failed to detonate. The charred remains of a car could also be seen in front of the embassy, but witnesses said the relatively small explosion that destroyed it appeared to have been caused by grenades rather than a car bomb.

There were no immediate assertions of responsibility for the attack, and Syrian officials did not blame a specific group, though in the past they have attributed similar strikes to a little-known group called Jund al-Sham, or the Soldiers of the Levant. Reports about the group on Syrian television have shown images of seized weapons, but no information on its goals, makeup, whereabouts or popularity has ever been made available by the government.

U.S. officials praised the Syrian guards who battled the assailants. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking in Stellarton, Nova Scotia, after talks with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, said that "the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said: "We're appreciative of their professional response in this effort."

The Syrian Embassy in Washington issued a statement saying: "In accordance with the Geneva Convention, Syria performed its duties in the best possible manner to protect the U.S. Embassy. . . . Syrian security forces took the full brunt of the attack."

The statement added: "It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment. . . . The U.S. should take this opportunity to review its policies in the Middle East and start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

Relations between the United States and Syria have been tense for years, with the Bush administration denouncing the government of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad for its support of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia and for harboring leaders of Palestinian factions that the United States has designated as terrorist groups.

In the months following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Syria shared information related to terrorism with the United States, but after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, President Bush blamed Syria for failing to close its border with Iraq to insurgents. Bush recalled U.S. Ambassador Margaret Scobey from Damascus after the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in February 2005. Many accuse Syria of orchestrating the attack.

The U.S. Embassy compound here is in the capital's diplomatic neighborhood, close to the Iraqi, Italian and Chinese embassies. It is surrounded by white walls described variously as eight to 15 feet high, with U.S. Marines providing security inside the compound and Syrian security forces outside.

Shortly after the attack Tuesday morning, a large plume of smoke rose over the compound, and a trail of blood ran down a nearby street where the gunmen were shot as they tried to escape, witnesses said.

Although the street of the embassy was closed, police allowed parents of students at a nearby school to slip past the barricade to pick up their children, many of whom were in tears. The embassy's American flag, which had been lowered to half-staff the day before in commemoration of the Sept. 11 attacks, was raised to its full height a few hours after the fighting.

"We could not believe that it would happen in the middle of the day in the most secure area of Damascus," said Ayman Abdul-Nour, a political analyst who saw the battle unfold. "In front of me, this gentleman from the Syrian intelligence force in civil uniform stumbled to the ground and blood was coming out of him."

In recent years, several attacks have been carried out against foreign embassies in Damascus.

In February, demonstrators protesting the publication of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad in European newspapers set fire to the Danish Embassy here. In April 2004, four people were killed in a gun battle that took place on a major road that is flanked by a large number of embassies.

And in December 1998, during a U.S. bombing campaign against Iraq, mobs assaulted U.S. and British diplomatic buildings in Damascus, and Syrian guards and U.S. Marines rescued the wife of U.S. Ambassador Ryan Crocker as rioters broke into the couple's residence.

Syrians Foil Strike On U.S. Embassy (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

CAIRO — Four suspected Islamic militants hurled hand grenades and sprayed machine-gun fire in an attempt to storm the American Embassy in Damascus on Tuesday, but were gunned down by Syrian forces.

The brazen morning attack in the Syrian capital seemed to briefly ease tensions between Washington and Damascus, as U.S. officials thanked Syria for defending the embassy. But the attack also raised questions about President Bashar Assad's grip on security, and his regime's relationship with extremist groups.

"We appreciate the response of the Syrian security forces to help secure our territory," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking at an appearance in Stellarton, Canada. "I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that."

Other Bush administration officials, however, referred to long-standing tensions with Syria, which remains on the State Department's list of state sponsors of terrorism.

"The Syrian police forces did their job, and they were professional about it," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "Now, the next step is for Syria to play a constructive role in the war on terror. Stop harboring terrorist groups, stop being an agent in fomenting terror, and work with us to fight against terror, as Libya has done. That's the next step for Syria."

The Syrian government blamed the bungled attack on a little-known hard-line Sunni militant group that calls itself Jund al Sham, or Soldiers of the Levant, allegedly linked to the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

"It's clearly a terrorist operation," said Interior Minister Gen. Bassam Abdel Majeed.

Three of the militants were killed and a fourth was captured in the morning shootout, which also killed a Syrian security officer and wounded 11 bystanders. Timed explosives rigged to a stolen van at the embassy gate failed to go off and were detonated later by Syrian anti-terrorism agents, the interior minister told state television.

Political analyst Ayman Abdel Nour said he had just climbed out of his car to go see about a visa when a car pulled over outside the embassy and four gunmen leapt out. At first, Nour said, he was confused.

"I thought they were filming a scene for something, because it was the middle of the day, in the middle of the most secure area in Damascus," he said. "Then one of them fell down near me and I saw the blood. I realized it was serious, so I ran and hid."

Nour said he took shelter in a neighboring embassy. The shooting lasted for about 15 minutes, slowing gradually to single bursts of fire. The gunmen pitched hand grenades over the embassy walls, cracking two windows, he said.

None of the embassy staff was hurt in the attack. The 11 bystanders wounded included repairmen from the Syrian Telecommunication Establishment, an Iraqi couple and a Chinese diplomat who was standing on a nearby rooftop.

Perched behind high walls on a heavily fortified hillside, the U.S. Embassy has been at the heart of a stony diplomatic relationship in recent years. The American ambassador withdrew from the Damascus embassy after the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in Beirut. A United Nations report accused Syrian intelligence of complicity in the assassination, a charge Syria denies.

The United States also has accused Damascus of letting jihadist fighters slip across its borders to fight in Iraq, as well as tampering in Lebanese affairs and propping up anti-Israel fighters in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

In recent weeks, the United States and Israel accused Damascus of funneling weapons to Hezbollah fighters in Lebanon, where battles between Israel and Shiite Muslim militants raged for 34 days in July and August.

As relations soured between Washington and Damascus in recent years, the anti-American sentiment that has flared in the Middle East since the war in Iraq also took hold in Syria.

But the U.S. is not the sole target of Islamists: The groups have also waged a long-running blood feud with secular Syria.

The government is dominated by members of the Allawite sect, a Shiite offshoot rejected by hard-line Sunnis. In the 1980s, the Muslim Brotherhood's attempts to oppose the regime were crushed bloodily by Assad's father, President Hafez Assad. To this day, membership in the Sunni militant group is punishable by death.

Since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the Syrian government has struggled to maintain the rigorous street control that once made the Assad regime famous. Syrian troops have repeatedly battled with shadowy gunmen. Tuesday's attack was the third to strike the capital in three years; all were easily repelled by security services.

The attacks have raised speculation about whether Bashar Assad is capable of keeping the country calm.

Some analysts have wondered whether some members of the Syrian government might have worked out a detente of sorts with the more serious jihadi forces, such as those operating in Iraq.

Still others have accused the government of colluding in staged attacks in a bid to draw sympathy from the West.

After each attack, Syrian officials have been quick to remind reporters that Damascus, too, is a target for terrorists.

"The Syrian government is a secular one, and the Baath Party itself is secular, so it's considered by Al Qaeda and others as a pro-Western regime," said a Syrian official who spoke by phone on condition of anonymity. "So Syria is attacked by those groups, and meanwhile the USA is accusing Syria of belonging to the same groups. Both sides are greatly mistaken."

Syrian officials also criticized U.S. policy in the region.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," the Syrian Embassy in Washington said in a statement. "The U.S. should … start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

But questions linger: Why have militants never struck Syria with the force and skill brought to bear against Arab neighbors such as Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia? Is Syria given a pass by armed groups because of Assad's reputation as an anti-American figure?

"The speculation has been that the Assad regime has put people up to this," said Joshua Landis, a Syria expert at the University of Oklahoma who spent last year living in Damascus. "Are they in league? Have they cut a deal?"

One U.S. counter-terrorism official said it was too soon to tell who was responsible for Tuesday's attack, but said he was not surprised that Syria blamed Jund al Sham.

"Other violent incidents have occurred in Syria and the government has pointed to the group, but there is not a lot known about it," said the official, whose agency does not permit him to discuss terrorism matters on the record.

The official and others, however, said it was also possible that the perpetrators might have been local men with political grievances.

U.S. Eyes New Palestinian Gov't Warily (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration expressed worry Tuesday that a Palestinian national unity government now in formation may not be ready to renounce terrorism or accept Israel's right to exist.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey also reiterated that unless those conditions are met, the Bush administration would not resume U.S. aid to the Palestinian government.

The skeptical comments came a day after the Hamas-led administration and President Mahmoud Abbas' more moderate Fatah Party said they would form a coalition government. In the past half-year international financial sanctions have crippled the Palestinian Authority's ability to pay its 165,000 employees.

DOJ_NMG_0062529

While all details on forming a new government are lacking, Casey said "from what we have seen so far we are certainly concerned" that it does not accept demands by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia that it renounce terrorism and violence, recognize Israel and accept previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

"Obviously, nothing can move forward until such time that there's a government in place that does meet that criteria," Casey said,

Casey commended Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority, for trying to break an impasse with the militant group Hamas and form a responsible government that could meet the aspirations of the Palestinian people.

The United States provides humanitarian aid to the Palestinians, but no direct aid to the Authority. Western countries suspended aid when Hamas, which they consider to be a terror group, took over the Palestinian government earlier this year after an election victory.

"We are continuing to be mindful of the humanitarian needs of the Palestinian people," Casey said. The U.S. government has provided $468 million in direct assistance to them this year, he said

Meanwhile, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was expected to discuss the Palestinian unity efforts with Rice at the State Department on Wednesday.

U.S. Wary Of Palestinian Plan (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Palestinian plans to form a coalition government have created a quandary for the Bush administration, which wants to ease suffering in the Gaza Strip and West Bank without lifting pressure on Hamas.

Leaders of the radical Islamic group, and those of the rival Fatah faction, announced this week that they were close to completing a deal that they hoped would persuade the West to end an aid cutoff that had bankrupted the government and set off factional fighting.

U.S. officials, who consider Hamas a terrorist group, have halted all but direct humanitarian aid since Hamas came to power in January elections. U.S. officials have said they want to avert a humanitarian catastrophe in the territories, but noted Tuesday that the Palestinian proposal might not be enough to end the aid ban.

The U.S. bind was complicated by Europe's warm reaction to the Palestinian unity government plan, posing a risk that a new transatlantic rift could develop over the issue. British Prime Minister Tony Blair said this week after a visit to the region that it might be possible for the West to deal with a unified government.

Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said U.S. officials would look at details of the plan, which have not been completed.

"We are continuing to be mindful of the humanitarian needs of the Palestinian people," Casey said. But he said that before aid could be resumed, the Palestinians would need to renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

"From what we have seen so far, we are certainly concerned" that the coalition government does not accept those demands, Casey said. The stipulations were laid out in January by the U.S., the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

Israeli officials did not close the door on potential relations with a unity government when the deal was announced Monday by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, the leader of Fatah.

On Tuesday, an Israeli official sounded more skeptical, saying the deal seemed to be an effort to put a more presentable face on the government without making key changes or concessions.

Restoring aid would lift the pressure on Hamas just when the crunch was beginning to have an effect, the official said, noting that polls showed public support in the territories shifting away from Hamas and toward Fatah. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitivity of the diplomacy underway.

Some analysts said the Bush administration would be influenced by the Israeli government's attitude and probably would not resume aid. But they speculated that Washington could decide not to object to a European decision to resume, or increase, assistance.

"The Americans will probably react coolly to it, but they may say to the Europeans, 'If you have to [resume aid], we can live with it,' " said Nathan Brown, a specialist on Arab politics at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

But David Makovsky of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy predicted that U.S. skepticism would prevail.

"I think people in Washington are going to be pretty underwhelmed by it," Makovsky said. The Palestinians are "playing with words and trying to get the world to give them as much money as possible without being bound to anything."

DOJ_NMG_0062530

Many U.S. lawmakers could object loudly to any resumption of aid. Both houses of Congress have passed bills this year to limit the provision of direct aid to the Palestinian government as long as Hamas is in power. The European Union followed with a partial aid cutoff.

The U.S. government has provided $468 million in direct humanitarian aid to the Palestinians this year, Casey said.

The Palestinians' worsening financial crisis pushed Hamas into an alliance with Fatah, which recognizes Israel's right to exist, in hopes of getting aid flowing again.

But Hamas has no plans to recognize Israel, its spokesmen said. Instead, the government is expected to stake out a nuanced position that implies acceptance of a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict — and therefore of Israel — without saying so explicitly.

The agreement serving as the basis for the proposed government tacitly recognizes Israel by calling for creation of a Palestinian state along borders predating the 1967 Middle East War, meaning in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with Jerusalem as its capital.

That may not be direct enough to satisfy the Bush administration and Israel, but it could convince some European donors that Hamas has shifted its stances sufficiently and sway them to resume financial aid, analysts say.

"What the Palestinians are really hoping for is a breakthrough with the Europeans, who will judge the political program not so much in relation to the three conditions as in the difference in the Hamas position, so they will see this as a positive sign," said Mouin Rabbani, a Jordanian-based analyst for the International Crisis Group.

Hamas Gives Abbas OK For Negotiations (AP)

By Diaa Hadid

AP, September 12, 2006

Hamas officials gave Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas the go-ahead Tuesday for negotiations with Israel, a major shift in the militant Islamic group's position as it works to end its international isolation.

An Israeli military court, meanwhile, ordered the release of 19 Hamas officials — including Cabinet ministers and lawmakers — from an Israeli prison. The men, arrested by Israel after the June 25 capture of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit by Hamas-linked militants, will remain behind bars for several more days pending an appeal by prosecutors.

Israel said the court decision was not meant to reward Hamas for its moves toward moderation.

"I don't think that right now we would be making gestures of goodwill for the Hamas. We would be making gestures of goodwill to Abu Mazen," Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said, referring to the moderate Abbas by his nickname. Eisin said the courts were independent of the government.

Hamas, whose ideology calls for Israel's destruction, reached agreement Monday with Abbas' Fatah Party to form a unity government in an effort to end the financial crisis crippling the Palestinian economy. International donors cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority when Hamas formed its Cabinet six months ago. Hamas is listed as a terror group by Israel and the West.

Abbas has long pushed for a resumption of peace talks with Israel, and Hamas said Tuesday he would have full authority to hold those negotiations.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a Hamas leader, said the government itself would not be involved in the talks because negotiations are supposed to be handled by the PLO, headed by Abbas. The distinction could allow Hamas to retain its hard-line credentials with the Palestinian street, while the government gains international acceptance.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas-led government, told Israel's Army Radio in Hebrew that the Palestinians would be ready to establish a state in territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast War — the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem.

Visiting Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Moratinos said the new Palestinian coalition could be a "positive step in principle," but he stopped short of saying whether it would persuade the EU to restore aid to the Palestinian Authority.

While Hamad said Hamas would not recognize Israel's right to exist, the joint government is to be based on a platform many believe implies recognition of the Jewish state.

"We have nothing against negotiations, we have nothing against a diplomatic process, but we have rights," Hamad said.

Israel, the U.S. and European Union have said Hamas must renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept past peace agreements.

With negotiations over the government guidelines continuing, no date was set for it to take office.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was heading to Washington on Tuesday for talks with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Israel wants to ensure the international community does not reward Hamas for half measures, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said.

DOJ_NMG_0062531

"If the new Palestinian government reaches the three benchmarks and Gilad Shalit is released, then things could move ahead very quickly," he said. "Anything less than that is just a recipe for further stagnation."

And Defense Minister Amir Peretz said Shalit's release could lead to "meaningful talks" with the Palestinians.

Shalit's capture sparked a broad Israeli offensive in Gaza, and security forces arrested three dozen Hamas officials on charges of belonging to a banned group.

The military judge, who ruled Tuesday that 18 of those in custody should be freed, questioned the timing of the arrests, noting the men were permitted to run for office and serve in the Palestinian government for months before their detentions. He said the politicians — including Parliament Speaker Abdel Aziz Duaik and Religious Affairs Minister Nayef Rajoub — should be set released. In a separate hearing, a judge ordered Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer freed.

Prosecutors plan to appeal Thursday. Decisions are expected next week. In the meantime, the 19 remain in prison.

Earlier this week, the court ordered the release of three other Hamas members. That appeal is to be heard Wednesday.

"The arrest of the parliamentarians and ministers was from the beginning an unjust arrest," Haniyeh said. "We hope all of them will be released."

Despite the apparent easing of tensions, Hamas gunmen, along with members of another militant group, battled Israeli troops operating near Gaza's border with Israel, killing one soldier early Tuesday, the army said.

Israeli troops also shot and killed a 13-year-old boy during a raid in the West Bank town of Bethlehem after youths began pelting troops with stones, witnesses and hospital officials said. The Israeli military said soldiers fired after they were attacked by Palestinians. One soldier was wounded.

More Palestinians Urging An End To Paralyzed Governing Authority (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- As the young editor of Hamas's weekly newspaper, Sari Orabi is a careful monitor of what he describes as the "surprisingly frank" debate underway within the party that took control of the Palestinian Authority just over five months ago.

Orabi, sporting blue jeans and bristling hair, said he was among those who argued that the radical Islamic movement should not compete in last January's parliamentary elections, fearing victory would bring sanctions from Israel and international donors that classify Hamas as a terrorist organization.

That prediction has proved true, bankrupting the authority and raising questions within party ranks over whether the government Hamas won the right to run is worth maintaining at all.

"The situation we face is proof that the Palestinian Authority under the occupation is an illusion," Orabi, 26, said recently over tea in an office smashed earlier this year by rampaging members of the security services controlled by the rival Fatah movement. "What is the reason behind this authority? A majority now says it is all a big lie."

Created a dozen years ago to administer the occupied Palestinian territories, the frail political system called the Palestinian Authority is now broke, paralyzed by months of partisan infighting and depleted by Israeli arrests. A growing number of Palestinians -- a group that has expanded in recent months from a core of secular intellectuals to include officials from the leading political movements -- have begun advocating openly for the authority's dissolution.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, facing a strike by civil servants over unpaid wages, agreed this week to form a power-sharing government with Fatah and other factions in hopes of restoring international aid. Whether a new government will revive foreign financial support, which accounts for nearly half the authority's budget, could help determine whether the authority itself remains viable in the face of mounting unrest and disillusion in the territories.

The unity government platform would commit Hamas to accept past agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization that recognize Israel. It would mark the first time that Hamas, which does not belong to the PLO and has long opposed the 1993 Oslo peace accords that created the Palestinian Authority, would tacitly accept a two-state solution to the conflict.

But Hamas has so far refused to renounce violence or explicitly recognize the Jewish state -- two of the three conditions set by the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union for a renewal of aid. Israeli officials indicated Tuesday that Israel would not release hundreds of millions of dollars in frozen tax revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority or support an easing of international sanctions against it unless those terms were met.

The result could doom the new coalition government, slated to be headed by Haniyeh, before it takes shape. And failing to win international support after compromising is likely to inflame Hamas activists, some of whom have argued for months that collapsing the authority is preferable to giving up power won in fair elections.

"When you have an authority that is utterly powerless, what do you expect the reaction from the public will be?" said Ali Jarbawi, a professor at Bir Zeit University near Ramallah, who broached the idea of dissolving the Palestinian Authority three years ago in a series of influential journal articles. "More and more people are saying, 'If you can't deliver, you shouldn't exist.' "

Dissolving the Palestinian Authority, once envisioned as the embryo of a future Palestinian state's government, has until now been largely a topic of intellectual debate among professors, U.S.-educated lawyers for the Palestine Liberation Organization and disaffected members of the leading parties.

But the idea has reached further into the political mainstream over a difficult summer during which the authority has lost support among its two chief constituencies: Fatah, which dominated the government for years until its election loss to Hamas, and public employees who have gone months without paychecks. An estimated 1 million Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip depend on authority salaries for their livelihoods.

Jarbawi and others argue that the authority has taken the brunt of the blame for Palestinian political, economic and security failures, even though Israel, through its military presence, border controls and financial ties, remains the decisive power in the territories.

Without the authority, Jarbawi and others contend, Israel would be forced to assume a far greater political and financial role in the territories, taking responsibility for health, education and other services under international law that govern occupation. The Israeli investment could total billions of dollars annually and bring new pressure on the Jewish state to sign a comprehensive peace agreement with the Palestinians.

The authority "was supposed to be a vehicle for the establishment of a Palestinian state, but today the situation is not logical and we alone are paying the price of the occupation," said Hassan Khreisheh, a deputy speaker of the Hamas-controlled parliament who proposed dissolving the Palestinian Authority in a legislative session last month following a 26-day stint in an Israeli jail for belonging to an illegal organization. "The Israeli occupation should be paying for education, health and the administration, while the Palestinian cause should be brought back into the hands of the international community."

Following Hamas's election victory in January, the movement and its allies had remained publicly committed to the authority. But Orabi said elements within Hamas are growing more radical as their government continues to falter under economic sanctions and Israeli pressure. More than 30 Hamas members of parliament, including the speaker and five cabinet ministers, were detained and remain in Israeli custody since the June 25 capture of Israeli army Cpl. Gilad Shalit by gunmen from the movement's military wing. Israel has made Shalit's release a condition for unfreezing the tax revenue.

Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas official and adviser to Haniyeh, warned of radicalization in a scathing critique of Palestinian disunity and his own party's mistakes published last month by the Palestinian newspaper al-Ayyam.

"We have lost the connection between the resistance and other aspects of life," Hamad wrote, referring to armed confrontation with Israel. "There is an abyss between the resistance, politics and the people. That is why the people are scattered, not unified, not organized."

The authority is also losing legitimacy inside the ranks of Fatah, whose members fill out much of the civil service.

Some of Fatah's young guard, disillusioned by the older generation's corrupt and incompetent leadership, quietly advocated the authority's abolishment when the party was in charge. Hamas officials contend that their rivals began advocating the approach more boldly after losing their hold on the Palestinian ministries, long a source of patronage and power.

"The only justification for this authority was to pay employees, and now that it cannot even do that, there is no reason for it at all," said Tayseer Nasrallah, 45, a Fatah leader from Nablus who is working on a project to reform his party. "The voices for the authority's dissolution are rising inside the party. We need to make a dramatic gesture to force the world to really look for a just solution to this crisis, or we will go back to the occupation run entirely by Israel."

Qaddura Faris, 44, a former minister and a powerful figure within Fatah's young guard, favored dissolving the authority when Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was still alive. But Faris does not believe that authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who succeeded Arafat after his death in November 2004, has the power to govern without the government's institutions. Faris and others say the possible alternatives to the authority, which could include returning to the Israeli occupation that existed before Oslo or perhaps a civil administration by Jordan, are worse.

"If it happened now, we would be left without an umbrella," said Faris, who acknowledged that young Fatah activists are behind the civil servants' strike to pressure Hamas to cede control of the cabinet. "But there is also this impression that if we can form a national unity government, everything will be okay. I don't believe that either."

Blair Urges Lifting Of Palestinian Sanctions (AFP)

AFP, September 12, 2006

Britain's Tony Blair urged the lifting of economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority, so long as a deal on a cabinet of national unity there meets international conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0062533

He made the comments a day after returning from a three-day trip to the Middle East, during which he faced protests over his stance notably during the recent conflict between Israel and Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

"Yesterday's announcement of a government of national unity in Palestine is precisely what I hoped for," he said, referring to an agreement under which president Mahmud Abbas is to dissolve the current Hamas-led government.

"On the basis it is faithful to the conditions spelled out by the Quartet, that is the UN, EU, US and Russia, we should lift the economic sanctions on the Palestinian authority," added the British prime minister.

He appeared to be referring to international economic sanctions slapped on the Palestinian Authority by the United States and the European Union following the January election of the militant group Hamas, considered a terrorist movement by both Washington and Brussels.

At the time the Middle East Quartet that Blair referred to said the sanctions would remain in place until Hamas renounced violence, recognized Israel and pledged to abide by agreements signed by previous Palestinian leaderships.

The Quartet has long been battling to revive the peace process in the region.

Under a deal announced on Monday, Abbas is to dissolve the current government and charge prime minister Ismail Haniya of the Islamist movement Hamas with forming a new cabinet.

Palestinian officials hope that the formation of the new government will lead to the West ending a freeze on direct aid to the Palestinian Authority, which was adopted after Hamas formed a cabinet in March.

The Western aid freeze has plunged the Palestinian territories into a severe economic crisis, which has been compounded by Israel's two-month military offensive in the Gaza Strip, launched after militants killed two soldiers and seized a third in a cross-border raid.

Hamas has killed scores of Israelis over the years in suicide attacks. But it has not claimed any such attack inside the Jewish state since January 2005.

Blair made his comments during a speech to the annual Trades Union Congress (TUC) gathering in Brighton, at which he faced protests including from delegates opposed to what they called the "illegal war" in Lebanon.

The British premier last week pledged to resign within a year, as the price of quelling a damaging crisis within his ruling Labour party over his leadership plans.

His speech to the TUC was therefore his last to the gathering as prime minister.

Annan: Israeli Withdrawal "Significant' (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, September 12, 2006

Israel has made "significant progress" in the gradual withdrawal of its forces from south Lebanon in the month since the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution to end the conflict there, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Tuesday in a report.

The report said both Israel and the Islamic militant group Hezbollah had mostly complied with the cease-fire that was called for in that resolution, aside from one major raid by Israel on Aug. 19 and several minor violations.

The U.N. Security Council had asked Annan to report back periodically on the implementation of the resolution, which paved the way for the cease-fire that took effect on Aug. 14.

He said Israel has withdrawn from about two-thirds of the area it occupied in south Lebanon as it tried to oust Hezbollah militants from the area, and has promised to leave entirely by the time Lebanon deploys 15,000 troops and the U.N. sends 5,000 peacekeepers there.

Annan, who recently returned from an 11-day trip to the region, said the process would be finished in the coming weeks. He did not say how many Israeli troops remained in south Lebanon.

"On the ground, significant progress continues to be made as regards the gradual withdrawal of Israeli forces and the deployment of the LAF (Lebanese Armed Forces)," Annan wrote in the report.

Annan said the 34-day conflict, sparked when Hezbollah captured two Israeli soldiers in a July 12 cross-border raid, had plunged the region "back into the instability that prevailed for decades."

He said the underlying causes of conflict in the Middle East had to be addressed to end the violence.

"Other crises cannot be ignored, especially in the occupied Palestinian territory, as they are all interlinked," he said. "Until the international community insists on a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, any one of these conflicts has the potential to erupt and engulf the entire region."

Annan said that during his recent trip to the Middle East, Syrian President Bashar Assad had assured him that Damascus was prepared to delineate its border with Lebanon. That would help settle the issue of the disputed Chebaa Farms area, which sits where the borders of Lebanon, Syria and Israel meet and is occupied by Israel.

Assad also assured him that Syria is willing to increase the number of border guards along the boundary with Lebanon, and give them more training and supplies.

Hezbollah is widely believed to have received weapons and other support from its backers, Syria and Iran.

On other issues, Annan said Israeli maps provided to the U.N. peacekeeping mission in south Lebanon about Israel's cluster bombing of the area were not detailed enough to be of any use. He repeated U.N. findings that said 90 percent of the cluster bombs Israel dropped during the conflict fell in the three days between Aug. 11, when the Security Council approved the cease-fire, and the moment the fighting stopped.

Land For NATO (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Listening to the post-Lebanon-war debate in Israel leaves me wanting to say just one thing to Israelis: Get a grip on.

Israel is behaving like it lost the Lebanon war and now needs to tear itself apart, limb by limb, with investigations and new elections. Clearly the Israeli Army's logistics broke down, and clearly it was ill-prepared for a guerrilla war against Hezbollah. And clearly it is a sign of the health of Israel's democracy that Israelis feel free to castigate their leadership.

Nevertheless, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert did a better job, under the circumstances, than he is being credited with, and, more important, the situation evolving in south Lebanon now has the potential to offer a whole new model for peacemaking.

Regarding Mr. Olmert, this war was not easy to manage, because it was about everything and nothing. There was absolutely no reason for the Hezbollah attack on July 12 across the U.N.-recognized Israel-Lebanon border, in which eight Israeli soldiers were killed and two abducted. In that sense, the war was about nothing.

But precisely because it was about nothing, it was also about everything. If Hezbollah could just attack Israel — unprovoked — claiming among its goals the liberation of Jerusalem, and using missiles provided by an Iranian regime that says Israel should be wiped off the map, then it was a war about everything. And Israel had to respond resolutely.

So, gauging the right response was intrinsically hard. In the end, Mr. Olmert bombarded Hezbollah's infrastructure, and, tragically but inevitably, the homes of Hezbollah's Shiite followers, among whom Hezbollah fighters were embedded.

The Israeli response was brutal, but it did send a deterrent message, which Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, received. As he put it in an interview on Lebanon's NTV, "If I had known on July 11 ... that the operation would lead to such a war, would I do it? I say no, absolutely not."

Even he doesn't think he won.

Give Nasrallah credit for honesty. What Arab leader has ever been so self-critical? Nasrallah was reacting to those Lebanese voices that said: Thanks for passing out $12,000 to families who lost homes in the fighting, but had you spent that money on schools and jobs, rather than a stupid war, we'd all be better off.

The fact that Condi Rice and the French foreign minister, working with the U.N., were able to secure an international peacekeeping force in south Lebanon is a potentially key achievement on two fronts. If the force works — still a big if — Hezbollah will not be able to directly attack Israel without getting embroiled in a conflict with 15,000 French, Italian, Indian and possibly Turkish peacekeepers. That is a big new strategic problem for Hezbollah, Iran and Syria. They can't hit Israel now without harming their ties with the E.U.

More important, what have we learned in recent years? One, Israel's occupations of the West Bank, Gaza and Lebanon are unsustainable. And two, Lebanon and the Palestinians don't have their act together enough yet to control border areas when Israel leaves — either by agreement (Oslo) or by just unilaterally withdrawing and throwing the keys over the fence. As a result, the peace process has not been "land for peace," but "land for war."

When Israel pulls out of Gaza, Lebanon and the West Bank and wants quiet, it needs a reliable structure of authority on the other side, which, right now, neither Lebanon nor the Palestinians alone can provide.

The U.N./European force evolving in Lebanon may offer a new model. It's not "land for peace," or "land for war," but what I'd call "land for NATO." Israel withdraws and the border is secured by a force that is U.N. on the outside but NATO on the inside.

"The fact that it has a heavy European/NATO component makes it credible to Israel, and the fact that it has a U.N. umbrella makes it acceptable to the Arab world," said the U.N. under secretary Shashi Tharoor, the dynamic Indian diplomat who is a finalist to succeed Kofi Annan as secretary general and who deserves U.S. endorsement.

The Europeans have to understand "that something very big is at stake in this force," said the Israeli political theorist Yaron Ezrahi. They have to prove that demilitarization in south Lebanon can give Israel security and Lebanon both sovereignty and an effective international partner to maintain order. If that happens, he added, "it could revive the chances for an eventual Palestinian-Israeli deal on the West Bank and Gaza."

Yes, it's a long shot, but maybe something good can actually come out of this good-for-nothing Lebanon war.

Bomb Kills 7 In Southeastern Turkey (AP)

By Benjamin Harvey

AP, September 12, 2006

A bomb struck a predominantly Kurdish city in southeastern Turkey on Tuesday, killing seven people and wounding 17, the local governor's office said.

Authorities said the bomb was made from powerful explosives and was set off by a cell phone timer. It was not immediately known who placed it, and nobody claimed responsibility.

The explosion in the city of Diyarbakir happened around 9 p.m. and an investigation had begun, according to a statement from the provincial governor's office, which gave the casualty toll.

The deputy governor of the surrounding Diyarbakir province, Ahmet Aydin, said children were among those killed and two of the injured were in serious condition at a local hospital. Local news stations said five of the seven killed were children.

A Kurdish news agency reported that the blast took place near an elementary school. Witnesses said the blast threw body parts over a wide area and left pools of blood from the killed and injured.

Diyarbakir is Turkey's largest Kurdish-majority city, and the blast came as Kurdish rebels fighting for autonomy in the region have stepped up their attacks.

Also on Tuesday, the Turkish military announced that authorities had defused a remote-controlled bomb planted by Kurdish guerrillas on a busy bridge near the southeastern city of Hatay, and a bomb believed placed by rebels exploded as a freight train carrying coal passed in the eastern province of Bingol, damaging three rail cars.

The United States and Turkey are taking measures to counter Kurdish militants who have training camps in northern Iraq and launch frequent raids into Turkey.

Retired U.S. Air Force Gen. Joseph Ralston arrived in Ankara earlier Tuesday for talks on how to increase U.S.-Turkish cooperation in the fight against the rebels.

More than 37,000 people have been killed in fighting since rebels of the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, took up arms against the Turkish state in 1984.

Both the United States and Turkey consider the group to be a terrorist organization.

Bomb Blast Kills Eight In Turkey's Main Kurdish City (AFP)

By Mahmut Bozarslan

AFP, September 12, 2006

Eight people, among them six children, were killed and 16 others injured in a powerful bomb blast in Diyarbakir, the largest city in Turkey's mainly Kurdish southeast, officials and hospital sources said.

The blast, the deadliest in a string of bombings across Turkey this year, occurred at around 9 pm (1900 GMT) near a bus stop at a crowded park in Diyarbakir's impoverished Baglar district, in which tea gardens are a favorite venue to relax in the evenings.

The bomb blast was heard throughout the city, shattering the windows of nearby buildings and opening small cracks in several walls.

A statement by the local governor's office identified the cause of the blast as a bomb and said that seven people were killed.

A one-year-old girl succumbed to her injuries later, bringing the death toll to eight, hospital sources said.

Another person was in critical condition.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

Diyarbakir, a city of around one million people, is a hotbed of Kurdish separatist militancy.

Covered bodies lay in the midst of pools of blood as the police cordoned off the site and bomb experts clad in white protective gear gathered evidence.

The CNN-Turk news channel said the bomb was detonated by remote control, possibly a mobile telephone.

"We heard that terrible bang and then we saw flames rising as high as five meters from the ground," said Hasan Ozcetinkaya, an employee of a gas station across the street.

"I was resting at home when I heard the explosion. I thought it was either an earthquake or I was losing my mind," Mehmet Sanli, a 75-year-old resident of a building next to the park, said. "I went out barefooted and the street was littered with pieces of glass."

The police launched an extensive security operation after the blast, checking people entering and exiting the city.

DOJ_NMG_0062536

Southeast Turkey has been the theatre of a bloody 22-year Kurdish rebellion, led by the separatist Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which has claimed more than 37,000 lives.

The PKK, blacklisted as a terrorist group by Turkey, the European Union and the United States, has notably stepped up violence this year after it called off a five-year unilateral ceasefire in June 2004.

At least 75 members of the security forces and 104 rebels have been killed in clashes and attacks since the beginning of the year, according to an AFP count.

Kurdish militants have also claimed responsibility for 16 bomb attacks across Turkey, including tourist resorts in the west, which killed a total of 12 people and left around 200 others injured.

Tuesday's attack is likely to put further strain on the government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, which has come under mounting criticism for failing to stop bloodshed in the southeast.

The bomb exploded hours after the arrival in Ankara of a special US envoy, retired general Joseph W. Ralston, who will hold talks with Turkish officials on Wednesday to discuss measures to curb the PKK.

Ankara has long urged Washington to crack down on PKK bases in neighboring northern Iraq, where the group has enjoyed safe haven for years.

On Monday, Turkey's main Kurdish party, the Democratic Society Party, urged the PKK to call a ceasefire.

French Presidential Hopeful Tours The U.S. (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Nicolas Sarkozy is campaigning hard to be the next president of France on the jogging trails of Central Park and in the corridors of the White House.

On a four-day trip to the United States, the 51-year-old minister of the interior, France's leading presidential hopeful on the right, pinned the Legion of Honor on the police commissioner of New York, honored firefighters in Midtown Manhattan for their losses on 9/11 and signed hundreds of copies of his new best-selling book on France's future.

He told Jewish leaders of his love of Israel, American business leaders of his love of free enterprise, and Francophiles of his love of America. He confessed that he loves to read Hemingway and watch movies like "Miami Vice."

He was received by President Bush at the White House (an exceptional event for a mere minister) and by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, on Capitol Hill.

"My devotion to our relationship with America is well known and has earned me substantial criticism in France," Mr. Sarkozy declared in a speech before the French-American Foundation in Washington on Tuesday, his last day here. "I'm not a coward. I'm proud of this friendship, and I proclaim it gladly."

Mr. Sarkozy is calculating that his courtship of America, and his affinity with some policies of the United States, may win him votes on the French right. And he used his trip here both to burnish his standing as a statesman and separate himself from what he considers his government's clumsy diplomacy in crises like those in Iraq and Lebanon.

Mr. Sarkozy is in many ways the most un-French of politicians, a believer in hard work, raw ambition, the man on the street and the American dream.

Despite the French Republican ideal that ignores religious and ethnic differences, Mr. Sarkozy speaks often of his Hungarian father and his foreign-sounding name, and has disclosed that one of his grandfathers was Jewish.

So for him, the nickname "Sarko the American" is not an insult, but a badge of honor.

In his speech on Tuesday, he blamed journalists on both sides of the Atlantic for writing reports often "so far from the truth" about France's adoration and envy of the United States.

The French, he said, "wear American jeans and love American burgers and pizza.

"Nothing makes a French person prouder than seeing a French actor in an American film," he added. "All French parents dream of sending their child to an American university."

Americans, he said, are "so successful and so misunderstood." Although Mr. Sarkozy opposes the war in Iraq, he criticized President Jacques Chirac for the way he conducted diplomacy with the United States before the war. In 2003, Mr. Chirac threatened to veto a United Nations Security Council resolution justifying the war, which infuriated the United States. Mr. Sarkozy called that decision the basis for the misunderstanding between France and the United States, adding that it was no way to treat a friend.

In a closed-door meeting with more than a dozen Jewish leaders on Monday, he said France should not have waited as long as it did to commit troops to Lebanon and went further than Mr. Chirac in criticizing Hezbollah, calling it a "terrorist" organization, according to one participant, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose what took place at the meeting.

Mr. Sarkozy is running as both an insider and an outsider. He is the head of the ruling party, the Union for a Popular Movement, to which Mr. Chirac belongs, but he often calls for a "rupture" with current policies, including those that he believes inhibit job creation and productivity.

He did not go to the École Nationale d'Administration, the preparatory grand school for French political life, as did much of the country's political elite. "I wasn't destined to have a great role in society," he once said. "I had to go out and get it."

So it is as an outsider that he seems unconcerned that his appearance with Mr. Bush, who is more unpopular than ever in France these days, will hurt politically. On the contrary, Mr. Bush is the most recent in a string of foreign leaders Mr. Sarkozy has met with in recent weeks.

Playing the role of an ad hoc foreign minister, he discussed genocide in Darfur, the nuclear crisis with Iran and peacemaking in Lebanon with the United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, on Monday.

Mr. Sarkozy also appears to be wooing voters on the right through his anti-immigration, anticrime, antiterrorism policies to lure them from the extreme right-wing National Front party of Jean-Marie Le Pen. The highlight of the trip was an unannounced meeting with Mr. Bush at the White House on Tuesday during a scheduled meeting Mr. Sarkozy had with Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser.

Mr. Chirac, who was the first foreign leader to visit Mr. Bush at the White House after the 9/11 attacks, has been waiting for a return invitation ever since.

The purpose of Mr. Bush's appearance was in part to reward Mr. Sarkozy for his America-friendly foreign policy. "Certainly this can be seen as a signal to the current leadership in France," said one senior American official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly. "Sarkozy has shown he has a different attitude towards the United States."

The official said the meeting was negotiated by both sides.

The White House even allowed a photo of the two men to be released, following a day of negotiation with French officials, the official said.

Frederick Jones, the National Security Council spokesman, said Mr. Bush joined the meeting in Mr. Hadley's office for about 25 minutes.

Mr. Sarkozy also met Tuesday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security. To prove that the Bush administration is not taking sides in an election next April in which the parties have yet to choose candidates, Mr. Bush would also be willing to meet Ségolène Royal, the 52-year-old Socialist who is running neck and neck with Mr. Sarkozy in the polls, according to an American and a French official.

Mr. Sarkozy strongly opposes Turkey's bid for membership in the European Union, arguing that it will change Europe's character at a time when France and other European countries cannot manage the problems of their already large Muslim populations.

In the meeting with Jewish leaders, for example, he said Europe had a problem with its own Muslim population and asked, "So why is America advocating Turkish membership in the European Union?" according to one participant. He added, "We don't have a model of handling Muslims in Europe, so why should we bring in the Turks?"

He said the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, had told him that one day Europe would be Muslim, and added that it would be "terrible" if such a thing happened with American help, the participant said.

Mr. Chirac, by contrast, is much more nuanced, cautiously endorsing Turkey's membership, but saying it could be a 10- to 15-year effort, and even then, would not be certain.

Mr. Sarkozy worked so hard to charm his American interlocutors during his trip that he even struggled to speak English.

"I run. This morning. In Central Park. With T-shirt firefighters," he told Nicholas Scoppetta, the New York City fire commissioner, at a ceremony honoring New York firefighters.

"Wonderful! Excellent!" Mr. Scoppetta replied. Turning to a reporter, he added: "His English? He'd be the first to say he's a little embarrassed by it. But he's delightful. It's unfortunate that my vote doesn't count in France."

Mr. Sarkozy is already being attacked by his political opponents back home for using the visit — ostensibly a trip to commemorate the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks — for partisan political ends and paying for it with taxpayers' money.

In a television interview on Monday, for example, the former Socialist culture minister and presidential hopeful Jack Lang called Mr. Sarkozy's use of public funds for a trip with personal political aims "illegitimate."

Mr. Sarkozy also defended his actions, telling reporters on Monday that it was "very important" for a French politician to understand global problems, adding, "Of course, I will continue to travel, to understand or learn so that security in France can be ensured."

The tough-talking, law-and-order Mr. Sarkozy was most frank in his meeting with Jewish leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0062538

He praised his handling of riots last fall in the Paris suburbs and other cities and explained his continuing popularity. “I have called gangs scum, and I am still leading in the polls,” he said, one participant said.

He acknowledged that it is often the French elite who oppose him, adding, “Some of the French elite hate me more than they hate America.”

Sarkozy Looks To Closer Ties After Bush Era (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

A bomb scare near the White House on Tuesday delayed a speech by Nicolas Sarkozy, France’s interior minister, but only served to strengthen his personal pro-American, pro-Israel message while burnishing his presidential credentials overseas.

However, like David Cameron, leader of Britain’s opposition Conservatives in an address in London a day earlierMr Sarkozy was clearly looking towards the post-Bush era, directing his enthusiasm at the American nation and not its current administration.

Mr Sarkozy, front-runner to become the right’s presidential candidate next year, mentioned President George W. Bush only briefly and France’s Jacques Chirac not at all. In fact the interior minister seemed to distance himself from his own president, speaking of French “arrogance” and calling for a new era in transatlantic relations.

Welcoming his critics’ attacks on his pro-American stance, Mr Sarkozy declared: “I’m not a coward. I am proud of this friendship and proclaim it gladly.”

Turning to the crisis in Lebanon, Mr Sarkozy also spoke of his affinity to Israel in language that any mainstream American presidential aspirant would adopt.

“I would like to state how close I feel to Israel,” he said, departing from the text of his speech. He said Israel’s response in Lebanon might be considered “clumsy and disproportionate” but the “truth” was that Israel had a right to defend itself against the “aggressor” Hizbollah. “We are by your side,” he said.

Hosted by the French American Foundation in the elegant setting of the National Society of the Daughters of the Revolution, Mr Sarkozy was preaching to the converted. But still he went to great lengths to describe the nations’ historic ties and French admiration, if touched with envy, for America’s “brilliant successes”.

These included its economic, monetary and military power, rich intellectual life, the draw of US universities, its model of social integration, and the television series Miami Vice, jeans, burgers and pizza.

He rejected US pressure on the EU to accept Turkey as a member, saying this was not logical while countries such as France were struggling to integrate their own Muslim populations.

While sounding alarmist in his interpretation of the threat posed by Iran and its nuclear programme, Mr Sarkozy stressed the need for diplomacy and voiced scepticism about sanctions.

U.S. Creates Five Groups To Eye Cuba (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - Convinced that Fidel Castro will never regain the power he once wielded, the Bush administration has created five interagency working groups to monitor Cuba and carry out U.S. policies.

The groups, some of which operate in a war-room-like setting, were quietly set up after the July 31 announcement that the ailing Cuban leader had temporarily ceded power to a collective leadership headed by his brother Raúl, U.S. officials have told The Miami Herald.

Their composition reflects both the administration's Cuban policy priorities as well as the belief that the 80-year-old Castro's status as the island's undisputed leader is finished, regardless of the nature of his still-mysterious ailment.

Thomas Shannon, U.S. assistant secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere, said last month that Castro "does not appear" to be in a position to return to day-to-day management.

Eric Watnik, a State Department spokesman on Cuban issues, went further, telling The Miami Herald that Castro "will never come back to the position that he previously enjoyed." He declined to detail any evidence the U.S. government has for such a belief.

U.S. officials say three of the newly created groups are headed by the State Department: diplomatic actions; strategic communications and democratic promotion. Another that coordinated humanitarian aid to Cuba is run by the Commerce Department, and a fifth, on migration issues, is run jointly by the National Security Council and the Department of Homeland Security.

Many members of the groups work out of the same State Department office in what one person familiar with the operation described as a ``control room."

The State Department is reluctant to give details of the new interagency groups, saying the focus should be on the democratic transition the groups are trying to achieve in Cuba rather than on the U.S. government process.

But the overall idea is to exchange views with other governments and create a common external front as Cuba begins its post-Castro transition, said U.S. officials who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the issues.

Officials portrayed the working groups as logical outcomes of the Commission on Assistance to a Free Cuba, an interagency Cabinet-level effort that has been convened twice to draft policy recommendations. The second commission report, co-chaired by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, was issued in July, just weeks before Castro underwent surgery for intestinal bleeding caused by a still undisclosed ailment.

It recommended more aid to Castro opponents, a diplomatic campaign to offset Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's alleged efforts to prolong communism in Cuba, and stricter enforcement of existing sanctions. It also recommended more coordination between government agencies.

The establishment of the new interagency working groups came around the same time as the intelligence community was also bolstering its monitoring of Cuba. Last month, U.S. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte appointed CIA veteran Patrick Maher as acting mission manager for Cuba and Venezuela. Officials say the post had been planned before the announcement of Castro's illness.

HIGH-LEVEL POST

The position is considered "very high level," according to Brian Latell, a retired CIA analyst on Cuba and author of a recent book on Fidel and Raúl Castro, After Fidel.

Such mission managers usually oversee a staff of between four and six people that culls intelligence information on the target countries. Though the post is essentially one of coordination, the manager is also expected to "be an activist" to stimulate better information gathering from the different branches of the intelligence services, Latell said.

The creation of the post also underlined the national security importance of Cuba and Venezuela. Only Iran and North Korea -- both perceived as nuclear threats -- currently have similar U.S. mission managers overseeing them. Three other managers oversee counterterrorism, counterintelligence and counterproliferation.

The Bush administration's policy on Cuba has been straightforward: pressure Havana to adopt democratic reforms through a combination of economic sanctions and diplomatic isolation.

But when specific options are discussed, Cuba has often turned out to be divisive.

The Department of Defense, for instance, has balked at acting too aggressively for fear of igniting a crisis in the U.S. back yard at a time when U.S. forces already are stretched thin by the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Mauricio Claver-Carone, who heads the U.S.-Cuba Democracy Political Action Committee in Washington, which lobbies Congress for tougher sanctions on the island, says democratic change in Cuba should "supersede perceived instability" concerns.

He said that the State Department and the White House are committed to "democracy above all options," while Homeland Security and the Pentagon are ``ambivalent to drastic change in Cuba."

MARTI BROADCASTS

Another example is an effort to ease the restriction requiring the U.S. airplanes that broadcast Radio and TV Martí to Cuba to remain within U.S. territorial airspace -- a measure that limits its ability to get around Cuban jamming.

Some Cuban-American activists have long advocated allowing the aircraft to wander into international airspace despite concerns about violating international broadcasting regulations. But the Cuban government considers all Martí broadcasts provocations that violate international law.

Miami Republican Rep. Lincoln Díaz-Balart told The Miami Herald in an interview earlier this year that the aircraft ``should be able to fly from wherever it has to fly so that the signal can't be jammed."

Dance Of Diplomacy Is Grist For The Gossip Mill (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

STELLARTON, Nova Scotia, Sept. 12 — There are perils to being unattached in the stodgy world of diplomacy. Sometimes it has seemed that all Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice needs to do is show up in public with a man, and people start talking.

The single, sophisticated American secretary of state once drew notice for wearing black stiletto knee-high boots with an above-the-knee black skirt while reviewing American troops in Germany, so she is bound to attract gossip. That is particularly true on the dry, acronym-ridden diplomatic circuit of NATO meetings, APEC forums and Asean conclaves, where much imagination has focused on possible romantic links between Ms. Rice and her counterparts.

Until now, Ms. Rice's rumored matches have been, shall we say, unlikely ever to appear on the cover of GQ magazine. In July, Italy's normally staid Corriere della Sera raised its eyebrows over a joint appearance in Rome between Italy's similarly staid foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, and Ms. Rice. In April, a headline in The Boston Globe promised a tale of "Jack and Condi: A Love Story," after Ms. Rice gave the pullout bed aboard her plane to the former British foreign minister, Jack Straw, during a surprise trip to Baghdad from Blackpool, England, where she was visiting Mr. Straw's hometown.

But it took a two-hour flight to Halifax, Nova Scotia, this week, followed by a 90-minute motorcade north up Highway 102 to Pictou County, for Ms. Rice to find herself linked to someone with similar star appeal: Peter MacKay of Canada, the single, sophisticated foreign minister, routinely named Canada's sexiest M.P. by The Hill Times in Ottawa, and the closest thing to eye candy on the diplomatic circuit. Tall, athletic, young, blond and recently dumped by his girlfriend, a fellow member of Parliament, Belinda Stronach, who parted with him when she switched parties, Mr. MacKay does not look like your usual foreign minister.

He has a tan and the build of someone who spends his time on the rugby field, not holed up reading G-8 communiqués. Sure, at 40 years old, he is younger than Ms. Rice, who is 51, but that did not stop gossips from engaging in baseless speculating.

Even the protesters who routinely show up wherever Ms. Rice goes got in on the act. "Pete, Condi, Make Love Not War," read one sign, carried by a grinning demonstrator who had roused himself to take a position early Tuesday morning in front of the Museum of Industry here, where the two spoke to local leaders and the press.

O.K., there needs to be a disclaimer right here. Foreign ministers rarely have a lot of alone time together. There is no evidence whatsoever to suggest that Ms. Rice and Mr. MacKay are linked by anything more than their shared status as singletons.

The State Department has been quick to dump cold water over MacKay-Rice innuendoes. "No, there were no candles," Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said in exasperation when reporters asked for further details about a working dinner on Monday when the two sat side by side at the Pictou Lodge Resort. Mr. McCormack pointed out that the dinner was not even intimate: 14 aides and six security guards were present.

"It was a well lighted dinner, with electricity-based lighting," Mr. McCormack said.

But reporters tend to get bored pretty fast — there is only so much ink anyone can devote to softwood lumber trade spats and overfishing in the North Atlantic. And a bored reporter is a gossipy reporter, as demonstrated by the chatter last year after Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld took a dinner cruise up a Norwegian fjord and sipped wine with his counterpart, the Norwegian defense minister, Kristin Krohn Devold. (She gave him a sweater; he gave her a designer bag.)

If you believe the blogs, Mr. MacKay has been sweet on Ms. Rice since their first meeting in Washington last year. "Peter McKay has a crush... " said a headline on the Web site NowPublic, atop a giant photo of Ms. Rice, "...on Condoleezza Rice." The subhead continued: "Well, they are both single after all.''

Ms. Rice and Mr. MacKay even made the "Hot and Not" list in a column in the Toronto newspaper The Globe and Mail on Saturday. "Hot: Peter MacKay and Condoleezza Rice," the column, Ottawa Notebook, read.

The two do keep offering up tantalizing tidbits and comments to take out of context and misconstrue. For instance, after the Rome meeting in July, Ms. Rice gave Mr. McKay a ride aboard her plane to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, for a conference with Southeast Asian countries. O.K., the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, got a lift, too, but he looks like, well, a diplomat.

On Tuesday morning, Ms. Rice and Mr. MacKay strolled up to their side-by-side daises to talk to the folks here. "I am just delighted to have Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, here in my hometown," gushed a beaming Mr. MacKay, wearing a pearl gray suit, pink and blue striped tie.

He switched to bad French, even to some American ears, and said something about Longfellow's poem "Evangeline." He mentioned Nova Scotia's rich black history, citing the "black loyalist community, Canada's oldest community of African heritage."

Then, he said, "Something else I've learned about Secretary Rice is she loves the cool Atlantic breezes here in Nova Scotia, and she left the window open last night." The audience tittered.

At the end of his speech, he took off his glasses, turned to Ms. Rice and said, "Please come back again."

Ms. Rice, clad in a yellow jacket, black pencil skirt and black heels, also offered plenty of fodder. She repeatedly called Mr. MacKay "Peter" (he called her "Secretary Rice" or "Miss Rice"), confirmed the sleeping-with-the-window-open bit, and told the assembled local leaders that Mr. MacKay had introduced her to his family, including his father and stepmother, the night before.

Family is important, she said, with a sly smile, because "they remind you of the things you did when you were 5 years old." Beside her, Mr. MacKay grinned and blushed.

North Korea Rift Hangs Over Bush-Roh Summit (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea and the U.S. are strengthening their economic and military relationships, but their divergent views on how to deal with North Korea will provide an uncomfortable backdrop on a meeting in Washington tomorrow between the countries' presidents.

The missile tests North Korea conducted in July laid bare major strategic differences between Washington and Seoul that could widen if Pyongyang goes through with an underground nuclear-bomb test that U.S. intelligence sources say it is preparing.

President Bush pushed for United Nations sanctions against North Korea after the missile tests. South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun only mildly criticized Pyongyang and tried to dissuade allies such as the U.S. and Japan from reacting too strongly.

Both the U.S. and South Korea want to stop Pyongyang's nuclear-weapons program. But Washington also would like to see leader Kim Jong Il's regime collapse, in the hope of removing a threat to regional stability and ending decades of repression that have left North Korea one of the world's poorest countries.

Mr. Roh and many South Koreans worry that a North Korean collapse would leave them with an enormous mess to clean up -- one that would cost tens of billions of dollars, slow the South's growth and pit Seoul against China in a race for control of the North. In addition, with the U.S. military and budget stretched by the Iraq war, one South Korean official says, "we don't envision U.S. taxpayers putting up billions to help us in this."

For the past five years, South Korea's government has made economic investments in the North and provided food aid to promote slow change in Pyongyang and eventual unification with it.

Under Mr. Roh, the fear of destabilizing the North has become so intense that South Korean government officials tamp many actions they think the Kim regime might view as provocative. Two weeks ago, Seoul asked a church group to stop sending missionary leaflets northward via balloons, citing an agreement made with the North in 2004 to halt propaganda.

Mr. Roh earlier this year offered to meet Mr. Kim anytime and anywhere, in hopes of broadening economic ties. The U.S. refuses to meet North Korea's leadership outside a broader arena such as the U.N. or the deadlocked six-nation talks, which, in addition to the U.S. and the two Koreas, involve China, Japan and Russia.

The danger in the U.S.-South Korea division over how to cope with the North is that the partners aren't preparing for the long-term problem of what to do when the Kim regime ends, says Michael Auslin, a professor of East Asian history at Yale University.

"The nuclear crisis is a symptom of a disease. The disease is Kim himself," Mr. Auslin says. Given that other countries have watched the situation for 50 years, he adds, it would show "gross negligence" on their part if Mr. Kim's regime collapsed tomorrow and they didn't have a strategy in place to deal with it.

At their Washington summit, however, Messrs. Bush and Roh are expected to focus mainly on matters on which the U.S. and South Korea are aligned, including the development of a free-trade agreement and plans to shift wartime control of their joint military command to a Korean general from a U.S. one, for the first time in half a century. That shift is likely to occur between 2009 and 2012.

Both issues are controversial in South Korea. Support for free trade divides along political lines, but opposition to Korean control of its military in wartime is broader, arousing fears that it is a step toward the withdrawal of U.S. troops.

U.S. military officials have tried to assure South Koreans that they stand by the country and its military. "There will be no change in the security of this peninsula caused by the transfer of that control," says Stephen Sargeant, a U.S. Air Force general who is deputy chief of staff of the combined forces in Korea.

S. Korea, U.S. To Revisit Alliance (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Two allies who frequently talk past each other will talk directly this week when South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun meets with President Bush for a White House working visit tomorrow.

The summit comes amid delicate talks over the command of South Korean troops in wartime and a larger debate on both sides about the purpose and future of an alliance forged in a Cold War conflict that ended more than a half century ago.

"I still believe the fundamentals of the strategic alliance are strong, but there is an awful lot of bad noise surrounding our relationship with South Korea," said Michael Green, point man for Asian affairs at the National Security Council in Mr. Bush's first term who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"It will take a good bit of management on our side to keep the relationship healthy," he said.

But the Roh government's policy of engaging North Korea contrasts with Washington's hardening line against Pyongyang over its nuclear programs. The North Korea issue -- and growing fears in Seoul that the U.S. wants to use South Korea to promote its own interests across the region -- have strained the alliance, said Adam Ward, executive director of the U.S. arm of the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS).

"There's no common understanding now of what the alliance is for," Mr. Ward said. "Washington and Seoul have very different assessments of what the major threats are in the region."

The IISS global strategic survey, released last week, noted, "Where Americans see an increasingly dangerous and repressive evil regime [in North Korea], South Koreans see a pitiable renegade brother, estranged by an accident of history in which America was culpable."

Mr. Roh, a former labor organizer elected on a center-left platform in 2002, demonstrated the perception gap again last week, telling reporters on a European tour that Pyongyang's July 4 missile test -- condemned by the United States and Japan -- was more political theater than military threat.

"The missiles were too shabby to go to the U.S. and too big to go to South Korea," he said, according to a statement released by his office. "I believe the missiles were not for actual military attack but were launched for political purposes."

Mr. Roh's government has steadily increased aid to the North and has complained about U.S. criticisms of the North's human rights record.

Mr. Roh in January warned of potential bilateral friction with the United States over the North.

"The South Korean government does not agree with some forces in the United States that raise issues about North Korea's regime, put pressure on it and apparently desire to see its collapse," he said.

U.S. officials, in turn, have expressed frustration privately about the South's rapprochement with the North, which has continued even as the North boycotts multilateral talks organized by China about its nuclear missile programs.

Thomas Hubbard, ambassador to South Korea from 2001 to 2004, said he expected a "productive meeting" between Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh, but acknowledged, "We could do a better job managing the relationship."

"The central problem is that, just as Americans are coming to see North Korea as a greater threat, ... South Koreans, especially the younger generation, have come to see North Korea as less of a threat," he said.

Mr. Green said that despite often-noisy anti-American sentiment in the South, Seoul and Washington remain united on the need for the alliance to deter North Korea, to preserve the South's autonomy and to work for stability in northeastern Asia.

South Korea under Mr. Roh, he noted, has dispatched troops to Iraq, begun a politically sensitive reorganization of U.S. military bases and started negotiations -- ahead of Japan and China -- on a major free-trade agreement with the United States. Popular resentment of the United States has even fallen in recent polls, he said.

"The problem is that the Roh government is so invested in the policy of engaging with the North -- even when it plainly hasn't produced results -- that it can create a lot of sparks and disharmony," Mr. Green said.

But Mr. Ward said the South Korean mission in Iraq only underscored the growing strategic disconnect in the two capitals.

"The Americans see the South Korean deployment as the kind of role they think Seoul can play to help U.S. interests," he said. "The South Koreans see the mission as the price they have to pay to keep the U.S. side tied to the military alliance at home."

Many in South Korea, he added, are wary that the United States hopes to enlist Seoul in a long-term campaign to contain the growing economic and military clout of China. China recently surpassed the United States as Seoul's largest trading partner.

Although Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh lack the personal chemistry that Mr. Bush has had with Japanese leader Junichiro Koizumi, Mr. Green said the two leaders are "straight talkers" and have generally worked well together in past meetings.

South Korean officials said last week that the two leaders may discuss but are unlikely to resolve one of the more ticklish bilateral issues -- a push by Seoul to reclaim operational control in wartime of its own forces. Under agreements dating back to the Korean War, U.S. generals have been charged with the command of both U.S. and South Korean forces should hostilities break out.

Mr. Roh has strongly supported the command transfer as a way to bolster the South's sovereignty and control of its national defense. About 29,500 U.S. troops are stationed in the South.

South Korean and U.S. military officials are still negotiating a date for the transfer. Gen. B.B. Bell, the top U.S. military commander in South Korea, told reporters last week that he supported the transfer and said the U.S. commitment to the South's security would not be diminished by the shift.

But South Korean conservatives and former military and diplomatic officials have criticized the idea, saying it would send the wrong signal to Pyongyang and weaken the alliance.

IMF Warns Lingering Imbalances May Spur Volatile Fall In Dollar (WSJ)

By Iain McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

SINGAPORE -- The risk of a disorderly decline in the U.S. dollar could increase unless policies are put in place to address global savings-and-investment imbalances, the International Monetary Fund said.

In its latest assessment of the global financial system, the IMF said financial-market corrections in May and June are a reminder for policy makers to strengthen economic policy and pursue needed structural changes.

Starting in May, and since the IMF's previous financial-stability report, prices of risky assets fell as investors turned risk averse amid concerns that rising oil and commodity prices would increase inflation and interest rates.

The IMF said emerging Asian countries should be more ambitious in increasing exchange-rate flexibility, the U.S. should consolidate its fiscal position and Europe and Japan should speed up structural changes.

Market consensus is for Asian currencies to appreciate in the medium term while non-Asian currencies weaken, the IMF said.

"The risk of a disorderly dollar adjustment could well increase without policies being put into place to foster the needed adjustments in saving and investment imbalances," it said.

The IMF's warning is the latest in a string of cautions by policy makers around the globe of the potential for significant financial-market volatility and asset-price slumps should the unwinding of global imbalances turn messy.

It noted that foreign holdings of U.S. assets continue to climb, rising to $6.3 trillion by June 2005 from $1.2 trillion in 1994.

The IMF's report comes ahead of annual meetings that it and the World Bank will hold in Singapore, starting Sunday. Ahead of those meetings, finance ministers and central bankers from the Group of Seven leading industrial countries will meet Saturday in Singapore.

Financial markets are particularly vulnerable to instability because many asset prices don't include any significant premium to reflect risks of a weaker global economic outlook and possible sharp moves in financial markets, it said.

Some emerging-market countries with large current-account deficits that rely heavily on foreign-capital inflows would be vulnerable to volatile market moves, it said.

In its report, the IMF found that contrary to popular belief, the scale of yen-carry trade -- a strategy to exploit low Japanese interest rates to earn higher returns elsewhere -- has been "moderate."

Many financial traders think that the trading strategy, in which people borrow yen cheaply and exchange it for other currencies to invest in more attractive assets overseas, has been very popular.

The IMF said "by most indications, the scale of the trade and subsequent unwinding has been moderate."

China-Tariff Discord Escalates (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The U.S., the European Union and Canada are set to file a joint complaint with the World Trade Organization against China's import tariffs on auto parts, said people familiar with the matter.

The complaint, which could be filed as soon as this week, marks the first time the Western allies have teamed up to seek a formal investigation by the global trade body in a dispute with the Asian giant.

In March the three governments filed a preliminary complaint against Chinese protection of its auto-parts manufacturers. In negotiations with the governments, China has refused to change its protectionist policy, which charges an average 25% levy on imported auto parts. That leaves formal complaint as a last recourse at the WTO for Washington, Brussels and Ottawa.

"We have long voiced our concern and disquiet with the Chinese on this issue," said European Commission spokesman Peter Power. The U.S. exported only about $540 million of auto parts to China last year, a market estimated at $19 billion. The EU says its auto-parts exports to China are valued at about €3 billion, or roughly $4 billion.

The complaint could result in punitive special tariffs being imposed on Beijing.

The Chinese delegation to the WTO in Geneva didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

The issue will likely be discussed at a regular WTO meeting on trade disputes scheduled for Sept. 28, the people familiar with the matter said. Complaints from WTO members need to be filed two weeks before the monthly gatherings.

China exempts companies with factories in China -- such as General Motors Corp., Volkswagen AG and DaimlerChrysler AG -- from paying the tariff only if they buy at least 40% of their parts from local producers.

In trade terms, such "local content" requirements violate free-trade rules China pledged to meet when it joined the WTO in 2001. The rule handicaps foreign auto-parts suppliers competing for a share of the four million autos made every year in China.

Auto makers say they have difficulty finding enough local providers who can meet their standards.

DaimlerChrysler, for instance, began making the Mercedes E-Class in Beijing in December. The auto maker says it would like to avoid the tariffs by using local suppliers. "We're still looking for local providers who meet our standards so we can get to 40%," said Trevor Hale, a spokesman for DaimlerChrysler in China.

General Motors said recently that it would stop production of its Buick Royaum model in China partly because importing parts had become too expensive.

Others worry that setting up in China to meet local-content requirements ultimately invites piracy. Finland's prime minister said at a EU-China business summit in Helsinki yesterday that European companies were afraid of investing in China for fear their "expensive and hard-won technology" would be copied.

The joint move follows the EU's adoption of a tougher line on Chinese imports. Last month, the European Commission asked EU members to approve tariffs of 16.5% on imports of certain types of leather shoes from China.

EU members are divided on that issue. Shoe-producing countries like Italy want the tariffs. They are opposed by governments like the U.K. and Ireland that are standing up for European retailers who book healthy profits on selling inexpensive Chinese goods.

Chinese exports to the EU had risen to €158 billion in 2005 from €74 billion in 2000, according to statistics agency Eurostat. Imports into China from the EU increased to €52 billion from €26 billion over the same period.

China's Export Engine (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman And Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Hunched over clattering machinery, the 170 workers at a factory here churn out gleaming pistons for auto engines by the crateful, driven by surging demand from abroad. To hear managers at Shanghai Datong Automotive Industrial Co. tell it, their success overseas is due to efficiency and rock-bottom costs. "Our technology is good, our wages are low and materials are abundant," said Jin Zhangfu, the plant's manufacturing supervisor.

But in the American heartland towns where auto parts makers are struggling to survive, an entirely different explanation -- China's cheap currency -- is proffered for the competitiveness of companies such as Shanghai Datong. Such complaints are expected to get high-level attention in coming days as the Bush administration's new Treasury secretary visits Asia.

Wes Smith, president of E&E Manufacturing Co. of Plymouth, Mich., a maker of fasteners and other auto components, blamed much of "the world of hurt" his company is suffering on Beijing's policy of keeping the value of the yuan tightly controlled at a level that, he said, gives Chinese manufacturers an unfair advantage.

"It's not that we're competing against the so-called dollar-a-day wage," Smith said. "It's that they subsidize their production with currency manipulation."

Criticism over China's currency policy has alternately flared and subsided for several years, but the problem is reaching a new and potentially explosive stage as the Chinese export juggernaut moves up the ladder from clothes, toys and televisions to goods such as auto parts.

The issue is to be debated this weekend at annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Singapore, and again during Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.'s visit to China next week. Although some economists view the matter as overblown, others say the yuan's exchange rate is so far out of line as to constitute a dangerous distortion in global trade.

At a hearing last month of a body created by Congress to study U.S.-Chinese issues, Brad Setser, director of global research at Roubini Global Economics LLC, said that China's exports, which were about $325 billion in 2002, are on pace to reach $950 billion this year, "an extraordinary increase" in a brief period. During that time, he added, the Chinese current account surplus, the broadest measure of the gap between exports and imports, has risen six-fold, to an estimated $220 billion in 2006, an amount equal to about 8 percent of China's total economic output.

That is simple but powerful substantiation that the yuan is grossly undervalued, in the view of Setser and other economists.

In 2002, the U.S. dollar began declining sharply against other major currencies including the euro, British pound, Japanese yen and Canadian and Australian dollars, but not the yuan, which the Chinese government kept rigidly pegged at 8.28 per dollar. Under pressure from the United States, China announced in July 2005 that it would raise the value of the yuan by about 2 percent and allow it to move more according to supply and demand. But Beijing's restrictions over money flowing in and out of the country have helped keep further appreciation to a minimum -- about another 2 percent, far less than the 20 to 40 percent that some analysts estimate is warranted.

Auto parts illustrate the phenomenon clearly.

China's rapidly growing auto industry used to depend heavily on imported components, but last year for the first time the country exported more auto parts than it bought from abroad. Sales to the U.S. market have leapt 39 percent, to $5.4 billion in 2005. Worldwide, China has set a goal of exporting $70 billion worth of parts by 2010--a seven-fold increase from last year's level. That is exacerbating the woes of a U.S. industry that is already struggling, as witnessed by Delphi Corp.'s Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing. And while labor costs explain much about why Chinese firms have penetrated such sectors as furniture, auto parts makers blame the currency as a decisive factor.

For example, Dura Automotive Systems Inc. of Rochester Hills, Mich., has manufacturing plants in 14 countries, including China. It sells parking-brake cables made in the United States for $4.50, on which it earns a profit of 35 cents. The sales price in the United States of comparable Chinese cables is $3.70, effectively less than the U.S. cost of production, said Larry Denton, Dura's chairman and chief executive.

"If I were to balance the currency at the appropriate level," Denton said, that is, by raising the yuan as much as the Australian dollar, British pound or euro have risen against the U.S. dollar in the past several years, "the Chinese sell price and the U.S. sell price would be nearly identical, at $4.50. We would compete in a level marketplace."

In a world where nearly all major countries have moved in recent decades to currencies that float from fixed exchange rates, China has kept a different system. Limiting capital inflows and outflows enabled China to keep the yuan steady and avoid the financial crises that struck its Asian neighbors in the late 1990s, a feat for which it earned international praise. The fixed-rate policy also helped tame inflation during the 1990s.

Now, however, a major factor behind Chinese policy is the fear that a rapid appreciation of the yuan would make exports less competitive, threatening jobs.

"Traditionally, China relies on exports for growth, and the government is very nervous about harming this," said He Fan, an economist at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences in Beijing. "There would be huge unemployment."

Those worries may be understandable, given that a big rise in joblessness could threaten China's stability, but they show that Beijing's currency regime amounts to a beggar-thy-neighbor policy, some economists assert.

By allowing China to underprice its goods, the situation "enables them to export some of their unemployment to the rest of the world and take huge advantage of the currency misalignment," said C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics in Washington.

The result, aside from the impact on companies and jobs in the United States, is a widening of the vast trade imbalances that could eventually lead to turmoil in the global economy, according to Bergsten and other economists.

The U.S. deficit with China accounted for more than a quarter of the $716 billion U.S. trade gap last year. That is why China's currency policy will be on the agenda at the IMF-World Bank meeting in Singapore. Top policymakers will discuss ways to shrink such imbalances for fear that foreign investors may become spooked by the burgeoning U.S. deficit and dump their holdings of U.S. stocks and bonds. The issue will also be center stage when Paulson meets with Chinese leaders in his first trip to Beijing as Treasury chief.

"We're going to ramp up and intensify our interaction with them," said Timothy D. Adams, the Treasury undersecretary for international affairs, citing Paulson's extensive experience in China when he headed the investment banking firm Goldman Sachs.

China needs to do a lot more than just allow the yuan to appreciate, Adams emphasized. Paulson's trip will also stress the need for Beijing to shift away from exports toward greater consumer spending. But Congress is pressing for action on the currency, with lawmakers threatening punitive tariffs on Chinese goods.

Some economists consider such demands misplaced. Ronald I. McKinnon, a professor of international economics at Stanford University, said that most Chinese products sold abroad are consumer goods assembled in China using components from Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and Thailand, among other places.

"China is merely the face of a worldwide export surge into American consumer markets," McKinnon argued in a paper published in July with a colleague, noting that at Christmas, when "American families open their presents, they see mainly made-in-China labels!"

According to McKinnon, a substantial rise in the yuan would lead to a fall in China's exports but would damage the Chinese economy so severely that the nation's demand for foreign goods would plunge as well, the result being no net shrinkage in the trade imbalance. That, McKinnon points out, is what happened with Japan in the last decade when it bowed to U.S. insistence on a rise in the value of the Japanese yen.

In recent months, a new issue has dominated the debate -- the risk that China's economy has overheated. Policymakers in Beijing are concerned that a boom in such fast-growing sectors as autos and real estate is leading to construction of more factories and office parks than China can use. The upshot could be a bust that would wreck the banking system.

Some economists assert that a higher yuan is precisely the right medicine. According to this theory, that would slow exports, limiting the buildup of China's foreign reserves and slowing the flow of funds into banks whose lending is fueling investment.

The Beijing government remains divided over how quickly to move, with the central bank urging a faster appreciation to prevent overheating and other ministries lobbying for little change.

Chinese exporters are vocal in opposing a rise in the currency. At the Shanghai Datong plant, Jin, the manufacturing supervisor, was asked recently what would happen if the yuan were to rise by 10 percent or so. He looked pained. "We couldn't afford that," he said.

Analysts say China's powerful State Council is striving to maintain a middle position, the most likely outcome being a rise in the yuan of perhaps 3 to 5 percent a year over the next two years.

"The consequences are so great that ultimately nobody can make a decision," said Mao Yushi, chairman of the Unirule Institute of Economics in Beijing. "Everyone knows the [yuan] must appreciate now, but no one has the courage to make it happen."

China's Echo Chamber (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

China has long prided itself on its ability to master capitalism without indulging in the messy business of democracy. So Beijing got a twofer this week when it gave the state-run Xinhua news agency monopoly control over the lucrative financial news business and the power to administer broad censorship rules for all foreign news entering China.

Xinhua even got to announce the news of the new regulations. Not surprisingly, it didn't quote any critics.

Foreign agencies have long been barred from selling general news directly to the Chinese media. Some foreign companies have been quietly testing the limits as the number of Chinese media outlets has grown and Chinese editors have become more daring. Xinhua sent a clear warning to all sides, listing 10 categories of news covering politics, religion and national unity — code for Taiwan —that could not be released into China.

For the last decade financial news providers received better treatment and were allowed to sell their less politically sensitive information directly to banks and brokers. Now, under the new rules, they will have to distribute their wares through a designated agent of Xinhua — a fine way to get Xinhua, which is eager to sell its own financial news, a guaranteed cut of that multimillion-dollar action.

All of this comes at a time when honest journalism is increasingly under attack. Last month, a Chinese court sentenced Zhao Yan, a New York Times researcher and journalist, to three years in prison on a specious fraud charge. Soon after, another court sentenced Ching Cheong, a reporter for The Straits Times newspaper of Singapore, to five years in prison on trumped-up espionage charges.

Media organizations and governments, including the Bush administration, are right to protest these abuses as loudly and as often as they can. But the painful reality is that China's autocrats aren't usually moved by appeals to their better nature — or for that matter warnings that keeping such a tight lid on a society undergoing rapid changes could eventually explode in their faces.

What they do understand is how rich they've gotten since joining the World Trade Organization. These new rules appear, at a minimum, to violate their W.T.O. pledges to liberalize access to financial information. Trade officials and foreign business leaders need to remind Beijing's leaders of those promises. And they need to warn them that a country that keeps a stranglehold on information is not a great place to invest.

Blind Injustice (WSJ)

By Li Jinsong, Zhang Lihui, Li Fangping, Teng Biao And Xu Zhiyong

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

BEIJING -- Chen Guangcheng, a blind advocate for the rights of Chinese villagers, recently made headlines around the world when he was sentenced to four years and three months in prison. But, as his chosen lawyers, we were prevented from presenting a fair defense by obstacles erected by Chinese authorities. A local court imposed unacceptable terms on us defending our client at his Aug. 18 trial. Before the trial, we had been detained by police, intimidated, and one lawyer was not freed until the trial was over. Except for Mr. Chen's three brothers, no other members of the public -- not even his wife and mother -- were allowed to attend the two-hour hearing.

That's why we are using these columns to outline the defense that was never presented in court, and explain how our client was convicted of crimes he did not commit. In those closed-door proceedings, Chinese officials punished Mr. Chen for exposing their own criminal activities -- forcing villagers to undergo sterilizations and forced abortions, even though these are officially illegal under Chinese law.

Had we not been barred from the courtroom, we would have argued that the trial was unlawful. The two government-appointed lawyers, whom Mr. Chen refused to accept, had never met him before the trial nor read any of the files on his case. They did not offer any defense during the hearing, but merely repeated everything the prosecutors said.

The pretrial process also violated Chinese law and infringed basic human-rights principles. A self-taught lawyer, Mr. Chen has long helped the disabled and peasants fight illegal taxes and environmental pollution. In June 2005, he filed a class-action lawsuit accusing local officials in Yinan County, in northeastern Shandong province, of forcing peasants to undergo abortions or sterilizations in order to meet birth-control quotas. Two months later, Yinan officials placed Mr. Chen under house arrest. Then in March this year he was taken away by police. When we were finally allowed to meet Mr. Chen in June, he told us that police had verbally abused him, threatened his life, and once deprived him of sleep for three days.

Ever since the first of us took on Mr. Chen's case in September last year, we have been pressured by local authorities to drop it. When we refused to do so, we were beaten and intercepted by government officials as we tried to carry out investigations and collect evidence.

Both of the charges on which Mr. Chen was convicted are groundless. The first, "intentional destruction of property," is based on a clash on Feb. 15 this year between villagers and police, who had beaten another villager protesting Mr. Chen's illegal house arrest. But it was local officials, rather than Mr. Chen, who were responsible for inciting this incident by carrying out that beating. People we interviewed said the villagers did no more than push police vehicles into a roadside ditch, and that they only acted in this way because police refused to take the victim's grandmother to hospital after she passed out upon hearing of the beating.

As for the second charge of "gathering crowds to obstruct traffic," once again it was the police, not Mr. Chen, who were responsible for this. On March 11, guards used by the local authorities to enforce the house arrest beat up another villager trying to meet Mr. Chen. Angry villagers then clashed with the guards and succeeded in getting Mr. Chen out of his house so that he could accompany them to the local government offices to protest. As they tried to get rides into town, police and guards surrounded them and temporarily stopped traffic until they could wrestle Mr. Chen and two other villagers into police cars and take them into custody.

The prosecutors introduced testimony from other detained villagers, accusing Mr. Chen of inciting property destruction. But lawyers representing these villagers were similarly never allowed to meet with them. Nor were they allowed to cross-examine these "witnesses." Family members of these villagers, who were detained for supporting Mr. Chen, said that they were mistreated in jail and forced to testify against Mr. Chen.

The real criminal suspects in this case are the officials responsible for obstructing justice and undermining the country's legal reform. These local officials could hardly have acted with such contempt and disregard for the law unless they had been given the green light by authorities higher up in the government. Nonetheless, in appealing Mr. Chen's case to a higher court, we will act on the assumption that the country's legal system can, without official interference, deliver a fair verdict and remedy wrongs. This may prove to be too optimistic. But we can only find out by fighting for justice, case by case, one client at a time.

Blair Gets Hostile Goodbye From Unions (AP)

By Beth Gardiner

AP, September 12, 2006

Tony Blair received a tense farewell Tuesday in his last address as prime minister to the annual gathering of Britain's labor unions, with more than a dozen activists walking out as he began speaking to protest his pro-business stance and aggressive foreign policy.

Many others booed and hissed as he mentioned controversial topics such as Iraq. Blair snapped back at some of the hecklers and joked with others, frequently referring to his fraught history with the unions, traditionally an important part of his governing Labour Party's base but now disgruntled by its centrism.

Blair, who gave in to a party revolt last week and announced he would resign within a year without setting a precise departure date, ended with a spirited defense of his accomplishments.

"For those of you who think you'll ever get a government where everything is fine, you won't," he said, after boasting of reduced unemployment, improved public services and greater aid to the poor and elderly. "But what does happen is progress if we have the courage and determination to remain in government."

He was heckled repeatedly during his 30-minute speech on economic globalization and grilled on employment issues during a combative question-and-answer session afterward.

"It was a very uncomfortable afternoon," said Val Hiscock, attending the conference as a representative of cleaning and catering companies. "I hoped he would go out with all guns blazing. ... What you felt most at the end was a sense of relief that he didn't have to do it again."

Blair acknowledged as much when he said last week that this year's speech to the Trades Union Congress would be his last to the group, "probably to the relief of both of us."

His relationship with unions has been tense throughout his nine years in office. They vehemently oppose his efforts to bring the private sector into public services such as health care and education, and many left-leaning members are also furious over the Iraq war.

About 20 demonstrators stood at the start of the speech holding placards that said "Go Now!" Others booed as Blair was introduced and more than a dozen walked out — followed by TV cameras — as he began.

The prime minister jokingly thanked the delegates "for that fine introduction — more or less."

Some of the roughly 1,000 who remained in the hall shouted and heckled when Blair mentioned Iraq, Afghanistan, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and his overhaul of Britain's public services, all issues on which he has angered many Labour Party stalwarts.

"You can hold up your posters about troops out, but the reason troops are in is because the democratic governments of Afghanistan and Iraq need our troops," he retorted. "You can disagree, but just listen to the argument."

Bob Crow, general secretary of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers and one of those who walked out of the speech, said Blair "has killed thousands of servicemen. ... As far as we are concerned we are not going to be party to something like that."

Blair's likely successor, Treasury chief Gordon Brown, praised the prime minister's speech and criticized the protesters. Seeking to demonstrate unity at the top of the Labour Party after last week's rebellion, which some accused him of fomenting, he made clear he supported the part-privatizations.

"I urge all trade unionists to support the reform agenda set out by Tony Blair," he said ahead of a private speech to union officials scheduled for later Tuesday.

Some union activists could flee to the third-largest party, the Liberal Democrats. They are unlikely to support the resurgent Tories, which despite their recent move to the revamp the party's policies, are still considered too pro-business for most left-leaning union members.

On Monday, Blair returned from Lebanon, where a protester briefly interrupted a briefing he was giving and accused him of complicity in the recent Israeli bombardment of the country.

Blair Gets Rough Ride In Farewell To TUC (FT)

By Christopher Adams And Andrew Taylor

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Tony Blair failed on Tuesday to win over his critics in the trade union movement, some of whom accused him of lacking a strategic vision and urged him to quit immediately.

As Gordon Brown was preparing to address union bosses in a private dinner in Brighton, Mr Blair was being jeered at times during his final Trades Union Congress.

Mr Brown was expected to stand with Mr Blair over health service reforms.

A walkout by the RMT transport union, and conference floor protests over the Iraq war and public services reforms peppered what Mr Blair had hoped would be a valedictory performance.

In a speech, the prime minister warned of the need to meet the challenges posed by globalisation, terrorism and migration. He defended Britain's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He also hinted at a tougher policy on labour market access for workers from Romania and Bulgaria, which are due to join the European Union next year.

Mr Brown was expected to reinforce Mr Blair's message on globalisation and stress his goal of making Britain's the world's most skilled and educated workforce.

The chancellor is expected on Wednesay to launch a scheme providing on-the-job training for low-skilled employees in return for employers granting them time off.

Amid barracking from sections of the audience, some of whom stood up and waved banners saying "Blair Out", "Go Now" and "Troops Out", Mr Blair came close to losing his cool.

He said angrily: "We should be proud of what we are doing to support democrats in Iraq and are proud of it." The "brutal truth" was that government was a "hard and difficult business" but that it was also better than being in opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0062549

Tony Woodley, general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union, said it had been a sad performance from a leader who lacked a strategic vision.

Dave Prentis, Unison leader, said Mr Blair's foreign policy and public sector reforms had tarnished his record.

Paul Kenny, GMB general secretary, said: "He was a great showman but left the TUC without any nominations for the Oscars."

However, other union bosses were supportive. The prime minister has angered some in the union movement over reforms that have made more use of private companies in public services and the National Health Service in particular. The unions believe the changes amount to "creeping privatisation" and say they will lead to job losses and hospital closures.

The chancellor was expected to back Mr Blair on the NHS. "I urge all to support Tony Blair in what he said about our reforms in health," he was due to say. The chancellor condemned those who walked out.

What Really Happened In Britain Last Week? (WSJ)

By Peter Stothard

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

LONDON -- American friends of Tony Blair -- those many millions of them -- may be surprised to learn that their best foreign ally is being poked and prodded from office like an unwanted dog. Margaret Thatcher's friends in Washington were no less shocked 16 years ago when she too was kicked unkindly from her Downing Street kennel. This is not necessarily cause for pity or alarm. It's just the way we do things here.

Who will succeed President Bush's eloquent and loyal Mr. Blair? The champion of the prodders and pokers and chief premier-in-waiting is the man who has been in charge of the British economy for the past 10 years, Gordon Brown. He also has many American admirers. They may not sit so thickly in the nation's living rooms but in business places he has long been the only bet. The dark-browed economic intellectual, the man who takes the Federalist Papers on his Cape Cod summers, has long been destined as next British prime minister. Whether in New Labour's popularity years as the New Jerusalem, or in its unpopularity years as a Bushville suburb, no other candidate needed to apply. The few who did feel the need felt a spiked collar around their presumptuous necks.

Even after a week in a London of where's-the-blood-bank brutality -- crude and public even by British transition standards -- the Brown succession is still the best wisdom on offer. A biting fight between the chancellor of the exchequer and his "Blairite" rivals, one which the top dog might perhaps even lose, is a fine prospect for those in politics and journalism who are bored with "on-message" discipline. Seven days of "blackmail," "autistic character" and "stupidity" charges against Mr. Brown have been a treat. "Mendacious," "legacy-obsessed" and "monomaniac" are words which many have long wanted to shout at Mr. Blair. The outcome of the coming contest is only, however, a very little less certain than it was before. For reasons of party rules and loyalties purchased and paid for long ago, Mr. Brown is still the firmest favorite. The dogs of Westminster scrap because they enjoy scrapping and too rarely get the chance, not just because they might genuinely change the neighborhood.

When will George Bush be dealing with his second British prime minister? The answer is within 12 months at the most, well before the end of the full third term that Labour promised the voters last year. Yesterday, Mr. Blair gave his last leader's speech to Britain's annual Trades Union Congress. That "last TUC" commitment was the one that the prime minister gave outside a London school last week, against his will, through gritted teeth and with the chancellor's scrappers waiting behind the trashcans in case he bottled out. But he gave it. And the deadline might yet be sooner, 12 weeks or even, as it seemed to the feverish last week, 12 days -- before the president's trusted friend falls victim to time and Iraq?

President Bush could be forgiven for wanting those fullest 12 months from Prime Minister Blair. Such loyalty will not come again. The White House has had much to be thankful for in the unprecedented TB-GB power-sharing deal, agreed back in 1994 when Mr. Brown, to his eternal regret, was persuaded not to stand for the leadership against his junior but more electorally attractive colleague. Because the chancellor then demanded and won such total ascendancy over the British domestic agenda, Tony Blair was lured (forced, even) ever more to the challenges of foreign affairs. Mr. Blair, a natural idealist, as rhetorical and risk-taking as the chancellor is pragmatic, laconic and cautious, was allowed an unusual freedom to follow those fundamental instincts, which he shared with the president, towards terrorism and Iraq.

Gordon Brown's speeches, had he held the top job in 2003 as he once thought he had been promised, would never have expressed the Bush doctrine with the passion that Mr. Blair deployed. Nor would Mr. Blair have dared so much without Gordon Brown. A future Prime Minister Brown would be no less supportive of basic American values than Mr. Blair. But he would run the government in a more traditional way, more trammeled by the political and administrative machine around him. He has his own passions: economic stability, the practical lessons of history and finding the means to relieve poverty in Britain and in Africa. He is as confident as Mr. Blair about what the levers of power can achieve but less trusting in the force of ideas.

Labour's leadership election will be an opportunity for every form of anti-American abuse. Yesterday, the new Conservative leader, David Cameron, called the administration "unrealistic and simplistic" and attacked the "slavish" bond between Messrs. Bush and Blair. The Labour leadership electorate will never be outdone by the Tories in a college formed of parliamentarians, trade unionists and local members, where hostility to Mr. Bush, the Iraq war and the Israeli action in Lebanon are the most powerful forces. The extreme left will mount a challenge. So will Mr. Blair's other would-be heirs, those who have always disliked the chancellor's character, those who have felt excluded by the clannishness of a Scot, those who think the English electorate may agree with them, those who distrust Mr. Brown's more redistributive Old Labour economic instincts and others who just want a scrap.

There is no chance now of the "orderly transition" that was the official hope for so long. If Mr. Blair is bundled out fast, his allies, who had been planning a nationwide Farewell-to-Tony triumph, will be as bitter against Mr. Brown as Margaret Thatcher and her friends once were against Prime Minister John Major. If there is a long goodbye, the Blairites might be happier. But many long suppressed Labour poisons will still come to the surface during the campaign.

Those who like to see rationalism in politics -- and that includes most of the thinkers who support Labour -- are amazed that this has been allowed to happen. Fights on policy between prime ministers and chancellors are nothing new: one such brought down Lady Thatcher. But this fight seemed to be about a mere few months on the Downing Street calendar, spurred suddenly by an ill-judged refusal by Tony Blair in a newspaper interview to set any fixed point for his departure. That failure to sense the mood on his street (a common failing of a top dog isolated too long) turned quickly into meetings at which Gordon Brown demanded ("blackmailed" as Mr. Blair's representative was authorized to put it) that the prime minister set a date by which he would be gone. Resignation letters from Mr. Brown's junior allies, with the threat of more to follow, forced Mr. Blair to the 12 months promise. Mr. Brown also wanted Mr. Blair to back his candidacy and to call off his own attack hounds, both demands which Mr. Blair has so far withstood.

Was this all as irrational as it looked? What really happened in Britain last week? Did Mr. Brown lose control of his allies? Did he get suddenly more frightened of Mr. Cameron, who is reciting directly and successfully from the New Labour playbook of the 1990s? The answer is simpler. This change at the top could never be smooth. There was always going to be a big fight in this back alley. The TB-GB traumas are too old and deep. It may surprise Mr. Blair's American admirers to know that their man is not seen as honest and true to his neighbors as he is to his faraway friends. Mr. Brown's admirers have also got a good deal more to learn.

Mr. Stothard is editor of the Times Literary Supplement.

Britain Without Blair (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Tony Blair remains the Prime Minister of Britain. But last week's Labour Party rebellion that forced him to promise, against his will, to leave by next summer has turned the party's most successful postwar leader into a very lame duck. A remarkable era in European politics and British-U.S. relations is coming to a close.

Mr. Blair's old-style socialist party was supposed to have been remade during his near decade in power. Like the Tories under Margaret Thatcher in the 1980s, Labour put up with a self-declared outsider and his reform agenda so long as the leader delivered at the ballot box. Three times in a row, Mr. Blair did. But Old Labour remained ill at ease with Mr. Blair, and especially with his assertive foreign policy and alliance with Washington. With his poll numbers down, Mr. Blair's party has turned on him.

The presumptive heir, Gordon Brown, is Mr. Blair's partner in the "New Labour" project, suggesting some continuity until next elections are due by 2010. For the past nine years, the sourish Scot has capably steered the economy while waiting his turn with evident impatience. He is a hard man to read. At home, he tends to see a larger role for the state and sounds less messianic about overhauling the public health and pension systems. Yet he's also staunchly pro-business and admiring of America.

A bigger break with Blairism may be felt abroad. Though he has never outlined his views on Iraq or terrorism, Mr. Brown will not bring the same passion and moral suasion as Mr. Blair did to his foreign policy. The Prime Minister sent British troops to end civil wars in Sierra Leone and Kosovo and tried to hold Saddam Hussein to his U.N. commitments. And that was all when Bill Clinton lived in the White House.

Since September 11, Mr. Blair has recognized and eloquently explained that Islamic terrorism posed the gravest threat to free society today. He joined forces with a U.S. leader who shared his view of the threat, and stuck by his decisions despite the opinion polls. The easy, "poodlish" thing would have been to distance himself from Washington, but he has held to his admirable convictions.

The mood in the opposition Tory camp also tends toward disengagement from the war on terror and the transatlantic alliance. Exhibit A came this Monday when the recently elected, young leader of the Conservative Party used the fifth anniversary of 9/11 to make his first major address on foreign policy.

We won't soon forget David Cameron's debutante performance. The 39-year-old Tory leader claimed Britain and the U.S. had become "uncritical allies" and needed "a rebalanced special relationship." In a line that must play well with London focus groups, he said: "We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America." Though his party backed the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, Mr. Cameron vouchsafed that they now show that democracy "cannot quickly [be] imposed from the outside." Thanks for the Monday-morning generalship.

On the day marking the worst terrorist atrocity in history, he even chided the U.S. for "stoop[ing] to illiberalism" by running a prison in Guantanamo, where the men who planned 9/11 were just transferred and where no human rights abuses have been found. This Tory wants a "a new emphasis on multilateralism" where the U.N. "confers the ultimate legitimacy." If these are the new Tories, we'll take the French. (As it happens, French presidential candidate Nicolas Sarkozy marked 9/11 in New York by saying, "Yes, I love the Americans.")

Under Mr. Cameron, a former PR executive, the Tories are back in the game and atop polls in Britain. Yet he is offering distinctly un-Tory ideas such as environmentalism. The suspicion in many quarters is that he lacks any conviction beyond electoral success -- an impression brought home by the contrast with Lady Thatcher who, ailing and 80 years old, made a rare public appearance in Washington for Monday's commemorations.

In a statement, she urged Britain and the U.S. to stand firm against "Islamist fanatics who hate our beliefs, our liberties and our citizens. We must not falter. We must not fail. . . . We also need to renew our resolve that, however bitter or lengthy the struggle, this evil shall not prevail."

Though she spoke earlier in the day than Mr. Cameron, Lady Thatcher's remarks were interpreted as a rebuke to the new Tories. So much the better if they were. It is equally remarkable that her comments echoed so well Mr. Blair's views. For in reality, this Prime Minister is her worthy heir. His Labour party could never forgive him for that. History will be kinder.

Gates, Rockefeller Charities Join To Fight African Hunger (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the world's richest charity, joined with the Rockefeller Foundation yesterday to launch a new development initiative for sub-Saharan Africa that they said would revolutionize food production and reduce hunger and poverty for tens of millions of people.

Modeled on the Rockefeller-pioneered "green revolution" that transformed farming methods and staved off widespread famine in much of the developing world nearly a half-century ago, the initiative coincides with a new round of Western concern about the long-intractable problems of the poorest continent.

Home to 16 of the 18 most undernourished countries, Africa is the only part of the world where food production has decreased in recent years. At the same time, political upheaval and conflict there are seen as providing fertile ground for extremists. Widespread famine in Africa has spurred high-profile relief efforts over the years, from United Nations programs to celebrity fundraising concerts such as Live Aid in the 1980s and Live 8 last year.

Sponsors of the new "Alliance for a Green Revolution" said yesterday they are looking for a more systematic, long-term solution to African hunger.

The alliance is the first Gates venture into poverty and development after years of focusing largely on global health and education. The effort follows a doubling of the foundation's $30 billion endowment, drawn largely from Bill Gates's Microsoft Corp. fortune, with investment guru Warren Buffett donating an additional $31 billion earlier this year. Gates has said he will step down from direct management of Microsoft in 2008 to work full time on foundation activities.

"We've been looking into the causes of extreme poverty and how we might make a contribution to reducing that," Gates said during a conference call with journalists yesterday. "If we can work on health and poverty issues concurrently, there is a lot that can be done to improve the quality of life. . . . Today no country of any size has been able to sustain a transition out of poverty without substantially raising productivity in the agricultural sector. It can have a transformative impact."

Melinda Gates, who serves on the board of The Washington Post Co. along with Buffett, said she and her husband studied development problems over the past three years before deciding to move beyond their health initiatives.

The Africa program will begin with a relatively small Gates contribution of $100 million over five years, plus $50 million from Rockefeller, to fund development of more robust disease- and drought-resistant seeds for primary African foodstuffs, enhanced distribution networks for seed and fertilizer, and university-level training for African crop scientists.

The new partners are still exploring how to make sure their initial steps do not overwhelm the continent's capacity to absorb assistance, Rockefeller President Judith Rodin said. Although future investments are likely to "scale up significantly," she said, "all of us intend to be mindful of really measuring outcomes and learning as we go and then providing the necessary resources."

Nancy Birdsall, president of the Washington-based Center for Global Development, said the mere fact that the world's biggest philanthropist is joining with the preeminent foundation working in agricultural development is "going to make a difference," adding: "It's a real shot in the arm."

Bill Gates agreed that the initial investment pales when compared with his contributions to the development of an AIDS vaccine. But he said that he expects the program to continue for decades.

"The first green revolution took a long time," said Gates program manager Roy Steiner. "It started in the 1940s with investment and made an impact in the 1960s. That takes committed partners that are going to be there for the long term and are willing to focus on what's going to help small-scale farmers" who produce most of Africa's food.

Program planners readily acknowledged that Africa's problems today far outstrip even those confronting Asia in the 1960s, including a lack of roads and irrigation, primary food crops that vary widely from region to region, degraded soil, unstable governments and tenuous security. The Rockefeller Foundation, which started shifting the bulk of its development funding from Asia and Latin America to Africa several years ago, recently shut down its program in Zimbabwe because of political strife there.

Although the Gates/Rockefeller program will be available throughout Africa, Rodin said, the partners are still studying which 10 to 20 countries to select for initial funding.

Following the pattern of its health initiatives, Gates will provide money and results-based expertise, building on existing seed development programs begun by Rockefeller and African agencies, such as a new strain of rice produced in West Africa that promises to increase yields fivefold. A concurrent goal is the expansion of seed and fertilizer distribution networks through small entrepreneurs in rural areas. Both partners hope to prime the pump for participation by both African and donor governments.

The Bush administration has increased U.S. aid to Africa significantly over the past five years, though much of it consists of food shipments and military assistance. This year's G-8 conference of the world's wealthiest nations brought agreement to cancel much of Africa's debt, but pledges to double development aid were acknowledged to be largely symbolic.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney, Bolten Lobby Lawmakers On Anti-Terrorism Measures. The AP (9/12, Flaherty) reports, "President Bush dispatched the vice president and top aides to the Capitol on Tuesday to try to break an election-season deadlock with Republicans over the surveillance and prosecution of terrorism suspects." But "officials met stiff resistance from senators and House leaders who say they refuse to give the White House a blank check over the war on terror. The standoff raised questions about whether the president could unite Republicans on his anti-terror agenda before November's midterm elections."

The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Babinngton, 748K) says Cheney "urged Republican senators yesterday not to be too restrictive in setting legal limits on CIA interrogations of enemy combatants, the largest remaining barrier to an agreement between Congress and the White House on legislation that would also set new rules for special military trials for terrorist suspects." Cheney and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten "met for an hour with GOP senators in hopes of narrowing their differences over proposed legislation governing the treatment, questioning and prosecution of suspected terrorists and enemy combatants, such as those held at the US military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba."

Deal May Be Near On Detainee Trials. The New York Times (9/13, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "The leading Senate Republicans negotiating over proposed legislation to bring terror suspects to trial said Tuesday that they were close to a compromise on a main dispute with the White House: whether suspects had the right to see all the evidence used against them." But "the Senate Republicans warned that they would not go along with a White House proposal to redefine the provision of the Geneva Conventions that broadly guarantees humane treatment of detainees."

The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Babinngton, 748K) reports "key senators said they had made progress on several fronts, including the use of secret information against defendants and guidelines for handling allegedly coerced statements. The biggest sticking point, they said, was how narrowly to define practices that might subject CIA interrogators or others to charges of committing war crimes. That 'is still the area we are farthest apart on,' Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters." Sen. Lindsey O. Graham "said he and others are pressing the administration to accept a list of practices that would be considered illegal, bringing greater specificity to current language that bars 'grave breaches' of the Geneva Conventions, the treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war." White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said, "We're having an ongoing conversation with the Congress on all of the issues, and we're committed to reaching a resolution so that they can take the next legislative step."

Levin Continues To Block Wainstein Nomination Over FBI Guantanamo Documents. The Washington Post (9/13, B2, Cauvin, 748K) reports, "Six months after President Bush chose him to lead a new anti-terrorism arm of the Justice Department, Kenneth L. Wainstein is still U.S. attorney for the District -- his nomination stalled by squabbling in the Senate." Sen. Carl Levin "has blocked a vote because the Justice Department has not turned over to him several FBI documents that are connected to the abuse of detainees" at Guantanamo, "papers that would have passed through Wainstein's office when he was at the FBI. The delay creates uncertainty not only at the Justice Department but also at the U.S. attorney's office, which Wainstein has led since May 2004. The office, which handles federal and local cases, is the largest U.S. attorney's office in the nation." The Post notes, "Wainstein was a top aide to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III from 2002 to 2004, serving first as general counsel and then as the agency's chief of staff. In each job, he played a key role in the bureau's restructuring to focus more heavily on terrorism cases," but DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse "said the documents that Levin is seeking have nothing to do with Wainstein's qualifications for the assistant attorney general job."

US Officials Could Be Vulnerable To Prosecution Over Detainees. Time (9/13, Calabresi) reports, "On paper, at least, White House officials and CIA officers could be vulnerable to prosecution for past or future use of illegal methods of interrogation — unless Congress changes the law." Time continues, "The threat of prosecution comes not from some left-wing activists or even the House Democrats, but from the highest court in the country. In his concurring opinion in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case last summer, Justice Anthony Kennedy said that the administration had to live within the Geneva Conventions. 'Violations [of the Geneva Conventions] are considered "war crimes," punishable as federal offenses, when committed by or against United States nationals and military personnel,' he wrote. And for emphasis, Kennedy pointed to paragraph 2441 of the U.S. code, which lays out the penalties for those violations, including life imprisonment and the death penalty." Time adds, "It's hard to see how the methods the administration authorized for use against some of their detainees could not have violated the Geneva conventions. Common article 3 of the conventions prevents any 'outrages on the personal dignity' of detainees. Among the highlights of the administration's approved techniques — waterboarding, wherein a prisoner is made to believe he is drowning; intimidation using dogs; stripping of prisoners; and so on. … When the key swing vote on the Supreme Court goes out of his way to say you are breaking the law, and enumerates the penalties you face, you pay attention. … But just how much danger is the White House really in? It is rare for political leaders to be prosecuted for genuine attempts to protect the public, and few question the motives behind the extreme interrogation methods, even if they strongly disagree with them. More to the point, Graham, Warner and McCain have larded their bill with protections from prosecution for anything but 'grave breaches' of the conventions, which they believe should be adequate to protect the White House and CIA."

LATimes Says Bush Should Spell Out "Alternative Methods" For Interrogating Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, 918K) editorializes, "'The United States does not torture,' President Bush said last week. It can, however, make use of what he euphemistically called 'an alternative set of procedures' for eliciting information from prisoners suspected of being terrorists. The difference between torture and these 'alternative procedures' seems to be who's conducting the interrogation and where it takes place." The Times adds that as Congress writes legislation governing the treatment of detainees, it should "force the President to spell out what he means by alternative methods. And Congress should allow detainees who claim those methods violate their rights under the Geneva Convention to have their day in court."

House Leaders "Temper" Bill's Restrictions On Wiretapping Program. The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Weisman, 748K) reports, "House leaders moved yesterday to temper many of the controls that a bill headed toward rapid passage would have imposed on the Bush administration's program for wiretapping terrorism suspects without court approval." The bill, set for Judiciary Committee consideration today, "would have forced the administration to seek a warrant for surveillance within 60 days and bolstered consultations with Congress on the program." But "last-minute changes pushed by senior Republicans may allow warrantless surveillance to largely continue without those controls. Instead, House Republican leaders brought their bill in line with legislation agreed to by the White House and the Senate, which would allow but not require the administration to submit the program to a secret court for a constitutional review." The Post adds, "Republican leaders, in the midst of an increasingly angry attack on Democrats over defense matters, made it clear that they will not challenge President Bush's authority in matters of national security as they challenge their opponents' commitment to fighting terrorism." The move "put House GOP leaders at odds with some Republican moderates and civil libertarians in the House and the Senate."

Democrats Say NSA Played Politics In Support Of Program. The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Pincus, 748K) reports, "Democrats on the Senate intelligence committee are complaining that the National Security Agency has played politics in support of the secret program to intercept phone calls between alleged terrorists in the United States and abroad." On July 27, "shortly after most members of the committee were briefed on the controversial surveillance program, the NSA supplied the panel's chairman, Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), with 'a set of administration approved, unclassified talking points for the members to use,' as described in the document." The Post adds, "Among the talking points were 'subjective statements that appear intended to advance a particular policy view and present certain facts in the best possible light,' Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said in a letter to the NSA director. Rockefeller "and six Democrats on the panel wrote Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the NSA's director, on Aug. 29 that they believed those statements 'appear intended to advocate particular policies rather than provide guidance on classification.'"

Jury Seated For Albany Terrorism Trial. The AP (9/13, Virtanen) reports, "The trial of two Muslims charged with supporting terrorism is to open Wednesday after potential jurors faced questions on their feelings about Islam, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the war in Iraq and whether they could deal fairly with the defendants. A jury of six women and six men was chosen Tuesday to hear the case against the men arrested two years ago in an FBI sting. Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member, are accused of laundering money for an emigre businessman claiming to be a part-time arms dealer. They have pleaded not guilty, their attorneys arguing that full and accurate translations of the undercover tapes will show the men don't support terrorism."

The Albany Times-Union (9/13, Lyons) notes, "More than a dozen FBI agents are expected to testify during the trial, which is the culmination of the most intensive counterterrorism sting in the history of the Albany field office," and "much of the defense's case is expected to center on government translations of dozens of tape-recorded conversations that took place between Hossain, Aref and an FBI informant. The informant, a Pakistani immigrant, agreed to take part in the sting to help settle his own, unrelated criminal charges of unlawful supplying driver's licenses to other immigrants." The Times-Union adds that "part of the FBI's strongest evidence…is an undercover surveillance videotape that shows the informant holding a surface-to-air missile launcher as the men chatted inside the informant's Central Avenue storefront. During the meeting, the informant told Hossain that they would earn money through the sale of the weapons."

Hamas-Funding Probe Was Riddled With Difficulties. McClatchy (9/13) distributes the Chicago Tribune (9/3, Grossman, 623K) story which reported at length on the travails of the investigation of Muhammed Salah, soon to face charges of providing material support to Hamas. The Tribune story was included in the Sept. 5 FBI news briefings. "Given the White House's highly publicized strategy of maintaining a courtroom front in the war on terrorism, the government has bet a lot of chips on its prosecution of Salah and his alleged co-conspirators. Yet there was a point in 2000 when the case appeared to have been dropped. ... The current reversal of that decision epitomizes the Salah case, which besides raising civil libertarians' hackles, is also a saga with more twists and turns than a John le Carre spy novel. It includes enough bureaucratic infighting to send shivers up the spines of citizens who'd like to think of their government as a shield against a repeat of the World Trade Center tragedy." The Tribune noted that at one point, "Relations between FBI agents in Chicago and those assigned to Milwaukee became so hostile, an office had to be rented in Kenosha for a neutral meeting ground," according to former lead investigator Mark Flessner. "An Arabic-speaking FBI agent, Gamal Abdel-Hafiz, refused to wear a wire while tracking a suspect in the probe. 'He said a Muslim doesn't, or couldn't, record another Muslim without him knowing it,' Flessner says. 'It is not an option for an agent to decide how an investigation should be conducted, because of religious or philosophical reasons.'"

Administration Cites Progress Toward Shutting Down Terrorist Fundraising. Bush Administration officials told Congress yesterday that the US has made progress over the last five years in its efforts to shut down avenues for terrorist to raise and move money, but challenges remain. The AP (9/12, Aversa) reported that in testimony before the Senate Banking Committee, Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser "underscored the importance of the United States working closely with international allies to share information. The goal, he said, is to thwart terrorist financiers and improve coordination of this information among agencies. Glaser said authorities must stay ahead of terrorist financiers who not only try to use the traditional banking system to move money but also other methods, including cash couriers, trafficking of drugs, weapons and precious metals and jewels."

Arrests Spark Fears Terrorists Are Training In Rural England. The Washington Post (9/13, A14, Sullivan, Jordan, 748K) reports, "Yassin Mutegombwa, 22, a London resident whose family is from Uganda, was charged in court Tuesday with receiving training for terrorism on British soil, the first person to be charged under a law enacted this year. According to a statement from Scotland Yard, he received weapons training in two rural English locations, including 'at a woodland area'" in southwestern England in late April and early June. The Post adds, "The charges against Mutegombwa illustrate increasing worry in Britain that violent extremists are not only being recruited from the country's large Muslim population but also are being trained here. Officials say some of the training may have taken place at popular paintball fields."

The New York Times (9/12, Adam, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "Residents and employees at two recreation sites that have been cited in court documents as possible terrorist training camps expressed puzzlement on Tuesday, though one person said his resort had attracted police attention before. … The four men who appeared at a magistrates' court in central London on Tuesday were among 14 arrested in the Sept. 1 police raids. The raids were part of a police hunt for terrorist recruiters and trainers and not related to the Aug. 10 security alert surrounding what police called a conspiracy by Islamic radicals to bomb trans-Atlantic airliners."

UK Official Seeks To Put Human Face On Health And Safety Commission. The New York Times (9/13, Lyall, 1.21M) reports, "One of the received wisdoms about British life is that it is full of picayune rules that are meant to prevent injuries and accidents but are in fact patently ridiculous. … So it came as a surprise when Bill Callaghan, who as head of the country's Health and Safety Commission is supposedly responsible for such decisions, appeared on television last month to urge Britons to 'get a life.' … But to Britons who have accepted the notion that no one is allowed to do anything fun anymore, and that it is the government's fault, Mr. Callaghan's message was met with some skepticism." Callaghan's "irritation spurred him to action and to his new campaign to put a reasonable human face on the Health and Safety Commission, whose job is to recommend and oversee Britain's safety regulations."

Muslim Leader Says Coreligionists Can Help Win War On Terror. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 9, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight you'll hear from an Islamic American. There are as many as seven million in this country. About how he believes they can help win the war. Ahmed Younnis is national director of the Muslim Public Affairs Council." Ahmed Younnis: "I was recently in the desert of central Asia on a trek through old Soviet territory when an 80-year-old imam asked me whether Muslims in America are feeling the backlash of 9/11. I realized at that moment…that the story of the American Muslim is a core element of our winning hearts and mind in the international war on terror. Muslims around the world look at how we American Muslims are doing and make judgments about our country. Their biggest question? Can Muslims thrive in a Western society? Can Muslims thrive in the United States of America? The answer is yes. And we can help win the international war on terror if you include us in the fight."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats, White House Feud Over Charge That Bush Speech Politicized 9/11. President Bush's 9/11 speech has resulted in bitter recriminations from Democrats, who charged the President politicized the somber occasion to help GOP candidates. The AP (9/12, Pickler) reports the White House "quarreled with Democrats Tuesday over whether President Bush was trying to win political points by using a Sept. 11 anniversary speech to defend the war in Iraq and his war on terror." Said Tony Snow, "This was not a speech that was designed to single out anybody for partisan reasons, but gave the president's honest reflections and reactions to what has happened since September 11, 2001. … The president decided that yesterday wasn't a day for partisanship." Democrats, "in a campaign to win control of Congress from the president's Republican Party, charged that Bush was using a national day of mourning for partisan gain."

A number of media reports suggest the White House and Republicans on Capitol Hill welcome the controversy, and portray them as intent on using the terror issue to gain the momentum going into the November midterm elections. The New York Times (9/13, Rutenberg, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "Elapsed time between the conclusion of President Bush's speech Monday night on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the first Democratic charge that he had politicized the tragedy: 20 minutes. White House reaction: an appearance of glee. Next steps: to be determined by conditions on the ground." The Times adds, "With the White House having wrapped up the first phase of its all-out effort to gain control of this fall's political narrative by casting the Iraq war as part of an epochal struggle against tyranny, both parties are confronting questions about their tactics as they head into the homestretch of the campaign. Did the Democrats play into Mr. Bush's hands when Senator Edward M. Kennedy said Monday night that the president should have been ashamed of his speech, giving the White House a chance to intensify the national security debate against just the kind of liberal opponent it relishes? Did Mr. Bush overplay his hand by turning what had been billed as a nonpartisan commemoration of the attacks into what his opponents called a political defense of the war?" At the White House, Tony Snow "could hardly disguise his eagerness to go before the cameras to engage the Democrats on turf that Republicans have come to consider their own. He invited reporters who posed questions to him in the morning about Democratic complaints about the speech to ask again at his regular televised briefing, where he said Democrats were politicizing the anniversary and reasserted the White House line that a withdrawal from Iraq would turn it into a terrorist base."

Similarly, Roll Call (9/13, Davis, Billings) says, "With cautious hopes that the political winds may be turning in their favor, Republicans in both chambers are accelerating their election-year offensive this week with fundraising pitches" and "heightened rhetorical attacks on Democrats." A "senior GOP Senate aide" is quoted saying, "Hopefully we're back on the offensive on the issues that have worked for us and that Democrats are traditionally weak on. … We're going to focus on a couple key issues to get traction on and try to ratchet up the momentum.'"

ABC World News (9/12, story 2, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "There's been heated debate in Washington today about 9/11 and the politics of the Iraq war. This all began with the President's speech to the nation last night, marking the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. The White House said the speech would not be political. But then the President, in his remarks, said this." President Bush: "Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pull out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." Democrats "immediately denounced the speech, charging that the President was using a solemn day to rally support for his Iraq policies. Republicans said the President could not avoid talking about Iraq. Well, the argument all spilled out on the floor of Congress today." Sen. Harry Reid: "This was a political move, designed to tap the overwhelming public sentiment to destroy al Qaeda as a way to bolster sagging public opinion support for the war in Iraq. Despite the President's best efforts, the American people can see through this ploy." Analyst George Stephanopoulos said, "Our poll shows that voters who believe that Iraq is part of the war on terror, break in a big way, for the Republicans, 61%, 31%. The voters who think Iraq is not part of the war on terror, tend to vote for the Democrats by a bigger margin, 75% to 16%. This is the core debate of the midterms. The stakes couldn't be higher."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 2, 3:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The White House previewed last night's address as the President's reflection on the nation's pain five years after 9/11. Quickly, however, it became prime time political argument." Bush: "I'm often asked why we're in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks. The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat." Gregory: "And included this warning for voters." Democrats "condemned the White House for what they saw as a speech exploiting 9/11 rather than uniting the country as the President did from Ground Zero five years ago." Democratic leaders "later released a letter to the television networks demanding equal time to respond to the President's address. Republicans responded to the complaints with an attack, suggesting Democrats are weak on terrorists." GOP Sen. Rick Santorum was shown saying, "If you listen to the Democratic leader, our lesson is, let's continue to ignore them. Let's continue to play politics. Let's put domestic politics ahead of the security of this country." NBC added, "The House Republican leader went even farther, John Boehner said of Democrats, 'I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than they are in protecting the American people.' The White House spokesman later conceded that comment was over the line. Do you think Democrats are more interested in protecting terrorists than the American people?" Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "No." The Hill (9/13, O'Connor) and Roll Call (9/13, Davis, Billings) run stories on Boehner's comments, with Roll Calling adding Republicans are "heightening their offensive on Democrats, with GOP leadership aides coordinating message points and media releases with their rank-and-file members in order to define Pelosi specifically and Democrats in general on national security."

The Washington Times (9/13, Dinan, Hurt, 88K) says "on Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush's speech stiffened the spines of Republicans who have grown weary of defending an unpopular war heading into a tight election season. Yesterday, they were back to skewering Democrats as harshly as ever."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Malveaux) reported, "Of course the question whether or not there was a political component to the speech -- of course there was. We're less than two months away from midterm elections, congressional elections. Everything is arguably political right now." Bush, "in his primetime address, went to the heart of the political debate, a debate that has divided this country and essentially set the stage for the battle over Congress. And that is the justification of the Iraq war. Now, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow today was asked on several briefings about this and he said the President went out of his way not to be partisan. He made a distinction between partisan and political, parsing the speech at times, saying it would be remiss if the President did not talk about the Iraq war. And he categorically rejected this notion that the president was using the occasion of 9/11 to score political points."

Fox News' Special Report (9/12, Garrett) reported, "White House Press Secretary Tony Snow says the President wasn't attacking Democrats who want to leave Iraq, he was merely saying it would turn to a terrorist haven as Afghanistan was before 9/11."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Wallsten, 918K) says "the dispute comes eight weeks before voters are to decide which party will control Congress for Bush's final two years in office, and underscores how each side is vying to make the issue of national security work to its advantage. … The rhetoric escalated after Bush's speech Monday night. " House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "accused Republicans of employing 'cynical tactics,'" and Democrats "pressed their case that the White House had misrepresented the tenor of Bush's speech, causing the broadcast networks to give him a prime-time slot without setting time aside for an opposition response or interviews with Democrats."

In appearances on the cable news programs, Democratic senators criticized the President's speech and what they perceive as a deliberate GOP strategy. Sen. Dick Durbin said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/12), "For the last two weeks, starting with Secretary Rumsfeld in Salt Lake City and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Vice President Cheney last Sunday and the President on many occasions, it is very clear that the Republicans view their vulnerability in the November election to be their policy in Iraq. So they've been very forthright in saying, this is a policy to fight terrorism, and they are fighting that political battle. I was disappointed yesterday. This should have been a day, the fifth anniversary of 9/11 where we set the politics over on the side and really appealed to the American people to remember where we were as a nation five years ago. We were unified. We were nonpartisan. We were determined to fight terrorism. I thought the references, a few of the references the President made were unfortunate when he brought up the issue of Iraq."

Sen. Carl Levin was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/12) if the Senate intelligence report puts to rest the allegation that Saddam Hussein had a relationship with and was cooperating with al Qaeda. Levin said, "It should put it to rest. It's a very strong, thorough, bipartisan report. It analyzes the allegations which were made both before the war, during the war, by the Administration, based on an alleged meeting that -- a report of a meeting that was supposed to have taken place in Prague between the secret service of Iraq and Atta, who is the lead hijacker. The report said that the meeting did not occur. And, yet, you have the Vice President of the United States, just last weekend, saying that we don't know. Well, this report says we do know, and it did not occur."

Bush Says Not Mentioning Iraq Would Have Also Sparked Criticism. The New York Times (9/13, Rutenberg, Hulse, 1.21M) reports that yesterday, "after he met with a group of conservative columnists, National Review Online quoted Mr. Bush as saying that he would have faced loud criticism had he not mentioned Iraq on Monday night, and that his goal was to highlight the stakes in this campaign." However, "even some Republicans had doubts about how much the new national security campaign would help in a climate both sides see as tough. 'I don't think the inside-the-beltway discussion about political tit-for-tat makes any difference in the majority of races around the country,' said Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire."

Bush To Meet With House GOP Leaders Thursday. CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush heads to Capitol Hill on Thursday morning to meet with House Republicans in the lead-up to the fall elections. He is expected to talk about his recent calls for Congress to approve military tribunals for terror suspects and to give him the authority to continue his domestic surveillance program -- both measures facing strong criticisms in Congress, including from some Republicans."

GOP Won't Negotiate With Democrats On 9/11 Resolution Language. The White House Bulletin / US News (9/12) reported, "House Republicans have rejected Democratic opposition to the wording of the annual 9/11 resolution and won't negotiate anymore. Instead they will put the GOP language on the floor" today. "There will be no more negotiations," a senior House Republican leadership aide told US News and the Bulletin. The Bulletin added, "GOP leadership offices have been arguing with Democratic leadership members over including in the resolution an expanded description of government programs Congress has approved to thwart future terrorist attacks. The language is similar to that used in past resolutions, though a bit longer considering the fact that other programs have been OK'd since the last resolution. A copy of the new resolution shown to the Bulletin had a line crossed through four paragraphs listing all programs, indicating Democratic opposition. Both sides are crying politics: The GOP says the Democrats are obsessed with proving that the Republican Congress did nothing to prevent future terrorism and Democrats say that the GOP is going too far by bragging. The result is that Hastert plans to put the GOP written language before the House and dare Democrats to vote against the resolution, something they are unlikely to do."

GOP Said To Be Relying On "Treason Season." In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/13, A2), Dana Milbank says "the majority leader's charge of treachery was no accident. Two months before Election Day, Republicans have revived the technique used with great success in 2002 and 2004: suggesting that the loyal opposition is, well, not so loyal." The "arrival of Treason Season, heralded by the charged address President Bush gave on Monday's 9/11 anniversary, is right on schedule." But the "aid-and-comfort line may not work as well this time, if only because polls show broad disenchantment with Bush and congressional leadership."

Meyerson Says GOP Using Scare Tactics. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (9/13, A17, 748K), "Wasn't it just a couple of years ago that Republicans were boasting that they were the party of ideas? They would privatize the commonwealth and globalize democracy, while Democrats clung to the tattered banner of common security in both economics and national defense. The intellectual energy in America, it seemed, was all on the right. That, as they say, was then. In 2006 the campaigns that the Republicans are waging in their desperate attempt to retain power are so utterly devoid of ideas that it's hard to believe they ever had an idea at all." Meyerson adds, "With fewer than 60 days remaining before the November election, the only two Republican strategies left standing are to scare the public about the Democrats collectively or to slime the Democrats individually. … The scare campaign is simply harder to wage this year than it was in 2002 and 2004, when Bush, Rove and company convinced just enough voters that the Democrats couldn't be trusted to take on the terrorists."

Frist Threatens To Scrap Port Security Bill If Democrats Force Their Provisions. The AP (9/13, Jordan) reports, "Ports security legislation that most senators agree would make the country safer was stuck Tuesday in election-year politics as Republicans threatened to scrap it if Democrats forced in a wide range of provisions. Facing an impasse, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist set a Thursday deadline to vote on the bill that was earlier considered a sure thing." GOP Sen. Ted Stevens said the Democratic plan "will kill the bill," adding, "We have a bipartisan bill to start with. ... All these amendments are just coming out of the sewer right now. There's just too many of them, and they're just nothing but attempts to block this bill." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid "said his plan would also bolster security on trains and buses and at chemical plants, strengthen US intelligence missions overseas and approve all of the 9/11 Commission's recommendations, half of which are still undone."

Chertoff Says Government Cannot Protect Every Possible Target From Terror Attack. The New York Times (9/13, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "Congress and the American public must accept that the government cannot protect every possible target against attack if it wants to avoid fulfilling Al Qaeda's goal of bankrupting the nation, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told a Senate committee Tuesday." Osama bin Laden, Chertoff said, "has made it clear that scaring the United States into an unsustainable spending spree is one of his aims. In a 2004 video, Mr. bin Laden, the Qaeda leader, spoke of 'bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy.'" Said Chertoff, "He understood that one tool he had in waging war against the United States was to drive us crazy, into bankruptcy, trying to defend ourselves against every conceivable threat." Chertoff spoke "at a hearing of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee," where he also said, "We have to be realistic about what we expect and what we do. We do have limits, and we do have choices to make."

Banned Items Said To Be Getting Past Airport Screeners. Under the headline "Newly Banned Items Often Fly Past Airport Screeners," the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Wilber, 748K) reports on its front page that "many people are inadvertently taking banned liquids and gels through security in their pockets and carry-on luggage, according to interviews with several dozen travelers at local airports and with pilots and security officials." Others "admit that they ignore the restrictions, slipping expensive cologne, perfume, lip gloss, lotion and other ointments into their carry-on bags or into their pockets in hopes of sneaking them past security. Some of the items get flagged by screeners, others do not." TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe says the agency has "no way of tracking people who succeed in disobeying the ban, but screeners have caught people trying to sneak items through checkpoints." However, "TSA officials point to a 20 percent increase in checked bags as an indication that most travelers seem to be complying with the rules."

Security Lines Returned To Normal Quickly. Meanwhile, a USA Today (9/13, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) analysis of TSA records has found "that five days after airline passengers were barred from carrying most liquids on airplanes, security lines were routine at almost all of the nation's 80 major airports. … The fast rebound 'gives the TSA wiggle time to test and deploy technology that will deal with liquid explosives,' said aviation-security consultant Douglas Laird. 'The public isn't going crazy.'" USA Today notes that the end of August and September are slow air-travel periods and Orlando International Airport screener Don Thomas "warned, 'If it was holiday time, it would be really bad.'"

Man Subdued After Attempting To Open Cabin Door On Flight To Dulles. The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Weil, 748K) reports a man on a flight from Los Angeles to Dulles "was jumped last night by fellow passengers who helped federal air marshals subdue him" after he allegedly tried to open a cabin door. "The man, who reportedly wore a camouflage jacket and spoke Portuguese, was questioned at Dulles last night by airport police, according to an airport spokeswoman. No motive was readily apparent, but a spokeswoman for the FBI emphasized that the incident was not terrorism-related." Passenger Stephen Lockwood told the Post that there was "a vigorous scuffle" and that the man "took quite a beating" before he was handcuffed by a federal air marshal. "Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration, said that she lacked details of the incident but that she understood two air marshals had subdued the man."

Stone Mulls Film Investigating 9/11 "Conspiracy." The Washington Times (9/13, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that filmmaker Oliver Stone "hinted in Moscow on Monday" that he is considering making a film "investigating the 'conspiracy' around September 11. 'There is a great story in a movie, a conspiracy by a group of people in the American administration who have an agenda and who used 9/11 to further that agenda,' he told reporters in Russia. There could be a 'fascinating project [on] what happened after September 11,' the director said at his packed press conference on the fifth anniversary of the attacks. Mr. Stone accused President Bush of mishandling the fight against Osama bin Laden's terrorists and using the crisis to stoke fear and bolster his own power at home in a way that was 'right out of George Orwell.'"

Attorneys See Homeland Security Practice Growing After 9/11 Attacks. The Legal Times (9/13, Crea) reports, "The attacks of Sept. 11 gave rise to a new world on K Street: the homeland security practice. Born out of the tragedy are scores of lawyers and lobbyists fine-tuning their young practices at some of the top firms in town, such as Van Scoyoc and McKenna Long & Aldridge. … 'It's truly an outgrowth of 9/11, and then again it isn't,' says Joe Whitley, a partner at Alston & Bird and the first general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security. 'So much of what is being packaged as homeland security is a lot of old wine -- old wine and some new wine in a new bottle.'" The Times continues, "The Department of Homeland Security was officially launched in March 2003, dumping 22 legacy agencies with different philosophies and temperaments, including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, United States Customs and Border Protection, the Coast Guard and the Secret Service, under one giant umbrella. The Cabinet-level agency is already on its second secretary, Michael Chertoff. … 'They each have unique cultures that have been utterly changed by being pushed together,' says Hunton & Williams partner Steven Solow, whose homeland security practice primarily involves the area of risk management and integration of security matters with regulatory issues. 'It's obviously a work in progress, which isn't always pretty, but it's what we have and what we have to learn to work through.'" The Times notes, "Many lobbyists say they are motivated to work in this field by a desire to protect and secure the nation. But money is not a bad motivator, either. … And the money is still increasing. … According to the Homeland Security Research Corp. (HSRC), the United States and the international community spent $44 billion on homeland security in 2005. The research firm estimates that by 2015, $174 billion will be dished out globally."

Nagin Pleads For Patience As New Orleans Recovers. As the first 100 days since his reelection passed yesterday, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin made a plea for patience and "perspective" amid continued

impatience over his city's slow recovery from Hurricane Katrina. The New York Times (9/13, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports, "The message Tuesday was mixed, the mayor's advisers recited what they pictured as a litany of progress, even as Mr. Nagin repeatedly reminded the reporters at a news conference in City Hall of the size of the remaining recovery effort, 'a task of epic proportions,' as he put it." Nagin "put forward a dual message Tuesday: while insisting that he is working hard, he also emphasized his trademark laissez-faire approach. It is not he but the 'citizens' who are in the driver's seat in the city's recovery, the mayor said."

USA Today (9/13, Konigsmark, 2.27M) reports that Nagin "said he'll have a comprehensive plan by the end of the year. But he said the city is taking 'the road less traveled' by allowing residents to decide where they want to live. … The Urban Land Institute, which Nagin hired to come up with ideas, recommended last fall that some hard-hit areas be closed to redevelopment. Less than half the population of New Orleans has returned since Katrina flooded 80% of the city for weeks. Shrinking the city's footprint would save money and encourage development on higher ground, the institute said."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Says World Cannot Afford To Exit Afghanistan. The AP (9/12, Gearan) reports Secretary of State Rice "acknowledged 'difficult going' fighting a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, but insisted Tuesday that the world cannot afford to pull out now." As she "thanked Canada for its role as a leader of NATO forces in the country," Rice said, "We owe it to the people of Afghanistan to help them finish the job." The AP adds that Canada's "combat role is unpopular at home, as is the U.S.-led war in Iraq." Opponents of the Afghanistan mission "suggested Rice's visit to Canada was an attempt to persuade Canada to commit more forces. But Rice and her host, Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, said she made no such request." During a news conference with MacKay, "Rice said the United States left too soon after supporting Afghanistan in the 1980s civil war. 'Afghanistan became a failed state' and a haven for terrorism, Rice said. 'We all came to pay for that.'"

AFP (9/13) reports Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher "told journalists in Brussels that it was "probably a little too early" to 'draw any conclusions about the efforts to get more troops.' He highlighted the dangerous situation in Afghanistan, where NATO and Afghan forces are making forays into areas held by Taliban fighters." His comments "came ahead of Wednesday's meeting at NATO's military headquarters in Belgium aimed at drumming up more troops for Afghanistan. The alliance's military chief, US General James Jones, has called for reinforcements of up to 2,500 troops to deal with increasing Taliban attacks."

NATO Countries Rule Out Boosting Contribution To Afghan Force. The Financial Times (9/13) reports, "Nato's plans to provide reinforcements for its hard-pressed troops in Afghanistan suffered a setback on Tuesday, as a series of countries ruled out providing further soldiers and controversy mounted over the alliance's tactics." Officials "conceded that a meeting on Wednesday, intended to obtain pledges for up to 2,500 extra soldiers, was extremely unlikely to meet its target."

Taliban Said To Be Adopting Tactics Of Iraqi Insurgency. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Peterson, 58K) reports, "Among the keys to the Taliban resurgence -- which is sparking lethal violence on a scale unknown here for almost five years -- are crucial lessons drawn from Iraq." Such "keys" include "include suicide attacks, assassinations of government officials, moderate clerics, and civilians, along with guerrilla tactics now in use against Western forces in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, where NATO claims to have killed more than 500 insurgents in 10 days of intense fighting."

Musharraf Says Taliban Insurgents Bigger Danger Than Al Qaeda. USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf "warned the West on Tuesday that Taliban insurgents are a more dangerous terrorist force than al-Qaeda because of their broad support in Afghanistan. 'The center of gravity of terrorism has shifted from al-Qaeda to the Taliban,' he told European Union lawmakers in Brussels. Pakistan is a counterterrorism ally of the EU and United States. Musharraf blamed the West for breeding terrorism in his country by bringing in thousands of mujahedin to fight the Soviet Union in neighboring Afghanistan in the 1980s and then leaving Pakistan to face the militants a decade later. 'We armed the Taliban and sent them in. We did it together,' he said."

WPost Criticizes Musharraf. The Washington Post (9/13, A16, 748K) editorializes that an "enduring favorite of the Bush administration, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Mr. Musharraf, whose country has been the main base for leaders of both al-Qaeda and the Taliban since 2002, last week concluded a peace deal with tribal leaders in North Waziristan, a territory near the border with Afghanistan. The Pakistani strongman agreed to withdraw his army from the area and release prisoners in exchange for promises by militants not to attack the Pakistani army or set up a parallel government." The Post adds, "Why would Mr. Musharraf strike this deal? The simple answer is that his army was defeated in its attempt to eliminate the al-Qaeda sanctuary by force; since launching the campaign in 2003, it had suffered more than 500 killed. … The cost of his decision will be borne by American and NATO troops in Afghanistan, whose commanders already say that the ability of Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters to retreat to Pakistan greatly complicates the challenge of defeating their escalating attacks. So why did Vice President Cheney call Mr. Musharraf 'a great ally' just days after his separate peace? Administration officials seem more willing to forgive their autocratic friend than they are domestic critics of the war on terrorism."

Maliki Asks Ahmadinejad For Help In Quelling Violence In Iraq. The New York Times (9/13, Wong, Fathi, 1.21M) reports Iraqi PM Nouri Kamal al-Maliki, on his first state visit to Iran, "discussed the security situation in Iraq with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and asked for Mr. Ahmadinejad's support in quelling the violence that threatens to fracture this country." Maliki said at a news conference, "We had a good discussion with Mr. Ahmadinejad. Even in security issues, there is no barrier in the way of cooperation." Ahmadinejad said Iran "will give its assistance to establish complete security in Iraq because Iraq's security is Iran's security.' For Mr. Maliki, the visit was a kind of homecoming, since he had spent a part of his exile years during Saddam Hussein's rule living in Tehran."

Iran Proposes Talks On Nuclear Impasse. The Washington Post (9/13, Anderson, 748K) reports Iran's "confidential response three weeks ago to an international proposal over its nuclear program offered extensive negotiations to resolve the standoff, but only if proceedings against Iran in the UN Security Council were stopped." In a "detailed and sometimes rambling document given to foreign governments, Iran stopped short of rejecting demands to halt its nuclear enrichment program, saying the issue could be resolved in talks." Iran's proposal suggests "ending enrichment should not be a prerequisite to negotiations, as demanded by the United States and other countries." Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "have been in preliminary talks in recent days over Iran's proposals." On Monday, Secretary Rice "suggested that a temporary suspension might be enough to clear the way for formal negotiations."

The AP (9/12, Schweid) reports the Bush Administration "was dismissive Tuesday of Iranian suggestions that it might suspend uranium enrichment for up to two months to set the stage for negotiations over its nuclear program and to head off US sanctions." State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said, "To the best of my knowledge, there has been no Iranian proposal. … There's been no change in the Iranian position."

Meanwhile, says the Financial Times (9/13, Dombey, Smyth, Dinmore), "Europe is poised to compromise on Iran's nuclear programme, in a step that could break the year-long stand-off over Tehran's atomic ambitions." European "diplomats stress that they will require Iran to allow United Nations inspectors to carry out spot-checks on its nuclear facilities to ensure that the Islamic republic has kept its side of the bargain."

Zilmer Says US Has Sufficient Troops For Mission In Anbar. The classified report by Marine Col. Peter Devlin on the situation in Anbar province received more coverage from major print media, which highlighted the Marine commander's definition of the mission in Anbar as training Iraqi forces rather than defeating the insurgency. The New York Times (9/13, Gordon, 1.21M) reports, "The senior Marine commander in Iraq said Tuesday that he had sufficient forces to carry out his mission but that the mission did not include defeating the insurgency." Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said the "force levels are about right" for what he called his "primary mission," namely, "training the Iraqi force" that ultimately will patrol restive Anbar province. The Defense Department "arranged the interview after articles in The Washington Post and The New York Times reported that General Zilmer's senior intelligence officer had submitted a grim assessment about the political and security situation in Iraq." General Zilmer "insisted that the United States was winning the war." The Times says that his comments "contrasted" with those of subordinates in the field, some of whom "recommended" additional forces.

The Washington Post (9/13, Ricks, 748K) plays down any disagreement that Zilmer found with the analysis, reporting that the general said, "I do concur with that assessment" and that he praised the analysis as "frank and candid." The Post quotes several upbeat comments by the general, such as, "I think we are winning this war," and a prediction "that he will have an adequate number [of Iraqi policemen] in the province by next year."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, McDonnell, Barnes, 918K) reports, "The general was called in to rebut reports, first published this week in the Washington Post, that a secret Marine intelligence assessment last month had concluded that the prospects for securing Al Anbar were dim. ... The strikingly frank findings by the top Marine intelligence officer in the region, which have not been released publicly, are said to have unsettled U.S. policymakers and top brass at the Pentagon." The markedly pessimistic article states, "Many Al Anbar residents see U.S. forces as agents of a regime that intends to disenfranchise and marginalize Sunnis while forging alliances with Shiite Iran" and "To some critics, the U.S. effort in Al Anbar and elsewhere in Iraq also has suffered from the unduly optimistic forecasts of American commanders.."

Zilmer Says US "Stifling" Insurgency. The AP (9/12, Burns) reports, "A senior American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that U.S.-led military operations are 'stifling' the insurgency in western Anbar province but are not strong enough to defeat it." Like the Times, the AP observes that Zilmer defined his "main mission" as training Iraqis rather than defeating the insurgency in Anbar. Zilmer called troop increases helpful "in the short term," saying that the long-term answer was "progress on the economic and political fronts that will undercut support for the insurgency." The AP predicts, "As long as the insurgency rages, it is unlikely that Sunni Arab politicians in Baghdad can win over significant numbers of Sunnis to support the government of national unity." It adds that White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "If the president gets a recommendation from the combatant commanders to send more troops to al-Anbar province, they will get them." USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) carries a shorter version of this AP article.

Kristol, Lowry Urge Bush To Send More Troops To Iraq. On its "In the Loop" column in the Washington Post (9/13, A15, 748K), Al Kamen writes, "Bush 's forceful and, of course, nonpartisan 9/11 commemoration speech Monday night obviously didn't suit some of his critics." But" the address also may have disappointed those conservative supporters who think things aren't going exactly swimmingly in Iraq. For example, early and staunch war backers such as the Weekly Standard's William Kristol and the National Review's Rich Lowry called on Bush yesterday 'to stop the downward slide in Iraq' by putting 'substantially more troops' there. (Lowry was among several conservative journalists who met with Bush later yesterday.) Kristol and Lowry didn't talk numbers, but it shouldn't require that many."

At Least 24 Iraqis Killed. The AP (9/12, Quinn) reports, "Violence killed at least two dozen people across Iraq on Tuesday, including six who died when a car bomb blew up in western Baghdad. The attack also wounded 18 people in Mansour, an upscale neighborhood that has been the scene of repeated bombings and kidnappings." The AP adds, "A group of lawmakers tried Tuesday to take advantage of the unpopularity of U.S. troops among many Shiite and Sunni legislators to seek approval of a resolution setting a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops." The resolution, sponsored by Moqtada al-Sadr's supporters, was "effectively shelved" by being sent to a committee for review.

Iraqi Speaker Says Partition Plan "Dead." The Washington Post (9/13, A11, Paley, Ibrahim, 748K) reports, "The speaker of the Iraqi parliament said Tuesday that a controversial plan to partition the country into three autonomous regions is politically dead." Sunnis "have generally opposed the plan, on grounds that it would leave them only with vast swaths of desert in the country's middle, devoid of the oil reserves in the other regions." Support "began to erode after a vast array of Sunni, Shiite and secular groups boycotted parliament on Sunday to protest the plan. [Speaker] Mashhadani said Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq, had ordered Shiite politicians to back off from the plan in order to prevent bitter infighting."

Saddam Trial Continues. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, McDonnell, 918K) reports, "A Kurdish villager mocked Saddam Hussein in court Tuesday as the man recalled the disappearance of his relatives during a 1980s military campaign in northern Iraq." The witness "congratulated" Hussein "for being in a cage." Several witnesses recounted how "bushes had turned white" and how their relatives were killed or imprisoned. The Times adds, "Elsewhere, the country's communal slaughter persisted amid grisly new finds of bodies."

Soldier Describes "Anguish" Of Turning In Alleged Killers. USA Today (9/13, Zoroya, 2.27M)

reports in a 2,414-word story the "anguish" of Pfc. Justin Watt, who eventually told "Army investigators that he suspected soldiers from his own platoon had raped a 14-year-old girl and then killed her and her family." Having endured many comrades' deaths, Watt had to decide: "Put yourself in my shoes ... My roommate's dead. A bunch of my friends are dead. Two of my buddies are being tortured to death. [Suspect Steve] Green is back in the States. He doesn't have to suffer at all. These good men are dead." Watt, who was transferred to another unit, has since received "threats," according to Senator Jon Kyl; the Army claims to be investigating "whether Watt is in danger."

Army Secretary Reveals Combat Death Notification Plan. USA Today/AP (9/13, Lindlaw) reports, "Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey says he is aiming to 'achieve perfection' in a new drive to inform families of soldiers killed in combat about the circumstances of their deaths. In a memo obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, Harvey outlines a far-reaching review he recently initiated of some 2,000 casualty reports from Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere." The memo, addressed to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-CA), "reveals a previously unknown element of the reforms: Commanders in the field must investigate even if the cause of death was apparent." The plan follows "highly publicized" instances in which families got misinformation about their relatives' cause of death, including the friendly-fire shooting of ex-NFL player Pat Tillman. Other problems mentioned include the "heart-rending" case of a soldier who allegedly "was left to bleed to death" by a medic and two soldiers who "were deliberately killed by Iraqi trainees patrolling alongside them."

No-Confidence Vote Against Rumsfeld Would Be "Unprecedented." Roll Call (9/13, Yehle) reports, "Now in their sixth year of complaining about Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Congressional Democrats have found a creative new way to make their case — borrow from Britain" by staging a "vote of no confidence." However, "in Congress, the term would have only a symbolic effect," as opposed to in the UK. In any event, Sen. Harry Reid's resolution "never reached a vote, as the GOP procedurally blocked it from being attached to the Defense appropriations bill."

US Becomes Concerned About Terrorist Havens In "Failed" States. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Dreazen, Shishkin, 2.03M) in a pessimistic, 2,159-word front page article reports, "Concern about extremism seeping out of Iraq underscores a painful irony in the five-year-old war against terrorism: The U.S. and its allies now face the distinct possibility that the same kind of 'failed state' that gave terrorists a haven when the Taliban ruled Afghanistan -- leading to Sept. 11 -- could be forming again, in more than one place." Iraq and Lebanon "are threatening to degenerate" into places "where extremists can thrive," and "Afghanistan itself now appears to be sliding backward so much that it could again become an international terror breeding ground." The US has had to "abandon" plans to withdraw troops from Iraq and "faces a diplomatic cost" as Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Turkey "chart their own courses because they see a possible threat ... from extremists in Iraq."

Ignatius Sees "Young Anger" As Wellspring Of Jihad. In the Washington Post (9/13, 748K), columnist David Ignatius approvingly quotes the book "Understanding Terror Networks," by former CIA case officer Marc Sageman. The latter argues "that we are facing something closer to a cult network than an organized global adversary. Like many cults through history, the Muslim terrorists thrive by channeling and perverting the idealism of young people." Sageman's analysis implies "that the Sunni jihadism of al-Qaeda and its spinoff groups is a generational phenomenon. Unless new grievances spawn new recruits, it will gradually ebb over time. In other words, this is a fire that will gradually burn itself out unless we keep pumping in more oxygen." For example, starting a war with Iran would be "the only sure way to ignite revolutionary zealotry in the younger generation."

DOJ:

DOJ IT Official Discusses Tech Security. Government Computer News (9/13, Jackson) reports, "A key element of the Justice Department's security program is managing vulnerabilities in its IT systems. According to director of IT security Dennis Heretick, when it comes to compliance with the Federal Information Security Management Act, this is even more important than implementing operational controls. … 'Vulnerability management has been the emphasis of our program,' Heretick said. 'That is what FISMA is all about. What are your weaknesses, and what can you do about it?'" GCN continues, "The department started with network and configuration scanning, using tools such as FoundScan from Foundstone Inc. (now a division of McAfee Inc.) and the open-source Nessus scanner, managed by Tenable Network Security Inc. of Columbia, Md. This year the department is expanding its scanning capabilities to assess application security, beginning with database software." GCN adds, "Two Justice offices, the FBI and Office of Justice Programs, already had been using the AppDetective scanner from Application Security Inc. (www.appsecinc.com) of New York. Other offices in the department were making plans to use it, Heretick said. 'We expanded that with an enterprise license' this summer, he said. 'We've started scheduling our training now.' … AppDetective is AppSecInc's flagship product. It is a network-based scanner that can work with other tools such as FoundScan, but it is specialized for identifying and fixing database—rather than network—vulnerabilities. Accenture Gets DOJ Debt Collection Contract. Washington Technology (9/13, Gerin) reports, "Accenture Ltd. won a contract potentially worth $54 million from the Justice Department to construct a new, integrated debt collection system." Washington Technology adds, "Under the contract, Accenture of Hamilton, Bermuda, will consolidate multiple legacy systems into an integrated system. The management and technology consulting firm also will operate and maintain the system. … The Justice Department and all of its component agencies, including the U.S. Attorneys Offices, tax and litigation divisions, and the offices of the chief finance officer and CIO, will use the system."

The Washington Business Journal (9/13) reports, "Accenture, which has local offices in D.C. and Reston, says the Justice contract calls for the company to deliver a new integrated debt collection system to the department and all its component organizations, including U.S. attorneys' offices." The Journal adds, "Accenture will also provide operations and maintenance to support the new system, which will help the Justice Department improve its communications and reporting and provide better financial controls."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Resigns Amid Expanding Criminal Probe. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Waldman, Lublin) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. named Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd to succeed its embattled chairman, but the computer maker faced a graver legal threat as California's attorney general said he has enough evidence to bring criminal charges against people at the company." The Journal continues, "Mr. Hurd will succeed Patricia Dunn, H-P's nonexecutive chairman, in mid-January 2007. Her efforts to catch boardroom leakers last year led the Palo Alto, Calif., company to hire a contractor that scrutinized the private phone records of H-P's own directors and nine journalists. … H-P has said those records were improperly obtained by outside investigators through the use of 'pretexting,' or masquerading as the directors and journalists in order to request their records from phone companies. Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn apologized for the company snooping yesterday, though Ms. Dunn reiterated boardroom leaks had been a substantial problem for H-P. … In addition, H-P said George Keyworth, a former presidential science adviser and H-P's longest-serving director, resigned from the board. Mr. Keyworth was identified in Ms. Dunn's probe as a leaker of information to the press." The Journal notes, "A spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation said yesterday an investigation started by the agency on Monday hasn't determined whether anyone in the case violated federal laws. LaRae Quy, a special agent in the FBI's office in San Francisco, said the investigation is focused on how the confidential information was obtained, not on H-P itself. The FBI normally doesn't discuss ongoing investigations but made an exception because there is 'such a national interest,' Ms. Quy said. H-P says it is fully cooperating with all the investigations."

The Washington Post (9/13, D1, Noguchi, Nakashima) reports, "It's unclear how soon charges in the scandal could be filed, but on last night's 'NewsHour With Jim Lehrer' on public television, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said, 'We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard, as well as contractors on the outside.'" The Post adds, "Meanwhile, Congress and federal and state investigators continue to pressure HP about the methods used to obtain those phone records, with calls from lawmakers from both parties to pass legislation, now pending, that would make it a crime to obtain people's phone records by impersonating them. … That follows separate probes by the FBI, a House subcommittee on investigations, the California attorney general and the Federal Communications Commission."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Granelli, Piller) reports, "Criminal charges could be filed as early as next week -- deepening a weeklong corporate spying scandal that has riveted the close-knit technology industry, but has been largely ignored by Wall Street. … Criminal charges against HP employees ratchets up the pressure on the Palo Alto, Calif., company and could threaten the turnaround engineered by Hurd, who was recruited last year from NCR Corp. to revive the storied maker of computers and printers. … It was unclear Tuesday whether Dunn is being targeted by Lockyer, who also said he had sufficient evidence to indict contractors outside the company. Neither HP nor Lockyer has identified the firms that conducted the leak probe, which was carried out earlier this year."

The New York Times (9/13, Darlin, Richtel) reports, "The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, said that after looking into the company's investigative effort, 'we have enough information to indict people inside H.P. and outside.' … For the garage-born company, whose H.P. Way set a standard for corporate behavior in Silicon Valley, the troubles have clouded its image but underscored the resilience of its resurgent business. Even after a week of intense publicity over its upheaval, the company's stock closed at its highest level since 2001." The Times adds, "Hewlett-Packard's investigation now appears to have included active surveillance and the review of videos to see if board members were meeting with reporters, according to people with knowledge of the company's examination of its private detectives' activities. … They also identified a Massachusetts company, Security Outsourcing Solutions, as a Hewlett-Packard contractor hired to find the source of internal leaks. Efforts to reach that company by phone and e-mail were unsuccessful."

USA Today (9/13, Kessler, Hopkins) reports, "The scandal began in 2005, when Hurd ran Ohio-based tech company NCR. Hewlett-Packard's then-CEO, Carly Fiorina, was clashing with her board. Information about it leaked to the press, so she hired a law firm to find the source. … The search was unsuccessful, and Fiorina was ousted in February 2005. Yet the leaks continued." USA adds, "Responsibility for the search passed to Dunn, appointed non-executive chairman after Fiorina left. The former CEO of Barclays Global Investors, who gave up that job to fight a bout with breast cancer, has a reputation for integrity and honesty, says Christian. … Dunn hired a yet-unidentified detective firm and told it to conduct a legal investigation, HP says. But a subcontractor used a controversial technique called 'pretexting' to obtain phone records. Pretexting is when someone contacts a company pretending to be someone else, in order to get that person's confidential records. … It worked, and Keyworth was exposed as the source of a leak to tech website CNet. He was outed during a May 18 board meeting. Dunn asked him to resign. He refused."

The AP (9/13, Robertson) reports, "The pressure on Dunn to step down began rising sharply on Monday when Congress and federal investigators entered the fray surrounding HP's investigation. The FBI, the U.S. Attorney for Northern California and the House Energy and Commerce Committee all joined the probe of the scandal swirling around HP's Board of Directors."

The Financial Times (9/13, Allison, Waters, Nuttall) reports, "News of Mr Hurd's appointment followed two days of emergency meetings by the HP board. It will allay fears that the spying scandal could put Mr Hurd's role as chief executive in jeopardy. … He has led a resurgence at the world's second-biggest computer maker since he took over following the removal of Carly Fiorina as chief executive last year. The leaks included details of discussions to oust her." The San Jose Mercury News (9/13, Carey) and Bloomberg (9/13, Gullo) also report this story.

Boston P-I Firm Tied To HP Probe. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Waldman, Stecklow, Emshwiller) reports, "For the past week, Hewlett-Packard Co. has refused to identify private investigators the company retained to investigate leaks by its board of directors. People familiar with the matter say H-P has told them one of the investigators connected to the case is Ronald R. DeLia, from a small Boston firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. that says it specializes in corporate-security investigations." The Journal continues, "H-P, a Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker, has said that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out its inquiry; that firm then hired a second entity that used so-called 'pretexting' to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists. … People familiar with H-P's leak probe say the company's private investigators also dispatched monitors to attend at least one director's speeches and to see if this board member met with journalists afterward." The Journal adds, "According to its Web site, Security Outsourcing Solutions 'was formed to provide small- to medium-size corporations and institutions with the same level of security currently available only to Fortune 1000 companies.' At one time, it published a newsletter called 'Corporate Homicide: Life in a Global Economy.' In a 1999 edition of the newsletter, Mr. DeLia warned that 'identity theft is becoming a major law-enforcement problem about which consumers can ill afford to become indifferent.' The newsletter said the Internet had made it easier for identity thieves to obtain addresses and Social Security numbers for a fee."

DOJ To Review Policy On Corporate Cooperation. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Burns) reports, "Amid criticism from business and legal groups and even some of its own former officials, the Justice Department is revisiting its policy of rewarding companies that agree to waive certain legal protections in criminal investigations. … But a senior official said any changes that would chill cooperation 'would not be a good thing.'" The Journal continues, "Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that corporations are eager to cooperate with federal prosecutors and expect to be rewarded for doing so, with or without an explicit federal policy to that effect. He later said the Justice Department is open to changes that 'improve the process we have,' but he raised concerns about inhibiting executives from sharing information with prosecutors. … Business and legal groups have been critical of the Justice Department policy, outlined in a 2003 memo on business prosecutions by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue told the panel that the Thompson memo 'emboldened federal prosecutors' to demand that companies and employees forgo rights, including the right to confidential discussions with lawyers, if the company wants credit for cooperating in an investigation." The Journal notes, "American Bar Association President Karen Mathis said the policy has eroded basic constitutional protections and is discouraging firms and individuals from talking to lawyers. The ABA complained in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this spring, and a bipartisan group of 10 former Justice Department officials did the same last week, calling for a revised policy telling prosecutors that waiving attorney-client privilege and work-product protections 'should not be a factor' in determining whether a company has cooperated with the government in an investigation."

The AP (9/13, Yen) reports, "At a Senate hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said the department would take another look at the 2003 policy in light of public criticism. But he added that there were no plans to change the guidelines, which reward companies if they cooperate with prosecutors in investigations such as by handing over confidential documents. … 'We see nothing wrong in asking a corporation to disclose to us the results of their internal investigation to assist us in investigating a corporation's claim of innocence,' McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee. 'Indeed, we believe it is good practice because it conserves public and private resources.'" The AP adds, "An array of business and legal groups such as the American Bar Association as well as former top Justice officials have come out against the policy, saying it coerces companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and deters employees from getting critical legal advice. … 'Lawmakers must intervene and abolish the provisions that rob executives and employees of their right to candid and confidential consultation with their attorneys,' said Tom Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce." The AP notes, "Sens. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both expressed concern that the Justice Department policy was unduly coercive and abrogated a fundamental right. They said prosecutors should be neutral in taking into account waivers of attorney-client privilege when considering charges to ensure fair representation. … McNulty responded that the policy was not coercive because prosecutors are instructed to consider waiver of the privilege as just one factor in determining charges. More critical factors include the degree to which a company CEO is involved in potential wrongdoing, he said."

The New York Times (9/13, Browning) reports, "The Justice Department's guidelines for prosecutors, as outlined in a 2003 document known as the Thompson memorandum, describe nine factors that prosecutors must consider when weighing whether to indict a company for corporate misconduct. Among them are whether a company has demonstrated cooperation with prosecutors by disclosing legal communications to investigators, and whether it has stopped paying legal fees to employees caught up in investigations. … Companies that do not demonstrate cooperation face a greater risk of indictment — which can be a death sentence, as it was for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen in 2002. … Any changes to the guidelines could alter the way prosecutors pursue companies and white-collar defendants." The Times adds, "The guidelines in the Thompson memorandum, Mr. McNulty said, 'are nothing more than a structured recitation of what common sense would lead a prosecutor to consider.' … Nonetheless, he said that amid the recent criticism, 'we are giving thoughtful consideration to everything,' and that 'we'll have new guidance if, and that's the key here, if something should be identified that would improve the process.' He said that the Justice Department would consider making the guidelines nonbinding for prosecutors." The Times notes, "Mr. Specter, the committee chairman, asked if Mr. McNulty would consider President Bush's frequent assertions of executive privilege during the confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. to be an example of noncooperation, in the same vein as companies that do not disclose legal communications. … Mr. McNulty said that he did not."

Paulson Backs Panel Formed To Study Sarbanes-Oxley Law. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson is backing the Committee on Markets Regulation, a 17-member panel of US businessmen and academics formed to study why US capital markets are losing ground to foreign rivals. The Financial Times (9/13, Grant) reports that the group, the second of its kind to be formed since the US Chamber of Commerce launched a similar initiative last year, is "a sign of increasing clamour in the US business community for a re-examination" of the Sarbanes Oxley law, "whose Section 404 internal audit control provisions have been widely criticised as being too onerous. The new committee will be directed by Hal Scott, Nomura Professor at Harvard Law School, and co-chaired by Glenn Hubbard, dean of Columbia Business School, and John Thornton, chairman of the board of the Brookings Institution. It will 'assess the degree to which US public markets are losing ground to foreign and private markets, the causes of this decline, and its impact on the financial industry and the economy.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Norris, 1.21M) reports that Paulson praised the creation of the panel, saying that "the issue of American competitiveness 'is important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me.'" The Times adds, "Among the issues to be considered are whether laws need to be changed to limit both civil and criminal liability for companies, auditors and directors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Reid Presses For Polygamy Task Force In Wake Of Jeffs Arrest. The AP (9/13) reports, "The U.S. Senate's top Democrat called Tuesday for a federal investigation into the activities of polygamists in Western states." The AP continues, "Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that a task force should be formed to look into interstate activities of polygamists. He also asked the Justice Department to help state prosecutors dealing with polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs. … 'For too long, this outrageous activity has been disguised in the mask of religious freedom,' Reid said. 'But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated.'" The AP adds, "Reid, a Mormon, added that Jeffs is part of a sect that broke away from the Mormon Church more than a century ago and has been disavowed by leaders and mainstream members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. … A reporter's call to the Justice Department's after-hours command center was transferred to the department's press office, where there was no answer."

DOJ Cuts Plea Deal With "Girls Gone Wild" Over Age, Identity Documentation. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Muskal) reports, "The California company responsible for the successful 'Girls Gone Wild' series of videos has pleaded guilty to violating a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department announced today." The Times continues, "Mantra Films Inc. of Santa Monica pleaded guilty to charges that it failed to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in sexually explicit films that it produced and distributed. The company also failed to label its DVDs and videotapes as required by federal law, the Justice Department said. … Mantra Films entered its plea agreement today before U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak in Panama City, Fla. A second related company, MRA Holdings LLC, also entered into an agreement." The Times adds, "The companies, founded and owned by Joseph Francis, agreed to pay $2.1 million in fines and restitution. Of that, $1.6 million is to be paid by Mantra and MRA, and $500,000 by Francis. … The case is believed to be the first to be filed under a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department said. … 'This case sends an important message about the Justice Department's commitment to protecting children from all forms of sexual exploitation,' Assistant Atty. Gen. Alice S. Fisher said in a statement. 'Today's agreements ensure that "Girls Gone Wild" will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well.' … 'This prosecution makes clear that those who seek to enrich themselves at the expense of our children's innocence in violation of the laws intended to protect them will be held to answer in federal court,' U.S. Atty. Gregory R. Miller of the Northern District of Florida said."

The AP (9/13, Yen) reports, "Separate state charges in Florida alleging that two 17-year-old girls were videotaped by a 'Girls Gone Wild' cameraman in sexual situations remain pending against Mantra and Francis. … An attorney for Mantra, Aaron Dyer, said the company would clean up its record keeping. … The charges involved 'serious record-keeping issues that occurred several years ago,' he said. 'Mantra takes these issues very seriously and has done everything it can to make sure this never occurs again.'"

CNN.com (9/13, Frieden) reports, "The law, which prosecutors call Section 2257 -- is intended to protect minors by requiring producers to create and maintain age and identity records for every performer in sexually explicit movies and other media. … Distributors also must label their tapes and discs with the name of the custodian of the records and their location, prosecutors said."

Broadcasting & Cable (9/13, Eggerton) reports, "In addition to paying the fines, the company has agreed to admit criminal wrongdoing. In addition the charges will be dropped only if the company remains in compliance for the next three years. It has also agreed to allow a government-approved monitor to assure that compliance."

Judge Rejects Motion For New Safavian Trial. The AP (9/13, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal judge declined Tuesday to throw out a conviction or order a new trial for a former Bush administration official convicted of lying about his relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff." David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, "was convicted in June of making false statements and obstruction. It was the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding Abramoff." His attorneys "argued that the charges didn't meet the legal standard for conviction. They also said US District Judge Paul Friedman improperly admitted into evidence e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian. The e-mails discuss two pieces of GSA-controlled property that Abramoff wanted for himself or his lobbying clients." Friedman "rejected that argument, denying the request for a new trial. He said the e-mails were properly admitted and noted that Safavian discussed the e-mails when testifying in his own defense."

NBC News (9/13) reports, "Judge Paul Friedman writes, 'This Court concludes that there are no grounds for granting either defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal on any of the counts for which he was convicted, or his motion for a new trial.' … The trial also provided new details of the lavish golf trip, as well as photos taken on the historic St. Andrews course of Ney with Abramoff and others. Volz, a longtime Ney loyalist who went to work for Abramoff's firm in 2002, pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges. Volz was a star prosecution witness in the Safavian trial." NBC adds, "Volz detailed the Scotland trip as a fete of eating and drinking and telling funny stories on the plane ride overseas. He said playing golf on the fabled Old Course totaled $400 per round. And, as far as he knew, Volz said, none of the public officials on the trip, including Ney and Safavian, ever paid for golf rounds or entertainment in Scotland. Ney has been the subject of a Justice Department investigation, but has not been charged. … Safavian's attorneys had argued that including hundreds of e-mails between him and Abramoff as evidence constituted hearsay that might have prejudiced jurors."

Ohio Fundraiser Sentenced For Funneling Donations To Bush Campaign. The AP (9/13, Seewer) reports, "A federal judge sentenced a GOP fundraiser at the center of an Ohio political scandal to two years and three months in prison Tuesday for funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign." The AP continues, 'Tom Noe, a former Toledo-area rare coin dealer whose large donations made him a powerful political figure, apologized for scheming to give friends money to donate to Bush to fulfill Noe's promise to generate $50,000 at a fundraiser. … 'I recruited others to make contributions to the campaign,' Noe said in court. 'I knew it was wrong to do so. I alone accept responsibility.'" The AP adds, "Noe said he arranged the scheme because 'in 2003 I was pressured by Bush-Cheney officials to become a Pioneer,' a name the campaign gives to people who raise $100,000. … Federal prosecutors say Noe wanted perks such as invitations to the White House and the president's ranch in Texas, and he wanted to impress various state officials. … The money-laundering scheme was the largest prosecuted under the 2002 campaign finance reform law, which set limits on donations, prosecutors said last October."

The Cleveland Plain Dealer (9/13, Caniglia) reports, "Tom Noe's zealous quest to be a Republican kingmaker ended in a cramped courtroom Tuesday, far from the Beltway spotlight he once craved." The Plain Dealer continues, "A federal judge sentenced an apologetic Noe to 27 months in prison and fined him $136,200 for making $45,400 in illegal campaign contributions to President Bush's re-election campaign. Authorities called the case the country's largest fundraising scandal in recent years. … Noe, however, will not go to prison until after his trial next month in Lucas County Common Pleas Court, on unrelated state charges of racketeering and stealing nearly $2.3 million from a $50 million investment in rare coins that he managed for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation. … If convicted in that case, he could receive decades in prison. … 'This was an ego-feeding and a stupid act by Mr. Noe,' said U.S. District Judge David Katz. … 'And I think he realizes that today,' added Katz, who imposed the sentence."

Former House Leaders To File Amicus Brief Supporting Jefferson On FBI Search. Roll Call (9/13, Bresnahan) reports former House Speakers Newt Gingrich and Tom Foley and former House Minority Leader Bob Michel "have notified an appeals court that they will intervene in the legal challenge by Rep. William Jefferson…to the May 20 FBI raid of his Capitol Hill office." Former DC Circuit Chief Judge Abner Mikva "also will file an amicus brief on Jefferson's behalf. In addition, a bipartisan group of former House general counsels, including Charles Tiefer, Stanley Brand, Steven Ross and Thomas Spulak, as well as Congressional scholars Norman Ornstein and Thomas Mann, have notified the appeals court of their intentions to weigh in on the case. Former House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt…was asked to join with his three former colleagues but declined to do so, several sources said." Roll Call notes Gingrich, Foley and Michel and the "Congressional experts will not defend Jefferson…but will argue that the Justice Department overstepped its bounds when it searched Jefferson's office."

Harman Says Intelligence Panel At Impasse On Cunningham Subpoena. The AP (9/13, Werner) reports House Intelligence Committee leaders "are at an impasse over whether to subpoena jailed former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham as part of an investigation into his actions on the committee." Ranking Democrat Jane Harman said "the disagreement threatens to end chances for a bipartisan outcome to the investigation." Harman said, "We've hit a problem, and I hope we can get past it and come up with a joint report. That is my preference, my strong preference, and I don't know if that's possible. It may not be possible." The AP adds Harman "believes the panel's investigation can't be complete without interviewing Cunningham, the San Diego Republican who resigned from Congress last November after admitting taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors." But Chairman Peter Hoekstra "has not agreed." A congressional aide, "speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said Hoekstra wants to hear from Cunningham but doesn't want to issue a subpoena only to have him invoke Fifth Amendment protections and refuse to testify, as his attorney has warned the committee he would do."

Animal Rights Advocates Given Prison Terms Under New Law. The New York Times (9/13, B8, Mansnerus) reports a federal district judge in New Jersey Tuesday "sentenced three people to prison terms of four to six years for their roles in a campaign of threats and harassment against a company that runs an animal testing laboratory." The three were described at their trial as "coordinators of a group dedicated to shutting down" Huntingdon Life Sciences, a British company with a laboratory in New Jersey. The Times notes that the case "has drawn international attention, not only because Huntingdon Life Sciences is the largest contract animal testing laboratory in Europe but also because the convictions were the first under the federal Animal Enterprise Protection Act."

The AP (9/13, DeFalco) reports from Trenton, NJ, "Three animal-rights activists convicted of using their Web site to incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals received prison sentences ranging from four to six years Tuesday." The AP continues, "They were also ordered to pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people they terrorized. All three said they planned to appeal their convictions and requested they receive vegan meals while in prison. … Three other members of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty are awaiting sentencing within the next two weeks." The AP adds, "Along with the organization itself, the six activists were convicted in March of using a Web site to incite threats, harassment and vandalism against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a company that tests drugs and household products on animals. .. . Huntingdon Life Sciences general manger Mike Caulfield said the company 'was grateful that justice was served.' He said as a result of the threats and harassment, the company's health insurer and other firms severed ties with it. … 'It generally made the cost of doing business with us more expensive than our competitors during that time,' he said. … And that was the point, prosecutors said. … 'This was a conspiracy to shut down Huntingdon Life Sciences,' said assistant U.S. Attorney Charles McKenna."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/13, Graham, 399K) reports Kjonaas said before the sentencing, "At this point in my life, I am utterly humbled. I've come here with my mother. This has been a traumatic experience and a learning experience." Outside court "after the hearing, Kjonaas…said a prison term would not deter him from his cause. 'Others have gone through worse things,' he said. 'The history of social-justice movements is filled with people who went to jail. ... I'll be back.'" The Inquirer notes, "The so-called 'SHAC 7' were the first defendants ever charged under a federal law designed to criminalize the stalking, vandalism and other tactics of militant animal-rights organizations," but Lindsay "said that home protests would continue," and "she maintained again that the defendants were legitimate activists who did nothing wrong, and said the sentences only encouraged 'underground' activists who break the law."

Alleged Israeli Mob Enforcer Sentenced For Racketeering. The AP (9/13) reports, "A reputed enforcer for an Israeli crime group was sentenced to more than 10 years in federal prison for racketeering." The AP continues, "Hai Waknine, 35, pleaded guilty in June to using extortion and threats of violence to help an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds. Authorities say the syndicate enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe and around the U.S." The AP adds, "Waknine, an Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, asked for leniency during sentencing Monday. But U.S. District Judge Manuel Real, citing Waknine's extensive criminal history, gave him 13 months in prison beyond the nine years that prosecutors recommended. … Prosecutors alleged that Waknine kidnapped debtors, aimed handguns at them and threatened their families to make them pay up. … 'That was Waknine's role, a shakedown collections guy,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas P. Sleisenger. 'There are a lot of people in the Israeli community who will sleep better tonight because he is behind bars.'"

Boston SAC Says FBI Big Dig Probe Is "High Priority." The Boston Herald (9/13, Ross, 203K) reports, "The federal investigation into the $15 billion Big Dig has mushroomed into a 'high priorty' public corruption probe focused on project financing and whether officials ignored requirements to conduct crucial inspections, Boston's FBI chief said yesterday. 'We've got a lot of agents assigned to it and there are several avenues to the case,' said Ken Kaiser, special agent in charge of the Boston FBI. 'Basically it's looked at as a public corruption investigation, which is the highest criminal priority we have.' … Kaiser said top FBI officials in Washington are monitoring the investigation and have pledged additional resources if necessary." The Herald adds, "Asked whether the probe reaches beyond contractors to public officials, Kaiser replied, 'If I would tell you that out of a $15 billion project we're not looking into other areas, I'd be lying,' he said. 'I mean, the money went someplace.'"

Vigil Retrial Jurors See FBI Tapes Of Alleged Bribery Payments. The AP (9/13, Korte) reports, "Jurors on Tuesday watched and listened to FBI videotapes showing California investment adviser Kent Nelson handing over thousands of dollars in cash to former state Treasurer Robert Vigil. … The videos and tape-recorded telephone conversations -- some of them also were played for the jury -- are among the government's strongest evidence against Vigil." FBI Special Agent Marcus McCaskill testified "that Vigil approved $2.5 billion in flexible repurchase agreements during his term as treasurer from 2003-2005, leading to $1.8 million in fees for Nelson and other investment advisers."

Peter Gotti Testifies He Was Not Brother's Gambino Go-Between. Newsday (9/13, DeStefano) reports, "John A. Gotti's younger brother took the witness stand Tuesday in Manhattan federal court and said he never collected any extortion cash or passed any messages to others on behalf of his sibling. Peter Gotti said that, despite a testy relationship over the years with his brother…he still kept in touch in the late 1990s and early part of this decade while John…was under house arrest and later serving a federal prison sentence." Newsday adds, "Even under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Peter Gotti denied ever collecting money on his brother's behalf." Hou also "brought up a taped conversation Peter Gotti had with his brother at Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York talking about the Colombo crime family infighting of the 1990s. Hou was apparently using the conversation to cast doubt on Peter Gotti's claim that he never talked about mob business. But Peter Gotti pointed out that the conversation centered on a column that had appeared on the Web site Ganglandnews.com."

Meanwhile, the New York Daily News (9/13, Zambito, 729K) reports John Gotti "invested $20,000 into a failed hip-hop magazine that would have targeted prisoners by dispensing free legal advice beside photos of rapper babes. But the Hottie Publishing venture never took off and Gotti ended up losing his dough, Gotti pal Steve Dobies told jurors yesterday at Gotti's racketeering trial in Manhattan Federal Court. … Dobies was called by defense attorneys to counter prosecution claims that he regularly visited Gotti at the federal prison so he could relay Mafia messages back to the street. Gotti was serving a nearly six-year prison hitch after pleading guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges and renouncing his ties to the mob."

Former Bank President Pleads Guilty In Arizona Ponzi Scheme. The Arizona Republic (9/10) reported, "The former president of a private bank in Arizona has pleaded guilty in a Ponzi scheme that cost Native American depositors millions of dollars." Edward James Driving Hawk Sr. of Chandler "admitted mail and wire fraud in a conspiracy with others through a company known as U.S. Reservation Bank and Trust, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. … An indictment says the company raised as much as $67 million in unsecured investments, and Driving Hawk diverted an estimated $4 million to himself and his family during the two years of operation." The AP (9/10) noted, "He faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he's sentenced November 13th."

Florida Men Indicted For Medicare Fraud Using Stolen SSNs. The Naples (FL) Daily News (9/9, Freeman) reported, "A Naples man and his cousin who worked at Cleveland Clinic in Weston were indicted Friday on charges they stole personal information of more than 1,100 patients from the former Cleveland Clinic in Naples, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami. … Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, registered as an owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, and Isis Machado, 22, of Miami Lakes, were indicted on charges they stole patient information for fraudulent purposes." Machado allegedly stole the information and sold it "to Ferrer, who used the stolen information in connection with the submission of about $2.8 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the indictment. The pair could face 30 years in prison and more than $1 million in fines if convicted as charged." The Miami Herald (9/9, Dorschner, 310K) noted FBI Miami SAC Jonathan Solomon said, "We expect healthcare employees to keep our personal information confidential and secure. Criminals who commit healthcare fraud steal from all of us as U.S. taxpayers and, in the end, make medical care more expensive for all of us."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/9, Diaz, 265K) reported, "They are also charged with fraud in connection with computers and violations related to the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, or HIPAA, which forbids the unauthorized release of private patient information. 'Medical files have some of our most private information,' said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. 'Each of us rightly trusts that our health-care providers will keep them confidential.'" The Lakeland Ledger (9/10) and AP (9/9) also reported on the indictments.

Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Copyright Infringement. IDG News Service (9/13, Gross) reports, "An Erie, Pennsylvania, man involved in a BitTorrent peer-to-peer network has pleaded guilty to copyright infringement and faces up to five years in prison and a US$250,000 fine, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said. Scott R. McCausland, 24, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement in violation of the Family Entertainment Copyright Act, the DOJ announced Tuesday." IDG notes, "McCausland's conviction is the third in a series of convictions arising from Operation D-Elite, a federal crackdown against the first providers of pirated works to the Elite Torrents network. … U.S. federal agents shut down the Elite Torrents network on May 25, 2005, seizing its main server and replacing its log-in Web page with the notice: 'This site has been permanently shut down by the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.'"

Sweep Nets 18 Members Of Los Angeles Gang. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Winton) reports, "Federal prosecutors indicted 18 members of the 18th Street gang, including one imprisoned leader of the Mexican Mafia, on racketeering, conspiracy and narcotics charges for a scheme where they allegedly would sell streets in the Wilshire, Koreatown and Pico Union areas to drug dealers for weekly and monthly fees." The Times continues, "The criminal organization, prosecutors allege, was run by Ruben 'Night Owl' Castro, a Mexican Mafia boss and leader of the 18th Street gang, from his federal prison cell with the help of his girlfriend. In 1997, Castro was convicted in the first federal Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) case against a gang." The Times adds, "In a sweep across Southern California this morning, federal and local law enforcement personnel arrested 10 members of two powerful cliques within the 18th Street gang known as the Hoover Locos and the Shatto Park Locos. Prosecutors allege that the 18th Street cliques in those areas answered to Castro and its shot callers collected so-called 'tax' or 'rent' from drug dealers for the right to sell narcotics on a street with a guarantee of protection from the 18th Street gang enforcers. … 'It is a form of old-fashioned organized crime. Drug dealers would buy a street, say a section of Alvarado from 3rd to 4th street,' said Bruce Riordan, assistant U.S. attorney." The Times notes, "Castro was housed in a Colorado federal prison during the time he allegedly oversaw the organization dubbed the 'Ruben Castro organization' by prosecutors. Authorities admitted that even one of the toughest prison systems did not stop Castro from operating his criminal business. 'No matter what we do, some people intent on committing crimes will do it,' said George S. Cardona, chief assistant U.S. attorney."

Judge Strikes Missouri Execution Procedure. The New York Times (9/13, Davey) reports, "A judge ruled that (Missouri's) newest protocol for execution by lethal injection is an improvement, but still falls short of providing constitutional protections." The Times continues, "Ordering the state to revise its rules again, the judge, Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. of Federal District Court, said that a doctor who had long mixed the drugs used in executions should no longer 'participate in any manner, at any level, in the State of Missouri's lethal injection process.'" The Times adds, "The doctor, identified in court documents only as John Doe I, had acknowledged sometimes giving inmates smaller amounts of anesthesia than the state had said was its policy."

Judge To Consider Class-Action Status In Tobacco Suit. The AP (9/13, Hays) reports, "Lawyers for smokers of light cigarettes have asked a federal judge to grant class action status to a lawsuit against major tobacco companies, allowing tens of millions of people nationwide to seek as much as $200 billion in damages." The AP continues, "In the lawsuit, filed in 2004, the smokers accused Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which is now part of Reynolds American Inc., based in Winston-Salem, N.C., and other defendants of deceiving them for more than 30 years by claiming low-tar cigarettes were less harmful than regular cigarettes. The manufacturers, they allege, knew the health risks were about the same. … U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein was scheduled to hear arguments Tuesday in Brooklyn." The AP adds, "As a class, light cigarette smokers would be entitled to between $120 billion and $200 billion in refunds for a deceptive product, plaintiffs attorney Michael D. Hausfeld said Tuesday. … The tobacco companies 'continue to believe that the class should not be certified,' said R.J. Reynolds spokesman David Howard. 'Class certification is not appropriate when you're talking about individual smokers and health claims.'"

Judge Adds Prison Time In Texas Human Smuggling Deaths. The AP (9/13) reports, "A judge sentenced three people convicted in America's deadliest human smuggling attempt, exceeding the maximum recommended prison term in two of the cases." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore sent Emma Sapata Rodriguez to prison for 15 years Monday for her part in trying to smuggle more than 70 immigrants inside a stifling trailer in 2003. The truck trailer was abandoned about 100 miles southwest of Houston and nineteen of the immigrants died." The AP adds, "Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez, who was convicted partly by the testimony of her two sons, received the recommended maximum sentence of 12 years and seven months. She smuggled one person into the trailer. … Sapata and Sarrata were convicted along with Victor Sanchez Rodriguez of conspiracy to harbor and transport illegal immigrants. In addition to the conspiracy charge, the jury found Sarrata guilty of one count of harboring and Sapata guilty of eight counts of harboring and six counts of transporting. Sanchez was convicted of eight counts of harboring and nine counts of transporting." The AP notes, "Sapata's prison term exceeds federal sentencing guidelines by three years and seven months. Her husband, Sanchez, was sentenced Monday to 23 years and four months in prison. The sentence is three years and four months longer than the maximum recommended penalty. … His attorney said the sentences 'makes no sense' and is appealing. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that judges are not bound by federal sentencing guidelines."

Justice Officials Under Growing Pressure To Re-Open Cold Civil Rights Cases. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/13, Kemper) reports, "Congress is weighing whether to create special cold-case units at the Justice Department and FBI that, with a $5 million annual budget, would focus exclusively on unsolved killings from the civil rights era. But Congress has come late to the movement. Federal and state authorities already are reopening those cold cases in Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama and elsewhere." The AJC continues, "This new urgency over unsolved killings from one of America's most violent eras was ignited in part by a series of successful prosecutions of civil rights murder cases in recent years and the fear among victims' families and law enforcement agencies that suspects and witnesses, now in their 70s and 80s, may not live much longer." The AJC adds, "Further fueling the movement to close cold cases is the growing clout of black elected officials in the South, the appearance of a new generation of Southern prosecutors eager to put that racially explosive era behind them and the need of aging witnesses and perpetrators to clear their consciences before they die, according to civil rights groups and police. … Nationwide, 29 civil rights era killings have been reinvestigated since 1989, resulting in 27 arrests and 21 convictions, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center, a nonprofit organization in Mongtomery, Ala., whose missions include monitoring hate groups and providing legal expertise in civil rights cases. Twenty-two of those cases were in the South."

9th Circuit Finds Racial Motives Behind Juror Strikes. The California Recorder (9/13, Hirsch) reports, "Almost 12 years after the fact, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals shot down a Humboldt County, Calif., prosecutor's decision to yank three American Indian jurors and one Asian juror from an infamous murder trial, finding all were singled out on the basis of race." The Recorder continues, "The court, in a narrow 6-5 majority ruling, swept aside a series of earlier decisions in state and federal courts that upheld the jurors' exclusion in the trial of Richard Kesser. In 1995, Kesser was convicted and sentenced to life without parole for hiring a hit man to kill his ex-wife." The Recorder adds, "Though the prosecutor's handling of jury selection had been unsuccessfully appealed up to the California Supreme Court, the 9th Circuit gave it a closer examination under the Batson and Wheeler standards. The lower courts had accepted the prosecutor's nonracial explanations, but the 9th Circuit judges said those excuses fell flat when compared to the full record of the jury selection process. … 'The racial animus behind the prosecutor's strikes is clear,' wrote Judge Jay Bybee, who authored the majority opinion in Kesser v. Cambra, 06 C.D.O.S. 8481 . … In his opinion, Bybee reprinted at length prosecutor Worth Dikeman Jr.'s notes, without citing Dikeman by name. … There, Dikeman described one juror as a 'darker skinned' '[N]ative American female.' Noting that the juror worked for a local tribe, Dikeman indicated he wanted to keep such people off the jury because 'they are sometimes resistive of the criminal justice system generally and somewhat suspicious of the system.' … Dikeman's notes also included race-neutral reasons for excluding the American Indian jurors. … Among those was the prosecutor's observation that one juror appeared 'somewhat unstable [and] fairly weak.' … Upon earlier review, the 1st District Court of Appeal concluded that those reasons were not 'sham excuses' and upheld the jurors' exclusion. … Bybee and the 9th Circuit majority disagreed. Dikeman's 'ostensibly "race-neutral" reasons show themselves to be only a veneer, a pleasing moss having no depth,' Bybee wrote."

Group Sues To Block Federal Aid For Bible-Based Marriage Counseling. A group called Americans United for Separation of Church and State yesterday filed suit on behalf of 13 Washington state residents to block federal financing for an organization that provides Bible-based marriage counseling. The New York Times (9/13, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports, that the suit "is another challenge to the Bush administration's efforts to channel money for social services to religious organizations. While religious groups are not barred from getting public money, such financing can only be used for secular purposes, not 'worship, religious instruction or proselytization,' according to government guidelines." Americans United objects "to federal funds being used to support the Northwest Marriage Institute, which states in its newsletter that it offers 'Bible-based premarital and marriage counseling.'"

Bristol-Myers CEO Resigns After Bungled Plavix Deal. The New York Times (9/13, Saul) reports, "The troubled five-year term of Peter R. Dolan as chief executive of the drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb ended yesterday when the board dismissed him over the mishandling of a patent dispute involving the company's blockbuster drug, Plavix." The Times continues, "Mr. Dolan, 50, was replaced with an interim chief, James M. Cornelius, a Bristol-Myers director. Mr. Cornelius had recently served as the interim chief executive of the medical device maker Guidant and was a crucial player in its agreement to be acquired earlier this year by Boston Scientific. … Although the Bristol-Myers board said it would mount a search for a permanent chief executive, Mr. Cornelius's interim appointment increased speculation on Wall Street that the company might become an acquisition candidate."

The Washington Post (9/13, D01, Masters) reports, "Bristol's board announced the departure of Dolan, its chief executive since 2001, and general counsel Richard K. Willard one day after the company's independent directors met with the monitor, Frederick B. Lacey, and Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey. … The New York firm has been operating since last year under a deferred prosecution agreement with Christie that resolved an earlier, unrelated accounting scandal by requiring it to stay out of trouble for two years and allowing Lacey, a former judge, to call for management changes, as he did Monday night." The Post adds, "Dolan's ouster is one of the highest-profile management changes at a company operating under a deferred prosecution agreement. Prosecutors often seek new management as part of such settlements -- Bristol named an independent chairman as part of its initial deal -- but subsequent changes are far less common. … Christie's spokesman, Michael Drewniak, said that the U.S. attorney 'was fully supportive of Judge Lacey's recommendations' for management change but noted that 'there was no finding of a violation of the [agreement] or criminal wrongdoing.'"

Bloomberg (9/13, Rapaport, Voreacos) reports that Dolan "and General Counsel Richard Willard stepped down after a court-appointed monitor last night told the Bristol-Myers board they should be fired. The monitor, former U.S. Judge Frederick Lacey, was probing corporate governance issues related to a patent accord on Plavix, Bristol-Myers's biggest-selling product, the company said today in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "James Cornelius, the former chairman and interim chief executive officer of the medical device maker Guidant Corp., was appointed to replace Dolan while the board searches for a successor. Dolan, who is staying on as an adviser, didn't have an obvious heir apparent within the company, analysts said."

The AP (9/13) reports, "Sandra Leung, the company's corporate secretary, was named interim general counsel, and will be aided by former FBI Director Louis J. Freeh, a board member and former general counsel. … The board formed a special committee to fill the positions permanently." The AP notes, "The apparent last straw was Dolan's and Willard's conduct stemming from a failed agreement between Sanofi-Aventis, Bristol-Myers' partner for the drug Plavix, and Canadian drugmaker Apotex Inc. to keep a lower-priced generic version of the best-selling blood thinner off the market. … The agreement soured when state attorneys general refused to sign off on it. … As a result, Apotex launched its generic version in early August, and quickly grabbed about 75 percent of new prescriptions. Plavix is the second-best-selling drug in the world, with annual sales of about $5.9 billion. … The Plavix agreement also fell under a federal criminal investigation, leading FBI agents to raid Bristol-Myers' offices, including Dolan's, in New York. In the meantime, a judge halted further sales of Apotex's generic version of Plavix but declined to order a recall, leading some to believe that there could be generic product on the market well into 2007."

The Newark Star-Ledger (9/13, Jordan) reports that "in a startling move for a company that likes to play things close to the vest, board chairman James Robinson suggested the company could go on the block. … 'We will deal with any bona fide proposal that anyone wants to make in an orderly and professional manner,' Robinson said in a conference call with reporters last night. Robinson declined to comment further on talk of a possible takeover."

The London Times (9/13, Doran) reports, "Analysts were quick to pounce on the latest unsettling news from Bristol-Myers with claims that the company is more vulnerable than ever to a hostile takeover bid from one of its rivals. Industry sources said European pharmaceutical companies like Sanofi-Aventis, Schering-Plough and AstraZeneca could be interested. … Under Mr Dolan's five-year stewardship Bristol-Myers has lurched from crisis to crisis and the shares have lost almost 60 per cent of their value." The Times adds, "Last year the US Attorney in New Jersey forced the company to comply with a deferred prosecution agreement after an investigation into $2.5 billion worth of 'channel stuffing' — a practice that involves overloading wholesalers with drugs to meet quarterly sales targets. The company also paid $300 million to settle the claims. In 2001, soon after Mr Dolan became chief executive, he was forced to relinquish the role of chairman when authorities began an accounting inquiry that led to Bristol-Myers spending more than $800 million to settle lawsuits and government inquiries."

The New Jersey Law Journal (9/13, Daks) reports, "The June 2005 accord meant that Bristol-Meyers could avoid further federal litigation if it kept its nose clean. But under Dolan's and Willard's watch, the Department of Justice's antitrust division began probing the company's agreement to pay at least $40 million to a Canadian competitor, Apotex Inc., to delay putting its generic version of Bristol-Myers' blood thinner Plavix on the market. … In a prepared statement announcing the personnel changes, Bristol-Myers noted that the federal monitor and Christie did not find any violation of the deferred prosecution agreement."

Backers Of Wright Amendment Get Expert Help. The AP (9/13, Koenig) reports, "Supporters of legislation to shrink Dallas Love Field and bar long flights there for eight more years have enlisted help in countering the charge that their proposal violates antitrust laws." The AP continues, "Four experts in antitrust law, including two former Federal Trade Commission members, wrote to congressional leaders last week to say the restrictions are part of a necessary compromise to end a decades-long fight over Love Field. … The proposed legislation, they said, 'will be far better for airline competition and consumers than the regime that prevails today — and that will continue to prevail if the legislation does not pass.'" The AP adds, 'The letter was released Tuesday by officials of Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport. It was signed by former FTC members Thomas B. Leary and Christine Varney, and two other private antitrust lawyers, Harry M. Reasoner of Vinson & Elkins LLP and Janet L. McDavid of Hogan & Hartson LLP. … Reasoner's law firm works for the city of Dallas and Southwest Airlines Co., and the other three work for a firm that represents Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport — all supporters of the legislation."

The Dallas Morning News (9/13, Reddy, Dodge) reports, "With time quickly ticking off a short calendar, Texas lawmakers worked into the evening Tuesday to address antitrust concerns and save their effort to lift the Wright amendment." The News continues, "The legislation would implement a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co. … Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, along with House members from Texas and Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, lobbied legislators across Capitol Hill throughout the day. … 'We're all begging, pleading, cajoling – doing anything we can to address their concerns,' Mr. Cornyn said." The News adds, "The legislation to end flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field is scheduled to go before the House Judiciary Committee today. The meeting will give lawmakers on the panel a chance to amend the bill before the committee's authority runs out on Friday. … Officials from North Texas feared that the committee's chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., would try to strip provisions protecting the agreement from antitrust challenges."

FCC Head Hopes For AT&T-BellSouth Vote In Fall. Market Watch (9/13, Hughes) reports, "Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin on Tuesday appeared to suggest that he is hoping to vote over the next month or so on whether to approve AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp." Market Watch continues, "Federal regulators in late April commenced a review of the transaction, which was valued at $67 billion when it was announced. The FCC generally tries to approve transactions six months after beginning its review. … 'We have an informal clock of 180 days that we try to act on, and I think that 180-day clock runs sometime this fall, the end of October,' said Martin after testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee. 'We always have a goal of trying to act within 180 days.'" Market Watch adds, "The Justice Department hasn't yet approved the merger. Traditionally, the FCC waits to act until the Justice Department had completed its own review. The FCC meets in two weeks and again on Oct. 12. … Martin still faces questions about whether he will be able to count on both Republican colleagues on the five-member commission. FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell on Tuesday reiterated he may be recused from voting, given that his former employer opposes the merger. McDowell would be a crucial swing vote because the two Democrats may favor imposing conditions that don't fit in with Martin's largely hands-off approach."

EU Debates Vista Security Issues With Microsoft. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/13, Bishop) reports, "European regulators warned Tuesday that Microsoft's addition of security programs to Windows Vista may run afoul of antitrust laws and increase risks for consumers long term by endangering other companies that protect against online threats." The P-I continues, "Microsoft called the programs important security features and said it hopes the European Commission doesn't require them to be removed from Windows Vista in Europe." The P-I adds, "The back-and-forth comes less than a week after Microsoft said antitrust questions not yet answered by the commission could force the company to delay the European release of Windows Vista, the upcoming version of its biggest product. … 'We want to launch Windows Vista in a fully lawful manner, and we want to avoid regulatory decisions that could increase security risks for European consumers,' Erich Andersen, Microsoft associate general counsel said, in a statement from the company Tuesday." The P-I notes, "Regulators want to make sure Microsoft doesn't use its dominant PC operating system to give its other programs unfair advantage over rival programs by using Windows as a distribution mechanism. Vista's built-in anti-spyware protections and Windows Security Center software are among the programs discussed in letters between Microsoft and the commission."

Class-Action Suit Against Microsoft Heads To Iowa Courtroom. The AP (9/13, Pitt) reports, "One of the last remaining consumer class-action antitrust lawsuits filed against Microsoft Corp. in a state court is set to go to trial in November, and the company's co-founder and chairman is on the witness list to testify." The AP continues, "That doesn't mean Bill Gates will end up in the witness chair in Polk County District Court defending his company's business plan, but it's a possibility. … The lawsuit against Microsoft has made its way to the Iowa Supreme Court three times and unlike those in most states, which have been either settled or dismissed, it is scheduled for trial on Nov. 13. … Attorneys expect the trial to last six months." The AP adds, "Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin said Tuesday her experts have estimated that individuals and businesses have been overcharged as much as $453 million for Microsoft products in the last 12 years because a lack of competition has inflated the cost of the company's products. … In Iowa, about 5.1 million licenses for Microsoft Windows have been issued, 1.8 million for Office, 446,373 for Word and about 21,349 for Excel. … The average consumer overcharge ranges from $10.50 for buyers of Word to $56.99 to those who purchased Excel, Conlin said. … Many customers may have purchased more than one version in 12 years, Conlin said, so they could be eligible for multiples of those amounts."

German Truck Maker May Target Rival For Takeover Bid. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Singer, Power) reports, "German truck maker MAN AG is considering a bid for Swedish rival Scania AB, a potential move to consolidate the European market for heavy commercial vehicles and diesel engines, according to people close to the matter." The Journal continues, "Scania, of Sodertalje, Sweden, has a market value of about $9.6 billion. It isn't clear if Scania would be receptive to any approach, these people said. A MAN spokesman didn't return calls seeking comment. A Scania spokesman couldn't be reached for comment." The Journal adds, "Munich-based MAN has been looking for acquisition targets after restructuring its business to focus on commercial vehicles, diesel engines, turbines for the energy industry, and services such as logistics, Chief Executive Hakan Samuelsson said in a recent interview. Mr. Samuelsson, a Swede, spent 23 years at Scania before joining MAN in 2000 to turn around the German company. … Scania operates with one of the global industry's highest profit margins. The high-quality vehicles Scania produces for premium prices have made it known as the Porsche of the truck business among people in the industry."

Problems. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/12) reported congressional investigators "said that Earl Devaney, the Interior Department inspector general, is scheduled to drop a few haymakers on Interior officials for failing to fix ethical lapses uncovered by his investigators." Devaney is set to testify today "before the House Government Reform's subcommittee on energy and resources. Investigators said he is expected to criticize, among others, former Interior Secretary Gale Norton." In one case, Devaney "wrote a sharply critical report on Interior's number two official, Steven Griles, and Norton took no action to remove him from office. Griles later left the department." In a memo, congressional aides said, "What he [Devaney] has discovered is a culture of unaccountability and managerial irresponsibility that pervades many areas of the department." The panel "also plans to explore Interior Department bungling that led to its failure to include provisions for royalty payments in valuable oil leases in the Gulf of Mexico."

Environmentalists Oppose GOP Effort To Maintain Hunting On California Island. Environmentalists and parks officials are opposing a House GOP effort to continue big game hunting in a national park on a California island. The Washington Post (9/13, A8, Eilperin, 748K) reports that House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter is seeking to maintain the hunting preserve on Santa Rosa Island, part of California's channel islands. Environmentalists and parks officials "say preserving the nonnative deer and elk herds for hunters will further damage the delicate habitat." Hunter, "who came up with the idea while driving down the California coast with a group of Iraq veterans, said it could 'provide wonderful outdoor activities for those American veterans who have protected our freedom.' The House has adopted the language, but the Senate passed a resolution opposing it. Lawmakers must reconcile if they hope to pass the defense bill before adjourning for the election."

Former FBI Agent Pleads Guilty To Lying About Relationship With Informant. The AP (9/13) reports former FBI Special Agent Ronald LeBlanc "pleaded guilty Tuesday to false-statement charges after he was accused of concealing his relationship with a Colombian illegal immigrant so she could stay in this country following a drug arrest. … At his plea, he also admitted making false statements regarding the substance of the information the woman provided to law enforcement. LeBlanc faces a maximum of five years in prison when he is sentenced Dec. 20." The AP notes, "LeBlanc met the woman in the summer of 1999 while working on a squad investigating South American drug trafficking and money laundering organizations. He registered her in November 1999 as a cooperating witness and acted as her supervising agent, an indictment said." The New York Daily News (9/13, Zambito, 729K) also briefly reports on LeBlanc's plea, under the headline "Ex-Agent Aided Drug Mule."

Senate Panel Recommends Cutting ONDCP Salaries. The AP (9/13, Freking) leads, "White House employees who oversee the war on drugs could be in for a huge pay cut next year," as "Salaries and expenses at the Office of National Drug Control Policy would fall from $26.6 million to $11.5 million under the recommendation of the Senate Appropriations Committee." Seen as a response to their "frustration" with ONDCP, "the legislation states that the committee's staff must make numerous inquiries before they can get information from the drug policy office. Plus, the office has prevented directors of various programs from meeting with the committee." They also called for a study by the National Academy of Public Administration, and "ordered a Government Accountability Office study on the distribution of grants." Furthermore, they directed Director John Walters "to provide quarterly updates on travel expenditures, staffing levels and plans for future hirings."

Supermax Prisoner Accused Of Directing LA Drug Gang. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, A1, Mozingo, Winton) reports, "Sending hidden messages in letters from his cell at Colorado's 'Supermax' prison," Ruben "Nite Owl" Castro, the kingpin of the 18th Street gang, "controlled an elaborate drug operation on the streets west of downtown Los Angeles, federal prosecutors charged Tuesday." Their "indictment of 18 members of the gang capped a four-year investigation by a task force of Los Angeles Police Department detectives and FBI agents," who "have been trying for decades to bring down the 18th Street gang." They "said they were surprised by the sophisticated hierarchy that they discovered," adding it was "more akin to the Cosa Nostra than a traditional Latino street gang."

Judge Grants Bail To Reputed Mobster In Marijuana Case. The New York Daily News (9/13, Marzulli) reports that Bari Mascitti, "a reputed Bonanno crime soldier charged by the feds with supervising a marijuana distribution ring in Queens," received $1 million bail and house arrest while waiting for trail. The judge "insisted that Mascitti's three children co-sign the bond," saying "If he violates a single condition of release, it will have serious financial consequences, and I want it to hurt significantly." While "he's not charged with racketeering or membership in the crime family in the criminal complaint, Mascitti 'is an active member,' according to prosecutors." Before he was busted, "DEA agents watched him and codefendant Michael Santoro shop at a Staples office supply store for airtight plastic storage bins to keep their marijuana fresh and potent."

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced For Selling Crack. The Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA) (9/13) reports that Percy Harris of Harrisburg "was sentenced to 12 years in federal prison on charges of distributing and possessing crack cocaine and nearly 2 kilograms of cocaine." He "was under investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration since 1998. A search of his home found digital scales, a false-bottom can, $30,000 in cash, about 4 ounces of crack cocaine and the cocaine."

Senate Committee Holds Meth Hearing. The Des Moines Register (9/13, Norman) reports, "Law officials told members of the Senate Finance Committee that 80 percent of meth now is manufactured in 'super labs' in Mexico and smuggled over the border," so that the meth supply hasn't been effected even though "mom-and-pop meth labs are vanishing from the landscape." Gregory Passic, director of the office of drug interdiction for customs and border protection at the Department of Homeland Security, called meth, "a weapon of mass destruction introduced by Mexican criminal organizations." Also, committee chairman Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley "said constituents in his town meetings in Iowa often link the arrival of illegal immigrants in the state to the spreading use of meth." Radio Iowa (9/13, Kelley) adds, "Grassley says the purpose of the hearing is to gather testimony about the 'changing geography of meth use and production.'"

The Billings Gazette (9/13, Straub) notes that Lt. Dan Springer, commander of the Missouri River Drug Task Force and Crow Tribal Chairman Carl Venne testified that "Congress must provide more funding and encourage better cooperation between law enforcement agencies to combat the methamphetamine problem in Montana." Springer said he need more people, as "The only way work gets done is by people beating the street." He added that "there is no DEA agent within 160 miles of the task force, so that the group must work with those in Billings."

UN Anti-Drug Official Urges NATO To Destroy Afghanistan's Opium Industry. The AP (9/13, Brand) reports, "The United Nations urged NATO forces Tuesday to take military action to destroy the opium industry in southern Afghanistan, saying cultivation of the crop is out of control in the embattled Asian country. U.N. anti-drug chief Antonio Maria Costa said opium production was being used to fund terrorist groups, and that eradicating it was crucial to establishing order in the south." He also "called for increased development aid from international donors such as the European Union to get farmers off their dependency on growing opium. Costa said the aid should be made conditional on commitments by regional political leaders to fight opium cultivation and to curb corruption." He added that "legalizing Afghanistan's opium trade was not a solution," as "the market for opium-made morphine was not lucrative enough." In an article on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comments about Afghanistan, Bloomberg (9/13, Johnson) adds that Costa said "the counter-insurgency and counter-narcotics efforts must reinforce each other 'so as to stop the vicious circle of drugs funding terrorists and terrorists protecting drug traffickers.'" The United Press International (9/13) also covers this story.

ATF Joins Probe Of California Tire Shop Fire. The San Diego Channel, News 10 (9/13) reports, "Federal fire scene detectives joined Tuesday in local investigations into a blaze that raged through an East Village tire shop over the weekend, causing an estimated $3.5 million in damages." News 10 continues, "The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will aid the San Diego Fire-Rescue Department in determining the cause of the conflagration in the 1000 block of Broadway, ATF information officer Susan Raichel said." News 10 adds, "Sunday night's blaze at Tire Express forced the evacuation of about 200 people from neighboring Sara Frances Hometel, SDFRD officials said. … It took several dozen firefighters more than three hours to extinguish the main body of the inferno, which caused no serious injuries but left several people suffering from smoke inhalation. … The investigative assistance of the ATF's National Response Team will bring additional expertise and state-of-the-art equipment to the probe, Raichel said."

Utah Man Charged With Impersonating Federal Marshal. The AP (9/13) reports, "A Salt Lake City man who ran a business called U.S. Marshalls Salvage has been charged with impersonation of a U.S. marshal and bank fraud, the U.S. attorney's office said." The AP continues, "Andrew A. Costa, 41, has no connection to the U.S. Marshals Service. But he is accused of telling people he was a federal marshal and of handing out business cards with a five-point star similar to the U.S. marshal insignia, the U.S. attorney's office said." The AP adds, "Costa used the business cards and other documents containing the star insignia to create the impression he was associated with the federal agency, James Phelps, supervisory deputy of the Salt Lake City office of the Marshals Service, said in an affidavit filed with the complaint last week. … Costa is accused of carrying out the deception from about January to August and of depositing fraudulently obtained money in a credit union account. He is accused of accepting $22,000 for a truck he had repossessed, Phelps said in court documents. … Bank fraud carries a penalty of up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine. … He is also charged with illegal possession of marshal insignia and unlawful use of the marshal name."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Judge Allows Salvadoran Boy To Stay In US. The AP (9/13, Prengaman) reports, "A 10-year-old Salvadoran boy who was apprehended while trying to cross the U.S. border on his own to find his mother can stay in America at least until next summer, an immigration judge ruled Monday." The AP continues, "Judge William Martin's decision means Jonathan Martinez can live with his mother in Inglewood while the family prepares an asylum claim to keep him here, lawyer Julianne Donnelly said. That case is expected to be heard in August." The AP adds, "Donnelly said the family will argue that Jonathan does not have anyone to take care of him in El Salvador, making him susceptible to gangs and violence. … 'He would be forced to fend for himself on the streets,' Donnelly said." The AP notes, "Jonathan's case illustrates a growing problem with the federal program known as 'temporary protective status' under which his mother is staying in the United States. Officials don't know what to do with the thousands of kids from Central America who come to the country illegally to join their parents. … The program provides legal residency to illegal immigrants from El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, all countries that have suffered devastating natural disasters in recent years. The idea is that they can best serve their homelands by working here and sending money home. … But only immigrants in the United States when a program starts - for Salvadorans, after two major earthquakes in 2001 - are eligible. That means children who come later to join parents don't qualify, putting them in a sort of immigration limbo. Many end up being deported. … Jonathan's mother had left him with an aunt in 2000 to illegally immigrate to the U.S. Since 2001, she has had the temporary status."

House Republicans Offer Border Security Proposals. The New York Times (9/13, Swarns, 1.21M) reports, "House Republicans proposed a series of border security and immigration enforcement strategies, calling for more fencing along the Mexican border, more Border Patrol agents and counterfeit-proof Social Security cards for citizens and immigrants searching for work." The proposals "are likely to form the basis for a legislative package House Republicans plan to announce this week." The initiatives "are expected to pass the House this month, either attached to other legislation or as a stand-alone bill. House Democrats called the Republican effort political grandstanding in the weeks before the November midterm elections."

The Washington Times (9/13, Hurt, 88K) reports House Republicans, "returning from a month of field hearings on illegal immigration, yesterday warned of a gaping disconnect between American voters and many 'elite' lawmakers." GOP Rep. Peter T. King, who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, said, "I have never seen such a disconnect between the American people and the elite." King "said securing the border this year is a cornerstone to national security and the war on terrorism. He called for more Border Patrol agents, more detention facilities for captured illegals and more unmanned aerial vehicles to patrol the border." Testimony by King and others "came during a 'forum' yesterday before the Republican Policy Committee at which committee chairmen who held field hearings during the August recess could report their findings to Republican leadership."

The AP (9/13, Abrams) says the "Republicans-only forum…confirmed the House's rejection of the Senate approach of combining enhanced border security with creation of a guest worker program and a means for illegal immigrants to move toward eventual legal status." House Speaker Dennis Hastert said at the meeting of GOP leaders and committee chairmen, "The state of our borders is a security crisis. … The American people want…immediate, targeted legislation specifically designed to secure the border, protect our homeland and vigorously enforce our immigration laws." The purpose of the forum was "to share results from some 22 hearings Republicans held in 13 states during the August recess to press the importance of the border security issue."

TAX:

Columnist Explains Recent Tax Code Changes. In his "Tax Report" colulmn for the Wall Street Journal (9/13), Tom Herman writes, "Among the revisions (to the tax code) effective this year are higher limits for 401(k) contributions, a new charitable-giving incentive and new breaks for energy-efficient vehicles and home improvements. These are in addition to perennial year-end techniques such as selling losing stocks. Many taxpayers can also take steps to blunt the impact of other, more onerous changes, such as the expanded 'kiddie tax.' … 'With all the new laws, you've got many new ways to cut your taxes' and soften the blow from other new provisions, says Sidney Kess, a New York lawyer and accountant." Herman continues, "Some tax changes this year that you can still take advantage of -- or blunt the impact of: The maximum workers under age 50 can contribute to their 401(k)s rises to $15,000, from $14,000. For those 50 and over, the max is now $20,000. … Taxpayers age 70½ and older can move up to $100,000 a year out of their IRAs directly to charity, tax-free. … Congress has expanded the so-called kiddie tax; parents can consider investments for kids that don't generate much taxable income. … But year-end planning could be tricky for millions of people this year because of continued uncertainty about the fate of several popular tax breaks that expired at the end of last year. Chief among these is a provision allowing people who itemize their deductions to deduct either their state and local income taxes or sales taxes. Unless Congress revives this provision, taxpayers will be able to deduct only their state and local income taxes for 2006. The option to deduct sales taxes, instead of the income taxes, is especially important to people in states with no state income tax, such as Florida, Texas and Washington."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Says He Senses A "Third Awakening." The Washington Post (9/13, A5, Baker, 748K) reports President Bush "said yesterday that he senses a 'Third Awakening' of religious devotion in the United States that has coincided with the nation's struggle with international terrorists, a war that he depicted as 'a confrontation between good and evil.'" Bush told a group "of conservative journalists that he notices more open expressions of faith among people he meets during his travels, and he suggested that might signal a broader revival similar to other religious movements in history." Bush noted "that some of Abraham Lincoln's strongest supporters were religious people 'who saw life in terms of good and evil' and who believed that slavery was evil. Many of his own supporters, he said, see the current conflict in similar terms." In his "comments yesterday, aides said Bush was not casting the war as a religious struggle but was describing American cultural changes in a time of war."

House To Vote On Earmark Reform Measures. McClatchy (9/13, Talev) reports "the Republican-led House of Representatives will vote this week on two measures that could help reveal who's behind billions of dollars in pork-barrel spending each year." That "could help Republicans appeal to fiscally conservative voters who are frustrated by Congress's runaway spending and threatening to stay home from the polls in November." McClatchy adds, "Taxpayer-watchdog groups praise the sentiment behind House Majority Leader John Boehner's decision to schedule these votes, but he's being squeezed between lawmakers who are reluctant to cede power and critics who say the legislation doesn't respond forcefully enough to a spate of congressional corruption scandals."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) writes, "Like drunks checking into rehab, House Republicans will take one final stab this week at reforming the 'earmark' epidemic on Capitol Hill. So far this year more than 10,000 projects -- for baseball parks, bovine genetics, bicycle paths, beaver management grants and bridges to nowhere -- have been stashed into budget bills at a cost of nearly $30 billion. That ain't peanuts." The House GOP leadership "finally seems to comprehend the stakes in this pre-election budget fight. Majority Leader John Boehner calls the anti-earmarking bill 'must-pass legislation,' and has agreed to separate it from a bottled-up lobbying-reform bill. All that can block this from passing now are the spend-happy Republicans on Appropriations. If they succeed, they will have inflicted a far greater wound on their majority than the Democrats ever could."

House, Senate Fail To Reach Agreement On Broader Ethics Bill. The AP (9/13, Abrams) reports, "Unable to agree on sweeping ethics legislation, the House this week will try to pass a narrower bill to shed light on pet projects that lawmakers tuck into spending and tax bills. The measure on 'earmarks'…is a small part of comprehensive lobbying and ethics legislation that the House and Senate both passed last spring in the wake of a spate of scandals involving lawmakers and lobbyists." But "the two chambers have been unable to find common ground, and prospects for legislation that was deemed a top priority when this session of Congress convened last January are not good."

NIH Scientists Avoid Ethics Punishment. The AP (9/13, Beamish) reports, "Most of the federal scientists who improperly accepted personal money from drug or biotechnology companies walked away with reprimands or were allowed to retire unscathed." The AP continues, "Only two of the 44 scientists found to have violated rules governing private consulting deals are being investigated for possible criminal activity, and they remain on the government payroll, the National Institutes of Health told The Associated Press this week in the most detailed accounting it has released." The AP adds, "NIH spokesman John Burklow said his agency wanted eight others reviewed for possible crimes, but those cases were rejected by the investigating office at the U.S. Health and Human Services Department. … The two still outstanding - Drs. Trey Sunderland and Thomas Walsh - both committed 'serious misconduct,' so grave that they would be fired if they were civilians, NIH internal ethics reports contend." The AP notes, 'NIH says it has been unable to act against the two because they are part of the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, which provides medical help during disasters. .. Lawmakers plan to push for answers Wednesday at a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing, part of continuing scrutiny into how the agency polices conflicts of interest. Responding to congressional criticism, NIH last year barred federal scientists from the once-common practice of earning lucrative paychecks from private companies."

Medicare Premiums To Increase By Less Than Anticipated. The AP (9/13, Freking) reports, "Most elderly and disabled people on Medicare will see their premiums rise to $93.50 a month next year, a 5.6 percent increase that is much lower than had been anticipated." Officials "had been projecting that premiums would again grow at double-digit rates, but there has been an unexpected slowing in the volume of services and tests that doctors are ordering for their Medicare patients." The AP adds, "The news was not as good for wealthier beneficiaries. For the first time in the program's history, wealthier beneficiaries will pay more for the insurance that covers doctors' visits and outpatient hospital care, known as Medicare Part B."

McClatchy (9/13, Pugh) reports, "Under the new guidelines, seniors who earn $80,000 to $100,000 a year- and married couples with incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 - will see their premiums increase by 10 percent, or roughly 3 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. They'll pay Part B premiums of $106 in 2007. Individuals who earn $100,000 to $150,000 -- and married couples with incomes of $200,000 to $300,000 -- will see their premiums increase by 25 percent, or roughly 8 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. Their 2007 Part B premiums will increase to $124.70."

USA Today (9/13, Appleby, 2.27M) reports Medicare chief Mark McClellan says yesterday, "These income-related premiums will reduce Medicare costs by $7.7 billion over five years and $20 billion over 10. … They are an important step in improving Medicare's sustainability." But "critics of the income-based premiums took issue with McClellan's statement that the income-based premiums will help Medicare's finances." They argue "the additional charges will do little to bolster Medicare's finances and could drive wealthier, healthier seniors out of the program, possibly causing costs to rise faster. Critics also suggest that income levels at which additional payments are required will be gradually reduced, requiring more seniors to make the higher payments."

The New York Times (9/13, Pear, 1.21M) reports that "listing factors that contributed to the new premium, Dr. McClellan reported 'a modest slowdown in physician spending growth'" but "very rapid growth in spending for hospital outpatient services." Kirsten A. Sloan, a health policy analyst at AARP, said, "The standard premium for Part B is less than originally projected, and that's good news. But the premium is artificially low. It assumes a continuation of current law, under which Medicare payments to doctors will be cut 5 percent next year. If Congress decides to prevent that cut, beneficiaries may have to make up the difference by paying higher premiums in 2008."

The Washington Post (9/13, A9, Lee, 748K) notes Democratic Rep. Nita M. Lowey "introduced a bill in April that would repeal the income-based premium increases, but it has not gotten out of a House committee." Medicare officials "said they expect 9,000 people to drop out of the program next year because of the new income-based premiums, and 30,000 to leave by 2010. Overall, that's not a lot, they said."

House Republican Leadership Contests "Subtly" Underway. The Hill (9/13, O'Connor) reports that this summer, Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) "sat down with a handful of Republican colleagues to gauge their support for a potential leadership bid. The talks were very preliminary, a Carter spokeswoman said, but the former judge is hardly alone in considering a run." As Republicans "focus their energy and fundraising efforts on retaining their majority this fall, a handful of ambitious lawmakers are also angling for a promotion within the conference. At least seven chairmanships will open next year if the GOP holds the House, and other members are mulling a challenge of the current leaders." Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) is "expected to challenge current Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) should Pryce triumph in her tough reelection race." But "uncertainty about" the midterm results "has somewhat muted the internal leadership campaigns." Rep. Adam Putnam, "a member of the Republican Steering Committee, the 28-member panel that decides committee slots," said, "It's very subtle." The Hill adds that during a "closed-door meeting last week of the elected leadership in House, Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the GOP campaign chief, told the other leaders that he still expects Republicans to retain their majority in November, a GOP aide familiar with the meeting said earlier this week." Most members "believe House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) control their own fate in the next Congress." If the House "remains in GOP control and Hastert decides to stay for another term, many Hill staffers and lobbyists speculate that he would name Reynolds as leadership chairman, former Rep. Rob Portman's (R-Ohio) old job, in order to give the New York Republican a seat at the table while preventing a two- or three-way race for leader or whip." A loss of House control "could create an opening for a dark horse candidate, such as Republican Study Committee (RSC) Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.), to launch a bid for the leadership."

VA-Funded Study Concludes There Is No "Gulf War Syndrome." Media across the nation report that there is no Gulf War Syndrome, according to an Institute of Medicine study commissioned by VA. Almost all of the coverage emphasizes that although there is no unifying "Gulf War Syndrome," the Institute of Medicine study of studies found that Gulf War veterans nevertheless report diverse health problems. At least 30 broadcast stations offer the same facts as the print reports. Additionally, at least five local TV stations interview local veterans who report suffering from illnesses they term "Gulf War Syndrome."

The Washington Post (9/13, A10, Brown, 748K) reports, "An expert panel reviewing hundreds of studies has concluded there is no single 'Gulf War syndrome' afflicting thousands of veterans of the 1990-91 conflict, although they have suffered vague symptoms at a much higher rate than other veterans. They have also experienced post-traumatic stress disorder and depression two to three times as frequently as other veterans, the panel found. Less certain is a possibly higher risk for the neurological ailment Lou Gehrig's disease, and possibly a rare birth defect in their children." The Post adds, "Previous blue-ribbon panels, including several convened by the IOM, one by the Defense Department and one by the White House under Bill Clinton, reached the same conclusion." For the report, Dr. Lynn Goldman of the Insitute of Mediine "and her colleagues read 850 studies done" of Gulf war veterans, and found "29 percent of Gulf War veterans reported physical complaints arising from several body systems, compared with 16 percent of servicemen and women who were not sent to the gulf. This was not just an American phenomenon."

The AP (9/12, Bridges) reports that VA spokesman Phil Budahn "said the VA would not comment until it had a chance to study the report." The AP ads, "Tuesday's report is the latest in the important series, which the VA will rely on to determine whether Gulf War veterans are eligible for special disability benefits if they are found to suffer from illnesses that can be linked to their service."

Groups Oppose Dudley Nomination To OMB Post. The Washington Post (9/13, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Advocacy groups yesterday assailed Susan E. Dudley, the president's nominee to head up regulatory policy at the Office of Management and Budget, and called on the Senate to reject her nomination. … By custom, presidential nominees remain silent until their confirmation hearing, so the Bush administration fired back at Public Citizen on Dudley's behalf. 'When a fringe group like this one criticizes Susan Dudley, I think it's a good indication that she's actually squarely in the thoughtful mainstream along with most Americans,' said Scott Milburn , press secretary at the OMB. 'She's very well suited to...keep our regulatory process on track.'"

Government Grant Submission System Not Mac-Friendly. The Washington Post (9/13, A15, Weiss, 748K) reports, "Scientists, scholars and others planning to use their Macintosh computers to submit grant proposals to the federal government in the months ahead should be prepared for a rocky, or at least error-message-littered, road ahead. Luckily, Mac users are used to it." Since its "inception several years ago, the government's electronic grant submission system has been compatible only with Windows-based computers. That has forced Mac users to go with paper submissions or use clumsy patchwork programs -- or 'workarounds' -- that government officials have conceded are 'not ideal' and Mac users have called, well, insert your favorite PC expletive here." Earlier this year, "the Department of Health and Human Services -- a central manager of the Grants.gov system -- promised that by November the system would be compatible with Macs, which are popular among scientists and academics. That was based on promises from Northrop Grumman Corp., which has been paid tens of millions of dollars to run Grants.gov for the government." But a "new twist emerged this week when HHS announced that Grumman had lost its bid to win a renewal of its contract and will be moving on as of Nov. 1."

Gallup Poll Finds Bush's Job Approval Rating At 39%. CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Blitzer) reported, "A new Gallup poll…shows 39 percent of Americans approve of the way President Bush is doing his job. Averaged together with two other recent surveys, Mr. Bush gets a 41 percent approval rating. All these polls were conducted before the President's 9/11 anniversary speech to the nation last night."

Dowd Says Cheney Is "Ruining America." Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (9/13, 1.21M), "If Dick Cheney didn't try to hose himself down after his outlandish performance on 'Meet the Press,' he may be so deep in denial he doesn't even know he's ruining America and needs a symbolic moral superwash. … On 'Meet the Press,' Mr. Cheney warned that America cannot let its adversaries 'break our will" and show we 'don't have the stomach for the fight.' … After all the miscalculations and billions wasted, projects screwed up, lives and limbs lost, foreign enemies made, American stature squandered, Taliban strength regained, North Korean bombs and Iran-Iraq alliances built (visiting the American-hating, Holocaust-denying Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad yesterday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq called Iran 'a good friend and brother') Dick Cheney wouldn't do anything differently? … Break out the Wet Wipes, Mr. Cheney. Time for a good scrubbing."

OTHER NEWS:

Falling Oil Prices May Boost Economy, Cool Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, lp, Conkey, 2.03M) reports, "The recent drop in oil prices could provide a welcome and surprising boost to consumer pocketbooks this fall, cushioning the economy from a falloff in home prices and construction while venting an important source of inflation pressure. The easing of energy prices is an unexpected -- and little-noted -- positive amid economic anxiety over falling housing activity, previous energy-price increases and the possibility of recession." The Journal says, "Crude oil was at $77 a barrel as recently as early August. Yesterday, the price of the October crude-oil future contract settled at $63.76, a near six month low, down $1.85 from Monday… ." Moreover, "the average retail price of gasoline has fallen to $2.67 from $3.08 a gallon, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration." The Journal writes, "For now, the price drop's impact on inflation will be as important as its effect on economic growth."

The Washington Times (9/13, Hill, 88K) says, "Oil prices plunged below $64 a barrel yesterday and settled 19 percent below this summer's record highs, bringing a major dose of inflation relief to hard-pressed consumers and the economy." The decline in gas prices has left "an unexpected dividend of spare change jangling in consumers' pockets that is likely to be quickly deployed into spending on other items." The Times reports, "Some analysts say a sea change is occurring in the oil market, and it will not revisit soon the record high of $78.40 set in July by premium crude in New York."

Oil Prices Data Boost Stocks. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, McDonald, 2.03M) reports "investors emboldened by the prospect of lower energy prices and better-than-expected earnings from big Wall Street firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc. looked past reports of a record trade gap and a thwarted terrorist attack in Syria and bought stocks by the bushel."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stock Market rallied today. The Dow was up about 101 points today [to close at 11,1498.09]. The Nasdaq gained 40 points [to close at 2,215.82]. USA Today (9/13, Krantz, 2.27M) says "the Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 13.57 points to 1313.11. The index is up 5.2% this year."

Trade Deficit Hits New Record, But Falling Oil Prices Expected To Drive It Down. The Financial Times (9/13, Pimlott) reports, "The US trade deficit surged to its highest ever level in July as the cost of oil imports rose to a record high and exports fell." But "the swelling deficit, which rose much more than expected, will probably fall back again as oil prices have fallen in recent weeks, analysts said." The Times adds, "About one-third of the increase in the July figure came from higher prices for oil imports. But oil prices have dropped to their lowest levels since March this week, after rising to an all time high in July of $77.03 per barrel. The price is now 15 per cent lower."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Hitt, 2.03M) reports, "Though overwhelmed by surging imports, US exports came in at $119.97 billion in July. That was down 1.1% from June, but still the second-highest monthly total on record."

Administration Seeks To Focus On Economy In Run-Up To Election. Edward Lazear, chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers yesterday said that after years of stagnation, US wage growth will start to catch up with high productivity and economic growth. The Financial Times (9/13, Luce) reports that Lazear "also sought to dispel the increasingly widespread view that the median US employee is suffering from a long-term decline in earnings potential." His speech "is part of a broader administration campaign to focus on the strong US economy in the build-up to critical mid-term congressional elections on November 7. … However, the Bush administration's arguments have been met with growing skepticism among economists who point out that real wages for most Americans are marginally below where they were four years ago, in spite of strong overall growth in gross domestic product."

LATimes Praises Economy's Strength Since 9/11 Attacks. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (9/13, 918K) says that after the 9/11 attacks, Osama bin Laden "boasted that the attacks had "hit hard the American economy at its heart and its core." If they did, the effect was transitory. In all the commemorations and assessments on the anniversary of 9/11, the resilience of the U.S. economy has attracted less notice than it deserves." Following the attacks, Americans "enjoyed five years of strong productivity and corporate profits, a booming real estate market and rising trade volumes." The Times adds, "Another terrorist strike, in the US or abroad, could still do untold damage to the economy. But nowadays economists tend to be less concerned about such a possibility (or unnecessary spending to protect against it) than about high energy costs or a real estate bust. Both would be worrisome, of course. But those kinds of worries are in a whole different category than the fear of a terrorist attack."

NYTimes Says Rising Labor Costs Reflect Growing Income Inequality. An editorial in the New York Times (9/13, 1.21M) says, "Compensation is business's biggest expense, so rising labor costs -- if passed on to consumers -- could certainly push up prices. But so far, there are no clear signs of that happening. Instead, today's rising labor costs seem to reflect a different economic phenomenon: growing income inequality." The Times adds, "When statisticians talk about 'labor costs' and economists -- and politicians -- talk about 'compensation,' they mean all forms of earned income, like wages, salaries, bonuses and stock options, plus benefits, like insurance and pensions. Measured that way, employees don't look too terribly squeezed. But for most workers, increases in wages or salaries, if any, have been steadily eroded by inflation while health insurance, if any, costs more and covers less."

Voters In Six States To Consider Minimum Wage Increases. USA Today (9/13, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports that voters in Colorado, Arizona, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio will consider increases in their states' minimum wage laws in ballot measures November 7. According to USA, "Backing the state campaigns to raise the minimum wage are labor unions, advocacy groups for the working poor — such as the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now and 9to5, the National Association of Working Women — and religious organizations. … Opponents include chambers of commerce and associations representing hotels, restaurants and small businesses."

A separate story in USA Today (9/13, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports that this year's elections "could be a watershed in the nearly 70-year history of the federal minimum wage: For the first time, a majority of states could require higher pay than the federal rate of $5.15 an hour. This year, 10 states have enacted laws mandating a higher minimum than federal law requires. Twenty-three states and the District of Columbia are now above that threshold."

Chafee Wins Hard-Fought Republican Senate Primary In Rhode Island. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Cummings, 2.03M) reports Rhode Island Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee "beat back a very tough primary challenge from Cranston, R.I., Mayor Steve Laffey to run for re-election, an outcome national Republican Party officials believe will give them the best chance of holding the seat in midterm elections." Chafee's victory "was substantially aided by a roughly $1 million infusion of cash from Washington Republican Party committees to run ads and flood mailboxes with fliers criticizing Mr. Laffey, a tough-talking social conservative." It is a strategy "of lavish spending Republicans used earlier this year to hold onto to the House seat of California Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, who pleaded guilty to bribery. That race cost the national party $5 million." Laffey "conceded the race with roughly 70% of the voting reported and trailing 54% to 46%."

USA Today (9/13, Page, 2.27M) reports Chafee's "battles aren't over: He now faces former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination." The race "is rated a toss-up, and Democrats have targeted it as one of the six Republican-held seats they need to pick up to win Senate control."

The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Murray, Goldfarb, 748K) reports the story on the front page, noting Chafee's "victory came amid heavy turnout, after the same Republican establishment that Chafee has so often defied rallied to his side with money and logistical support for a vigorous get-out-the-vote effort. While there is little personal affection for Chafee at the White House, operatives there and in the Republican Party leadership calculated that he is the GOP's best chance of holding the seat in a Democratic-leaning state in November." Although Chafee "escaped the Laffey threat, Democrats believe he compromised his general election chances by waging a negative campaign marked by pointed attack ads and by accepting such high-profile Republican Party help. The senator himself expressed regret last week that the tone of the campaign had turned nasty. But, he pointed out, 'negative ads do work.'"

CQ (9/12, Horrigan) reported the "race forced the national Republican Party to coalesce behind Chafee, who has the least conservative voting record in the Senate among Republicans and has refused to toe the party line on key issues including the war in Iraq and President Bush's nomination of Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court." Chafee "stumbled in the closing days of the campaign, as he disavowed attack ads against his opponent that he said his aides pressed him to air."

The New York Times (9/13, Zernike, 1.21M) reports Chafee's win "dealt the Democrats a big setback in their bid for control of the Senate. The state is crucial to their goal of winning six seats. Polls had shown Mr. Chafee's challenger, Stephen Laffey, running far behind Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination on Tuesday, and the national Republican Party said it would cede hopes of keeping the seat if Mr. Laffey won."

The Washington Times (9/13, Fagan, 88K) reports the battle "between Mr. Chafee and Mr. Laffey was in the spotlight yesterday because national Republicans said it was key to their party's hope of maintaining its Senate majority. They insisted that Mr. Chafee, who has bucked his party on issues such as tax cuts and abortion, has the only shot in this left-leaning state to beat a Democratic challenge and win the general election in November."

Voters Nominate Candidates In Nine States' Primaries. USA Today (9/13, Page, 2.27M) reports voters "from Arizona to Vermont cast ballots in hard-fought primary battles on Tuesday, soundly renominating New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and effectively choosing Adrian Fenty as mayor of the nation's capital." Rep. Ben Cardin "was leading former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic Senate nomination in Maryland. The winner will face Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the Republican Party's best hope for electing an African-American to major statewide office this year." Meanwhile, "a Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday had good news for Democrats hoping to pick up the 15 seats they need to regain control of the House. By 53%-41%, registered voters in a generic ballot test" said "they were inclined to support the Democratic candidate in their district over the Republican."

Spitzer, Clinton Win Easily. The New York Times (9/12, Healy, 1.21M) reports Attorney General Eliot Spitzer "won the Democratic nomination for New York governor tonight, with his party hoping he will lead it to a potentially historic moment this November: a sweep of top statewide offices." Meanwhile, Andrew M. Cuomo "won the Democratic nomination for attorney general, and Senator Hillary Clinton won renomination for a second term in the Senate. In the day's most closely contested major race, Yvette D. Clarke won the primary for a Congressional seat in Brooklyn." Clinton, by "showing strength among a relatively liberal, antiwar primary electorate…demonstrated that her vote for military action in Iraq in 2002 did not damage her political standing as it did with Senator Joseph I. Lieberman." Clinton's "little-known opponent in the New York race, a union organizer named Jonathan Tasini, tried to tap into antiwar sentiments in New York, yet he had little money and did not effectively turn the race into a message-sending moment about Iraq. With 95 percent of the precincts reporting, Mrs. Clinton had 83.2 percent of the votes and Mr. Tasini had 16.8 percent."

WSJournal Says A Vote For Spitzer Is A Vote For The Status Quo. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) editorializes, "Yesterday [Eliot] Spitzer won the Democratic nomination for Governor in a rout, and on the campaign trail he's spent a lot of time talking about ending 'the pay-to-play culture in Albany by making it against the law for those who do business with the state to give gifts to state employees or to donate to candidates for state office.' But it turns out that the Spitzer campaign hasn't been practicing what it preaches. Mr. Spitzer has accepted discounted rides to fund-raisers nationwide on the private jet of Richard Fields, a casino developer whose companies have donated $200,000 to Mr. Spitzer's campaign." While Spitzer has "decided to pay 'all the costs' when chartering flights in the future," the "whole episode calls into question the sincerity of his calls for reform in Albany. Campaign speeches notwithstanding, his behavior suggests that a vote for Mr. Spitzer is a vote for the status quo."

Cardin Projected To Win Maryland Democratic Primary. The Washington Times (9/13, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin "last night was leading the Democratic nomination for a U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, topping former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume in a widely watched contest in which race was a key issue." With 49 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Cardin "had 46 percent of the vote, and Mr. Mfume had 37 percent." In November's general election, Cardin, "a 10-term congressman, would face Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who easily bested nine rivals for the Republican nomination. Mr. Steele received about 85 percent in the Republican primary."

The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Mosk, Wagner, 748K) reports in a front page story that Maryland's Democratic primary voters gave Cardin "a commanding lead over" Mfume "last night in the race to be the party's candidate for U.S. Senate, but chaos at polling sites delayed final results for that and other key races." All morning, "confusion reigned as outraged voters were turned back from voting sites in Montgomery County because an election worker failed to provide key cards needed to make the electronic voting machines functional."

Election Officials' Errors Create Chaotic Primary Vote In Maryland. The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Davenport, Spivak, 748K) reports, "The most basic of human errors threw Maryland's primary election into chaos yesterday: Someone forgot the wallet-size plastic cards needed to operate the voting machines in Montgomery County, frustrating early morning voters who lined up outside polling places and often were turned away without voting." Courts ordered polls "to remain open an extra hour in the county and in Baltimore, where at least two dozen polling places opened late, but it seemed doubtful that the extensions would resolve the confusion."

RNC Plans To Spend $60 Million-Plus On Midterm Elections. The Hill (9/13, Bolton) reports the Republican National Committee (RNC) "will spend its entire bank account, $60 million or more, helping Republicans try to retain control of Congress in the midterm elections." The "looming spending spree appears to have spurred Democratic House leaders to reach agreement over how much the Democratic National Committee (DNC) will help counter this onslaught." It is "an open question whether the deal between the DNC and DCCC will be enough to offset the financial advantage that the RNC cash will give Republican candidates this fall." RNC chairman Ken Mehlman "has put in place a plan to raise money aggressively throughout the fall and has made clear that he will not hold back any money for the 2008 presidential election."

Statehouse Reporters See Frustration, No Anti-GOP Wave. Roll Call (9/13, Jacobson) reports the national polls "are showing high — and in many cases, increasing — levels of voter frustration with the direction of the country, politics as usual and the Republican leadership." But "in Out There's second unscientific poll this year of state capitol reporters from around the country, we find surprisingly few indications that voter anger is translating into a national anti-Republican — or even an anti-incumbent — wave." During August, "Out There sent a survey to a range of members of capitol-beat, a national association for reporters who cover politics and government in the state capitals. Twenty-six reporters in 20 states responded." Though "not a substitute for professional polls," the reporters "generally detect a modest sentiment against Republicans, but not one that inevitably will translate into political gains for Congressional Democrats."

Dean, Emanuel Reach Agreement On GOTV Funds. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Calmes, 2.03M) reports, "Finally, after months of sometimes expletive-laced sparring," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel "seems to be having his moment with Howard Dean. The Democratic Party chairman apparently has agreed to pony up $12 million for get-out-the-vote drives aimed at capturing control of Congress Nov. 7." The funds, "together with the House Democrats' own money and the $40 million that the AFL-CIO has said it will spend to mobilize voters for Democrats in the most hotly contested congressional races, could effectively put the Democrats on par financially with the vaunted Republican 'GOTV' program, for which party Chairman Ken Mehlman has pledged about $40 million. And that would blunt the Republicans' one clear advantage in an otherwise bleak election year for the party in power." But Dean "remains in talks with New York's Sen. Chuck Schumer, Mr. Emanuel's counterpart, over funds for Senate races."

Roll Call (9/13, Whittington) reports Dean "has pledged $12 million to his party's 2006 campaign efforts — with at least $5 million going to House and Senate Democrats — in a move that may help soothe tensions between the national party chief and his Congressional counterparts." Dean "struck a deal with Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) on Tuesday to devote roughly $60,000 to get-out-the-vote efforts in 40 targeted House races." The deal was "brokered by DCCC Executive Director Karin Johanson and DNC Executive Director Tom McMahon. One source familiar with the discussion indicated that initially Dean wanted to seek assurances that Emanuel would stop attacking Dean and his 50-state strategy in return for the financial commitment, but that never materialized." The "massive financial shortfall of the DNC in comparison to the Republican National Committee has been a source of concern for Emanuel and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.)."

The New York Times (9/13, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports Dean ended "a long and cantankerous standoff with House Democratic leaders" by agreeing "to a limited program to finance get-out-the-vote operations this November, party officials said Tuesday." But Dean "remained at loggerheads with Senate Democrats, who continued to insist he provide more money." The committee "said it would provide $12 million to finance turnout operations for candidates running for the House and the Senate, and for state races. Just $2.6 million would go to finance turnout operations in 40 House races, far less than House Democratic leaders had asked for."

The Washington Post (9/13, A5, Balz, 748K) reports Dean said "the national party is making an unprecedented investment in the fall elections, but other Democrats said the $12 million figure is roughly the same as what it spent on House and Senate races in 2002. That year, the DNC spent millions more on gubernatorial races and redistricting and lent the DCCC close to $5 million in the final weeks of a losing campaign."

Many Democrats Feel "Contract" Not Needed To Win House Majority. In a McClatchy commentary (9/13), Steven Thomma says, "If they're still looking to close the deal on November's midterm elections, why haven't the Democrats rolled out their own 2006 version of the Republicans' Contract with America, which was widely credited with helping that party win control of Congress in 1994?" One reason "could be the influence of Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who thinks the contract is overrated." Mellman's "professorial take on 1994 is that the conventional wisdom is wrong, that the contract did not work as advertised" and it "might have cost as many Republican votes as it delivered was that it became a big juicy target. Democrats launched a $2 million ad campaign against it and hammered Republicans who signed on to it." Republicans today "would love to see a Democratic contract so they could line up ads against it." Many Democrats "think there's no need for a contract-like set of bumper-sticker proposals this year. The key to victory in November, they say, is the same force that drove the 1994 elections: anger and disappointment with the president and his party."

New Democrat Coalition To Give $120,000 To Top Challengers. Roll Call (9/13, Kurtz) reports as the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "showcases the candidates in its 'Red to Blue' program tonight in Washington, D.C., members of the New Democrat Coalition will announce today that they are contributing at least $120,000 to the program's recipients." Several "top-flight Democratic challengers and open-seat candidates will be in town tonight as part of House Democrats' 'March to the Majority' events." The NDC "will give $5,000 each to Darcy Burner, who is challenging Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.); Phyllis Busansky, in the race to replace Rep. Mike Bilirakis (R-Fla.); Joe Courtney, challenger to Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.); Tammy Duckworth, the Democrat in Illinois' open 6th district race; Diane Farrell, who is in a rematch with Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.); Gabrielle Giffords, who was expected to win the Democratic primary Tuesday in Arizona's open 8th district; Ron Klein, who is challenging Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.); Lois Murphy, who is in a rematch with Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.); and Ed Perlmutter, the Democrat in Colorado's open 7th district race."

Strategists See 2006 Loss As Possible Boost For 2008. The Hill (9/13, Schor, Kaplan) reports a "growing number of House Republicans are taking to the trail warning swing voters that a Democratic takeover would hand key chairmanships to the party's liberal wing. But some strategists see a silver lining to a GOP loss in November: its White House hopefuls can don the mantle of outsiders." 2008 could "find Republicans turning a Democratic House majority into bogeymen or Democrats continuing to link GOP majorities to the Bush administration." University of Virginia professor Larry Sabato "wondered whether Democrats would find success in a narrow electoral failure." Sabato said, "You can [argue] that Democrats would be much better if they got 217 seats in the House and 49 in the Senate, just enough to make sure nothing was done but not enough to be held accountable. Republicans, by contrast, will benefit almost certainly from a Democratic takeover … because they can not be in charge of everything and can respond that Democrats are causing gridlock."

In a New York Times op-ed (9/13), National Review editor Ramesh Ponnuru says if Democrats re-take the House, "conservatives will find several silver linings in the outcome. It would be worse for conservatives if Republicans actually gained seats. The Congressional wing of the party lost its reformist zeal years ago and has been trying to win elections based on pork and incumbency. An election victory would reward that strategy, leaving the congressmen even less interested in restraining spending, reforming government programs and revamping the tax code. Political incompetence and complacency, sporadic corruption and widespread cynicism: having paid a price for none of it, Republicans would indulge in more of the same." But the "question is whether they will have a reduced majority or no majority. And outright loss might be preferable. A narrower House majority would most likely accomplish even less than the current one has." A straight loss, "on the other hand, would make the Republicans hungrier and sharpen their wits. Freed from the obligation of cobbling together thin majorities for watered-down legislation, Republicans would be able to stand for something attractive."

Mollohan Criticizes Wakim Over Video Poker Payouts. The Hill (9/13, Kaplan) reports Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W. Va.) "faulted Republican state Del. Chris Wakim's ethics in a recent television advertisement alleging that Wakim, a bar owner, illegally paid winnings on video poker machines." The allegations "stem from 1996 when a patron of Wakim's bar, Knotty Pines, in Wheeling, W. Va., sued Wakim after being charged with driving under the influence of alcohol. In testimony from the deposition obtained by The Hill, Wakim's wife, Jeannette, said the bar paid winnings to patrons who gambled on video machines. Under state law, this was illegal." Will Holley, "a spokesman for Wakim, defended the business practice, saying, 'Everybody was doing it.'" The Hill adds Democrats "also raised questions about whether Wakim paid sales tax on revenue earned from gambling machines. Holley said that tax records do not exist because they do not have to be saved for more than three years." Allegations "of ethical misconduct define the race, which is one of the few bright spots for Republicans in an otherwise terrible political climate."

Courtney Ad Targets Simmons For Bush Support. The Hill (9/13, Schor) reports Democratic House challenger Joe Courtney (Conn.) "unveiled his first campaign commercial yesterday, tagging incumbent Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) as 'George Bush's No. 1 supporter' on energy, healthcare and Iraq." The TV spot "underscores Courtney's effort to publicize Simmons' record of votes supporting the White House, which a recent study ranked first in the state delegation."

Bush Strategy Could Hurt Wilson's Bid To Demonstrate Independence. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Rogers, 2.03M) reports that for Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, "proving her independence to the voters of New Mexico's First District gets harder with each passing day of the Iraq war." Polls show Wilson "running neck-and-neck with her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid, New Mexico's attorney general and a proven vote getter. As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, Ms. Wilson is feeling public anger over faulty prewar assumptions and the U.S.'s costs and casualties." For President Bush, the race "poses a two-part test. First is public support for the war." Sen. John McCain, who campaign with Wilson last weekend, said, "The eyes of the nation will be on this race." The Journal adds the second part is "the administration's fall offensive on national security, with which the White House hopes to knock Democrats back on their heels. But unless Mr. Bush calibrates his demands for additional powers from Congress, he risks smothering endangered Republicans just when they need to show some independence." Other Republicans, "such as Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays, are also paying a political price for supporting the president's Iraq policy. But Rep. Wilson's military background, past White House service under the president's father, and position on the Intelligence panel make her unique, and her race largely dominates this Southwest state."

Democrats Make Gains In Illinois Poll Of Party Preference. The Chicago Tribune (9/13, Pearson, 623K) reports the percentage of Illinois voters "who call themselves Democrats is at its highest pre-election level in more than a decade, posing a problem for Republicans trying to win the governor's mansion and key congressional seats, a Tribune/WGN-TV poll shows." The poll "found 43 percent of voters identified themselves as Democrats while a little more than a quarter of the voters identified themselves as Republicans. The 17 percentage point difference ranks among the most polarized partisan spreads in more than 16 years of Tribune surveys taken prior to an election day." The results of the poll "echo surveys taken nationally that show an increase in voters lining up in the Democratic column, a factor attributed to dissatisfaction with the Republican White House and GOP-led Congress on issues ranging from the war in Iraq to economic uncertainties." The findings of the Tribune poll "indicate the potential for trouble in Illinois for Republicans trying to revitalize a political party beset by scandal and infighting." The survey "of 600 registered voters likely to vote Nov. 7 has a margin of error of 4 percentage points."

Lawmakers Seeking Higher Office Racking Up Missed Votes. The Hill (9/13, Kirtley, Ruben) reports Reps. Jim Davis (D-Fla.) and Butch Otter (R-Idaho) "are both running for governor. Davis has missed 152 votes in 2006; Otter has missed 3." They are "among 16 members of the House that are running for a higher office this year. Statewide campaigns require time, money, and a great deal of energy. For some House members, it also leads to a lot of missed votes." The 16 congressmen "have missed an average of 50 floor votes in 2006. Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), who is running for the Senate, has been absent on 113 votes while Rep. Jim Nussle (R-Iowa), who is in a tight race for governor, has missed 110 votes." When such "a significant focus is placed on the campaign for the next office, missed votes can often resurface as political liabilities. In the 2004 presidential election, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and John Edwards (D-N.C.) were consistently criticized for missing votes on the Senate floor in favor of holding campaign events across the nation."

Some Catholics Angered At University's Invitation To Casey. The Washington Times (9/13, Hallow, 88K) reports some Catholic conservatives are "accusing the Catholic University of America of publicly favoring Democrat Bob Casey Jr. over Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania two months before an election that could decide who controls the Senate next year." With the "explicit permission of Catholic University's president, the Rev. David M. O'Connell, Mr. Casey will give the prestigious 38th annual Pope John XXIII Lecture tomorrow at the university's law school, Veryl Miles, the law school's dean, confirmed. Mr. Casey is an alumnus of Catholic." Bob Destro, a professor and former acting dean at the law school, said, "The university is clearly taking sides and has no business doing this in one of the most important elections in the country." The Times adds, "Other prominent people have been barred from formal addresses on the campus because their views differed from Catholic teaching, Mr. Destro and others noted."

Angelides Campaign Source Of Controversial Schwarzenegger Tape. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Vogel, 918K) reports the campaign "of Democratic gubernatorial candidate and state Treasurer Phil Angelides today said it was the source of audiotapes of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that were published last week by The Times." But campaign officials "said a researcher obtained the tapes legally from Schwarzenegger's website." Earlier, Schwarzenegger administration officials "had said the tape was downloaded from a password-protected section of the governor's computer system and thus was unauthorized and 'a breach of one or more security protocols.'" The administration "also said the California Highway Patrol, which is responsible for safeguarding state property, would investigate." Angelides campaign manager Cathy Calfo "said her camp came by the audiotape easily without a password or hacking."

The AP (9/13, Kurtzman) reports Angelides' campaign acknowledged "that it downloaded — and leaked to the media — a recording of a private meeting in which the governor described a Hispanic legislator as having a 'very hot' personality." Calfo said, "No one hacked. They accessed information that was available to the public." Calfo said "she was unhappy that two campaign staffers had passed the audio clip to the Times without her knowledge. Angelides did not know about it, either, she said."

The New York Times (9/13, Steinhauer, 1.21M) reports Calfo "called the Schwarzenegger camp's characterization of the episode 'politically motivated' and 'outrageous' and added, 'We believe these audio files accessed through a public Web site requiring no password are a matter of public record.'" She said "that anyone who received a news release e-mailed by the governor's office in August with an audio file about Hurricane Katrina could have clicked on a link and with a few strikes of the backspace key have been linked to the audio files. Those files, she said, have since been removed from the site." The episode is "perhaps the singular snapshot of the sleepy governor's race, in which Mr. Schwarzenegger has trotted far ahead of Mr. Angelides but once again has found that his biggest liability can be the space between his nose and his chin."

Colorado Official Seeks To Restrict Anonymous Union Contributions. The Washington Times (9/13, Richardson, 88K) reports Colorado Secretary of State Gigi Dennis "is taking on the state's powerful unions over their anonymous donations on behalf of their members to political campaigns." Dennis, "a Republican, ruled last month that small-donor committees, the source of most union contributions, must have permission from contributors before they can use dues money for political campaigns." Dennis also "required such committees to attest that the donations came from U.S. citizens, as mandated by the state constitution. Small-donor committees typically bundle contributions of less than $20, which are not subject to disclosure laws." State Democrats and union leaders "have fired back with a lawsuit that goes before a hearing tomorrow in Denver District Court." But state Republicans, "who have long complained about the lack of transparency in union giving to Democrats, cheered the move as a necessary step in ridding the political system of potentially illegal donations."

Researchers Want To Buy Human Eggs For Stem Cell Research. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Kaplan, 918K) reports that scientists involved in stem cell research are grappling with "a shortage of eggs that they say is crippling their work." According to the Times, "Women routinely provide their eggs to fertility clinic patients, who pay $5,000 to $50,000. But stem cell researchers are forbidden to pay for eggs by ethical guidelines from some of the most influential scientific organizations in the world, including the National Academies, which advises the US government on scientific issues. California, Massachusetts, Canada, South Korea and the European Union all have passed laws barring payments. … But stem cell researchers argue that it is only fair to pay donors because of the time, discomfort and risks involved. They note that research subjects are compensated for their time."

Shelby Indicates Flexibility On Limiting Mortgage Giants' Stock Portfolios. Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby has indicated a new flexibility on the issue of specific limits on the stock portfolios of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Paletta, 2.03M) reports that Shelby's move "could clear the way for congressional passage of legislation toughening the regulation of" the mortgage giants. Shelby said that "as long as the risks posed by the companies' size are addressed, it might not matter if specific portfolio limits are written into law or if this is overseen by a strong new federal regulator."

Wyoming Courts Rust Belt Workers. The New York Times (9/13, Johnson, 1.21M) reports that Wyoming is courting Rust Belt workers, particularly Michigan's auto industry. According to the Times, "Wyoming economic development officials and company representatives are planning their third recruiting trip this year, visiting job fairs next month in Flint, Lansing and Grand Rapids. A billboard depicting a lush Wyoming will go up on the highway outside Flint later this month and be seen by an estimated 65,000 people a day. … So far, about 1,500 Michigan residents have signed up to receive job postings through the Wyoming work force Web site, and at least several hundred, employers and recruiters say, have moved to the state."

Chao Praises American Workers As Strong, Resilient. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao writes in The Hill (9/13) that five years after the 9/11 attacks, "America's economy is strong and growing — thanks to the strength, resiliency and competitiveness of our nation's economy and our workforce. The national unemployment rate (4.7 percent in August) is a full one percent lower than the 5.7 percent average for the decade of the 1990s. … After-tax income, per capita, has gone up by 8.9 percent since the beginning of President George W. Bush's administration." Chao adds, "America's greatest economic strengths are our workforce and an economic system that empowers the individual and creates limitless opportunities to build better lives. … With the right tools and skills, American workers can and will out-compete anyone in the world."

Norquist Says Companies Should Hire Lobbyists Who Share Their Goals. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and founder of the K Street Project, writes in USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) that he created the K Street Project in 1989 "to encourage trade associations and Washington offices of Fortune 500 firms to hire men and women who share their values and goals: low taxes, less spending, free trade -- and to avoid the pressures to hire for 'access.' … My goal is a Washington where labor unions hire big-government, tax-and-spend liberals because that is what they believe in -- regardless of whether the presidency or Congress is Republican or Democrat. And where businesses that want simply to be left alone should hire free-market men and women who understand that low taxes, limited government and an end to runaway labor union and trial lawyer abuses are good for America and good for their employees, customers and stockholders. Hire for principle and sound policy, not access."

USA Today Decries K Street Project's Philosophy. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) says that "one might think that a sense of shame would prompt Congress to clean up the stench, particularly with the elections a mere eight weeks away. Think again. Virtually nothing has changed. Nowhere is this clearer than in an organization called the K Street Project." USA adds that the philosophy behind the K Street Project "says a lobbyist's political ideology and donations are more important than his or her ability to marshal facts on behalf of the client. That kind of thinking explains why Washington is such a mess these days."

WPost Blasts Voting Problems In Montgomery County. The Washington Post (9/13, A16, 748K) editorializes, "Untold numbers of people were turned away from polling places yesterday in Montgomery County. The official responsible for their disenfranchisement called it 'a clerical error.' We call it gross incompetence that strikes at the very heart of our government. More than apologies are in order. … The county Board of Elections has one essential job -- to ensure fair elections -- and yesterday that job wasn't done." The Post adds, "Voters, Democratic and Republican, want one thing -- for their votes to count. The officials charged with that should take a hard look at yesterday's voting in Montgomery, as well as in Baltimore, which also experienced problems, and make sure there is not a repeat on Nov. 7."

NYTimes Praises Harvard Decision To End Early Admissions Plan. The New York Times (9/13,

DOJ_NMG_0062597

1.21M) writes in an editorial, "Harvard did the right thing by abandoning its early admissions program." And "we hope other institutions follow its lead" because early admissions programs are "inevitably unfair" and increase "the frenzy of a college application process that is unnecessarily pressurized."

Islamic Militants Storm US Embassy In Syria.

The AP (9/12, Ghattas) reports, "Syrian guards foiled an attempt by suspected al-Qaida-linked militants to blow up the US Embassy on Tuesday, exchanging fire outside the compound's walls with gunmen who shouted 'God is great' and tried to storm in with automatic weapons and hand grenades. The brazen, midmorning assault in a heavily guarded neighborhood of the capital could highlight the Syrian regime's weakening grip on militants, who have battled Syrian security forces repeatedly in recent years." The attack "left at least 10 civilians and a Chinese diplomat wounded."

McClatchy (9/13, Roumani, Strobel) reports Syria's interior minister, Gen. Bassam Abdul Majid, "told state-run television that the assailants tried to detonate two cars full of explosives next to the embassy. One car exploded, but another one failed to detonate, he said."

The Washington Times (9/13, Kralev, 88K) reports, "Three of the four attackers were killed in a shootout with Syrian police and one was arrested, US and Syrian officials said. … A State Department official said the attacker arrested yesterday was 'providing information,'" but "it was not clear whether US officials would be permitted to question him." The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Murphy, Roumani, 58K) notes "no American citizens were hurt in the assault, though a Syrian guard employed by the embassy was wounded but in stable condition, according to a brief statement by the embassy."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, McIntyre) reported, "According to Syria's Information Ministry, the assault began when heavily-armed gunmen detonated a car bomb near the American embassy and then tried to storm the US compound. They were met there by Syrian security forces which formed the outer line of defense at the embassy. Three attackers and a Syrian guard were killed. A fourth attacker was wounded and taken into custody. … There was quick praise from American officials. Although at the White House, it came with a dose of criticism." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow: "The Syrian police forces did their job and they were professional about it. Now the next step is for Syria to play a constructive role in the war on terror. Stop harboring terrorist groups, stop being an agent in fomenting terror, and work with us to fight against terror, as Libya has done. That's the next step for Syria."

The Financial Times (9/13, Saleh) quotes Snow saying, "Syrian officials came to the aid of the Americans. … The US government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided in going after the attackers. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists." The US, adds the Times, "withdrew its ambassador last year after Damascus was linked to the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, former Lebanese prime minister. Syria's support for the Lebanese Shia group Hizbollah and the Palestinian Islamist movement Hamas have also put it at odds with Washington." USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) also says the State Department "lists Syria as a supporter of terrorists, specifically Hezbollah in Lebanon."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 2, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported that Syria and the US "have had a fairly frosty relationship lately. Especially since the start of the Iraq war with the US accusing Syria of not doing you have no stop al Qaeda and other foreign terrorists from crossing its boarder to fight US forces here. But the Syrians did respond fairly quickly to the attack and the US is hoping that Syria will take a much firmer line from now on." CBS (Axelrod) added, "The White House hasn't said much beyond thanking the Syrian authorities for its response and pointing throughout illustrates the points the President was making in his speech last night from the Oval Office which is that there are many forces in the Arab world that would like to kill Americans."

ABC World News (9/12, lead story, 3:30, Gibson) reported, "The day of remembrance for 9/11 barely ended when terrorists launched another attack on another American target in still another country." ABC (Ross) added, "In Canada, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice offered begrudging thanks to the Syrians." Condoleezza Rice: "We expect the Syrians to carry out their duties. Even if we have very deep differences in the governments." Ross: "There have been 12 attacks on US Embassies since 1998. And the US has gone through all kinds of tests to figure out how to harden the sites. The tests include attempts to make new barriers and walls that the truck bombs can't get through. They've done a lot of work to make that happen. … The US has not met by any means all the standards that were met. They spent a lot less money than was required. And the last embassy will not be conformed until 2010." Gibson: "Eight years later, there's embassies that are not fixed up." Ross: "That's right."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 3, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) said "an obscure Islamist militant group calling itself the Soldiers of Greater Syria claimed responsibility. They're inspired by al Qaeda and they've bombed mostly Syrian government targets in the past, trying to topple Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. The US diplomatic sources were telling NBC News tonight that the fact that this group was able to penetrate such a secure, diplomatic zone suggests more attacks to come."

On the CBS Evening News (9/12, lead story, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M), Rice was shown saying, "I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people and we very much appreciate that." NBC (Roth) added, "That was a rare compliment for a nation accused by America of supporting terrorists, including Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. But Syria says it's fighting terrorism and today's the proof."

On Fox News' Special Report (9/12, Housely), Rice was shown saying, "I want very much to give condolences to those who lost their lives defending the embassy and among them, apparently Syrian security personnel. I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people and we very much appreciate that."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Fam, King, 2.03M) reports, "In a statement, the Syrian Embassy in Washington called the assault 'a heinous terrorist attack by an extremist group.'" But "it also lay the underlying blame on US policies in the Middle East, which the embassy said 'have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-US sentiment.'" The statement "urged Washington to 'take this opportunity to review its policies in the Middle East and start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace' for the region."

The New York Times (9/13, Smith, 1.21M) reports Tom Casey, the State Department's acting spokesman, said yesterday in response to that statement, "I think you have to take a look at who is really responsible for the violence in the region. … The violence is the responsibility of those who do believe that the only response to any questions or concerns is to throw bombs, is to shoot bullets, is to assassinate people." He said "Washington continued to consider Syria a sponsor of terrorism, alluding to its support for Hezbollah and the Palestinian group Hamas, both of which are considered terrorist organizations by the United States and many allies."

The Washington Post (9/13, A11, Roumani, 748K) reports, "In the months following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Syria shared information related to terrorism with the United States, but after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, President Bush blamed Syria for failing to close its border with Iraq to insurgents." The US Embassy compound in Damascus "is in the capital's diplomatic neighborhood, close to the Iraqi, Italian and Chinese embassies. It is surrounded by white walls described variously as eight to 15 feet high, with U.S. Marines providing security inside the compound and Syrian security forces outside." The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Stack, 918K) also reports the story.

US Sounds Skeptical Note On New Palestinian Government. The AP (9/13, Schweid) reports, "The Bush administration expressed worry Tuesday that a Palestinian national unity government now in formation may not be ready to renounce terrorism or accept Israel's right to exist." State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey also "reiterated that unless those conditions are met, the Bush administration would not resume US aid to the Palestinian government." The "skeptical comments" came "a day after the Hamas-led administration and President Mahmoud Abbas' more moderate Fatah Party said they would form a coalition government. In the past half-year international financial sanctions have crippled the Palestinian Authority's ability to pay its 165,000 employees." The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Richter, Ellingwood, 918K) runs a similar report under the headline "US Wary of Palestinian Plan."

Meanwhile, another AP story (9/13, Hadid) reports, "Hamas officials gave Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas the go-ahead Tuesday for negotiations with Israel, a major shift in the militant Islamic group's position as it works to end its international isolation." An Israeli military court, also yesterday, "ordered the release of 19 Hamas officials -- including Cabinet ministers and lawmakers -- from an Israeli prison. The men, arrested by Israel after the June 25 capture of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit by Hamas-linked militants, will remain behind bars for several more days pending an appeal by prosecutors." Israel "said the court decision was not meant to reward Hamas for its moves toward moderation."

Under the headline "More Palestinians Urging An End To Paralyzed Governing Authority," the Washington Post (9/13, Wilson, 748K) says "the unity government platform would commit Hamas to accept past agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization that recognize Israel." It "would mark the first time that Hamas, which does not belong to the PLO and has long opposed the 1993 Oslo peace accords that created the Palestinian Authority, would tacitly accept a two-state solution to the conflict." But "Hamas has so far refused to renounce violence or explicitly recognize the Jewish state -- two of the three conditions set by the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union for a renewal of aid." Israeli "officials indicated Tuesday that Israel would not release hundreds of millions of dollars in frozen tax revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority or support an easing of international sanctions against it unless those terms were met." The result "could doom the new coalition government."

Blair Urges Lifting Of Sanctions. AFP (9/13) reports, "Britain's Tony Blair urged the lifting of economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority, so long as a deal on a cabinet of national unity there meets international conditions." He "made the comments a day after returning from a three-day trip to the Middle East, during which he faced protests over his stance notably during the recent conflict between Israel and Hezbollah militants in Lebanon." Said Blair, "Yesterday's announcement of a government of national unity in Palestine is precisely what I hoped for. … On the basis it is faithful to the conditions spelled out by the Quartet, that is the UN, EU, US and Russia, we should lift the economic sanctions on the Palestinian authority."

Annan Says Israeli Withdrawal From Lebanon "Significant." The AP (9/12, Wadhams) reports, "Israel has made 'significant progress' in the gradual withdrawal of its forces from south Lebanon in the month since the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution to end the conflict there, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Tuesday in a report." The report "said both Israel and the Islamic militant group Hezbollah had mostly complied with the cease-fire that was called for in that resolution, aside from one major raid by Israel on Aug. 19 and several minor violations." Annan, "who recently returned from an 11-day trip to the region, said the process would be finished in the coming weeks. He did not say how many Israeli troops remained in south Lebanon."

More Commentary On Lebanon War. In his column for the New York Times (9/13, 1.21M), Thomas Friedman writes, "Listening to the post-Lebanon-war debate in Israel leaves me wanting to say just one thing to Israelis: Get a grip on. Israel is behaving like it lost the Lebanon war and now needs to tear itself apart, limb by limb, with investigations and new elections. Clearly the Israeli Army's logistics broke down, and clearly it was ill-prepared for a guerrilla war against Hezbollah. And clearly it is a sign of the health of Israel's democracy that Israelis feel free to castigate their leadership." Nevertheless, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "did a better job, under the circumstances, than he is being credited with, and, more important, the situation evolving in south Lebanon now has the potential to offer a whole new model for peacemaking."

Terror Attack Targets Kurdish City In Turkey. The AP (9/12, Harvey) reports, "A bomb struck a predominantly Kurdish city in southeastern Turkey on Tuesday, killing seven people and wounding 17, the local governor's office said." Authorities said "the bomb was made from powerful explosives and was set off by a cell phone timer. It was not immediately known who placed it, and nobody claimed responsibility." AFP (9/13, Bozarslan) says "eight people, among them six children, were killed" in Diyarbakir, "the largest city in Turkey's mainly Kurdish southeast, officials and hospital sources said."

Sarkozy Delivers Pro-US Message During Washington Visit. The Washington Post (9/13, Kessler, 748K) reports French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, "the leading presidential candidate for France's ruling conservative party, swept through Washington yesterday, delivering an unabashedly pro-American speech and landing meetings" with President Bush and Secretary Rice. Sarkozy "covered many of the bases that French politicians hit when they want to laud the United States, such as mentioning Lafayette's role in the American Revolution and citing the French love of blue jeans, hamburgers and American movies. But then he went beyond those standards, proudly noting that his distinctly pro-American viewpoint had earned him 'substantial criticism' in France." Sarkozy said, "I'm not a coward. I'm proud of this friendship, and I proclaim it gladly."

The New York Times (9/13, Sciolino, 1.21M) notes that Sarkozy, "on a four-day trip to the United States…pinned the Legion of Honor on the police commissioner of New York, honored firefighters in Midtown Manhattan for their losses on 9/11 and signed hundreds of copies of his new best-selling book on France's future." He "told Jewish leaders of his love of Israel, American business leaders of his love of free enterprise, and Francophiles of his love of America. He confessed that he loves to read Hemingway and watch movies like 'Miami Vice.'" He "was received by President Bush at the White House (an exceptional event for a mere minister) and by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, on Capitol Hill." Sarkozy declared in a speech before the French-American Foundation in Washington, "My devotion to our relationship with America is well known and has earned me substantial criticism in France. … I'm not a coward. I'm proud of this friendship, and I proclaim it gladly."

The Financial Times (9/13, Dinmore) runs a similar report under the headline "Sarkozy Looks To Closer Ties After Bush Era," in which it says "a bomb scare near the White House on Tuesday delayed a speech by…Sarkozy," but "only served to strengthen his personal pro-American, pro-Israel message while burnishing his presidential credentials overseas." However, "like David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservatives in an address in London a day earlier, Mr Sarkozy was clearly looking towards the post-Bush era, directing his enthusiasm at the American nation and not its current administration." Sarkozy "mentioned President George W. Bush only briefly and France's Jacques Chirac not at all. In fact the interior minister seemed to distance himself from his own president, speaking of French "arrogance" and calling for a new era in transatlantic relations."

Five US Agencies Monitor Cuba In Preparation For Castro Transition. The Miami Herald (9/13, Bachelet, 310K) reports, "Convinced that Fidel Castro will never regain the power he once wielded, the Bush administration has created five interagency working groups to monitor Cuba and carry out U.S. policies." According to U.S. officials "three of the newly created groups are headed by the State Department: diplomatic actions; strategic communications and democratic promotion. Another that coordinated humanitarian aid to Cuba is run by the Commerce Department, and a fifth, on migration issues, is run jointly by the National Security Council and the Department of Homeland Security." The Commission on Assistance to a Free Cuba, co-chaired by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, issued a report in July just before Castro's illness that "recommended more aid to Castro opponents, a diplomatic campaign to offset Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's alleged efforts to prolong communism in Cuba, and stricter enforcement of existing sanctions. It also recommended more coordination between government agencies."

State Denies "Rice-MacKay Innuendoes." The New York Times (9/13, Cooper, 1.21M) writes, "There are perils to being unattached in the stodgy world of diplomacy. Sometimes it has seemed that all" Secretary Rice "needs to do is show up in public with a man, and people start talking." The Times calls Rice the "single, sophisticated American secretary of state," and goes on to say that it "took a two-hour flight to Halifax, Nova Scotia, this week, followed by a 90-minute motorcade north up Highway 102 to Pictou County, for Ms. Rice to find herself linked to someone with similar star appeal: Peter MacKay of Canada, the single, sophisticated foreign minister, routinely named Canada's sexiest M.P. by The Hill Times in Ottawa, and the closest thing to eye candy on the diplomatic circuit." The State Department "has been quick to dump cold water over MacKay-Rice innuendoes. 'No, there were no candles,' Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said in exasperation when reporters asked for further details about a working dinner on Monday when the two sat side by side at the Pictou Lodge Resort."

Disagreement Over North Korea Hangs Over Bush-Roh Summit. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Ramstad, 2.03M) reports that when President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun meet today divisions over how to handle North Korea are expected to "provide an uncomfortable backdrop." According to Yale University professor of East Asian history Michael Auslin the "danger" is that the US and South Korea "aren't preparing for the long-term problem of what to do when the Kim regime ends." Meanwhile, "Bush and Roh are expected to focus mainly on matters on which the U.S. and South Korea are aligned, including the development of a free-trade agreement and plans to shift wartime control of their joint military command to a Korean general from a U.S. one, for the first time in half a century. That shift is likely to occur between 2009 and 2012." Those "issues are controversial in South Korea. Support for free trade divides along political lines, but opposition to Korean control of its military in wartime is broader, arousing fears that it is a step toward the withdrawal of U.S. troops."

The Washington Times (9/13, Sands, 88K) notes that former US ambassador to South Korea Thomas Hubbard "said he expected a 'productive meeting' between Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh, but acknowledged, 'We could do a better job managing the relationship.'" Meanwhile, "South Korean officials said last week that the two leaders may discuss but are unlikely to resolve one of the more ticklish bilateral issues -- a push by Seoul to reclaim operational control in wartime of its own forces."

IMF Says Global Imbalances May Threaten US Dollar. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, McDonald, 2.03M) reports, "The risk of a disorderly decline in the U.S. dollar could increase unless policies are put in place to address global savings-and-investment imbalances, the International Monetary Fund said." Investors are becoming more risk averse and the IMF "said emerging Asian countries should be more ambitious in increasing exchange-rate flexibility, the U.S. should consolidate its fiscal position and Europe and Japan should speed up structural changes." The IMF "noted that foreign holdings of U.S. assets continue to climb, rising to $6.3 trillion by June 2005 from $1.2 trillion in 1994."

Concerns Raised Over Increasing Chinese Exports. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Miller, 2.03M) reports, "The U.S., the European Union and Canada are set to file a joint complaint with the World Trade Organization against China's import tariffs on auto parts." It "marks the first time the Western allies have teamed up to seek a formal investigation by the global trade body in a dispute with the Asian giant." The Journal explains, "China exempts companies with factories in China -- such as General Motors Corp., Volkswagen AG and DaimlerChrysler AG -- from paying the tariff only if they buy at least 40% of their parts from local producers" which violates free-trade rules China pledged to meet when it joined the WTO in 2001. The rule handicaps foreign auto-parts suppliers competing for a share of the four million autos made every year in China."

The Washington Post (9/13, D1, Goodman, Blustein, 748K) notes, "Criticism over China's currency policy has alternately flared and subsided for several years, but the problem is reaching a new and potentially explosive stage as the Chinese export juggernaut moves up the ladder from clothes, toys and televisions to goods such as auto parts." It will be a topic of discussions at the IMF-World Bank meeting this weekend and when Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson visits China next week. While "some economists view the matter as overblown, others say the yuan's exchange rate is so far out of line as to constitute a dangerous distortion in global trade." According to Treasury undersecretary for international affairs Timothy Adams "China needs to do a lot more than just allow the yuan to appreciate. … Paulson's trip will also stress the need for Beijing to shift away from exports toward greater consumer spending. But Congress is pressing for action on the currency, with lawmakers threatening punitive tariffs on Chinese goods."

Profits Seen As Motive Behind Chinese Effort To Control Media. The Washington Post (9/13, A14, Fan, 748K) reports, "Journalism and human rights groups on Tuesday blasted China's efforts to further control the distribution of news and financial information by foreign news agencies, saying revised regulations showed that the government was tightening censorship." Yet "other experts said the impact of the new rules was limited in a country that already bans direct delivery of general news to Chinese media. They said the new rules signaled an attempt by China's state media to grab a piece of the lucrative financial information market."

The New York Times (9/13, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes that what Chinese "autocrats understand is how rich they've gotten since joining the World Trade Organization. These new rules appear, at a minimum, to violate their W.T.O. pledges to liberalize access to financial information. Trade officials and foreign business leaders need to remind Beijing's leaders of those promises. And they need to warn them that a country that keeps a stranglehold on information is not a great place to invest."

Lawyers For Chinese Advocate Protest Sentencing. Beijing-based lawyers Li Jinsong, Zhang Lihui, Li Fangping, Teng Biao And Xu Zhiyong in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) write that their client "Chen Guangcheng, a blind advocate for the rights of Chinese villagers," complain their client was recently sentenced unjustly and without fair representation and claim, "The real criminal suspects in this case are the officials responsible for obstructing justice and undermining the country's legal reform. These local officials could hardly have acted with such contempt and disregard for the law unless they had been given the green light by authorities higher up in the government. Nonetheless, in appealing Mr. Chen's case to a higher court, we will act on the assumption that the country's legal system can, without official interference, deliver a fair verdict and remedy wrongs. This may prove to be too optimistic. But we can only find out by fighting for justice, case by case, one client at a time."

Blair Receives Hostile Reception From British Labor Unions. The AP (9/12, Gardiner) reports, "Tony Blair received a tense farewell Tuesday in his last address…to the annual gathering of Britain's labor unions, with more than a dozen activists walking out as he began speaking to protest his pro-business stance and aggressive foreign policy." The AP continues, "Many others booed and hissed as he mentioned controversial topics such as Iraq. Blair snapped back at some of the hecklers and joked with others, frequently referring to his fraught history with the unions, traditionally an important part of his governing Labour Party's base but now disgruntled by its centrism."

The Financial Times (9/13, Adams, Taylor) reports that in his speech Blair "warned of the need to meet the challenges posed by globalisation, terrorism and migration. He defended Britain's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan." In the face of some in the audience waving "banners saying 'Blair Out', 'Go Now' and 'Troops Out', Mr Blair came close to losing his cool." Blair "said angrily: 'We should be proud of what we are doing to support democrats in Iraq and are proud of it.'"

Brown May Not Support Bush Foreign Policy As Ardently As Blair. Times Literary Supplement editor Peter Stothard in an op-ed describing the internal political bickering between supporters of Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chancellor Gordon Brown in the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) notes that Blair's with Brown in 1994 allowing Brown control over domestic policy "forced" Blair "more to the challenges of foreign affairs. Mr. Blair, a natural idealist, as rhetorical and risk-taking as the chancellor is pragmatic, laconic and cautious, was allowed an unusual freedom to follow those fundamental instincts, which he shared with the president, towards terrorism and Iraq." In contrast, Brown "would never have expressed the Bush doctrine with the passion that Mr. Blair deployed."

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) in an editorial writes that while "he has never outlined his views on Iraq or terrorism, Mr. Brown will not bring the same passion and moral suasion as Mr. Blair did to his foreign policy." After the 9/11 attacks Blair "eloquently explained that Islamic terrorism posed the gravest threat to free society today." Meanwhile, the Journal criticizes new Tory leader David Cameron who faulted US foreign policy and "wants a 'a new emphasis on multilateralism' where the U.N. 'confers the ultimate legitimacy.' If these are the new Tories, we'll take the French." In contrast, on the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks Former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher "urged Britain and the U.S. to stand firm against "Islamist fanatics who hate our beliefs, our liberties and our citizens.'" Her "remarks were interpreted as a rebuke to the new Tories" and "echoed so well Mr. Blair's views. For in reality, this Prime Minister is her worthy heir. His Labour party could never forgive him for that. History will be kinder."

Gates Launches Long-Term Effort To Solve Hunger In Africa. The Washington Post (9/13, A1, De Young, 748K) in a front page article reports that in an effort to seek a long-term solution for hunger in Africa the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and the Rockefeller Foundation launched "a new development initiative for sub-Saharan Africa that they said would revolutionize food production and reduce hunger and poverty for tens of millions of people." It will be based on "the Rockefeller-pioneered 'green revolution' that transformed farming methods and staved off widespread famine in much of the developing world nearly a half-century ago" and "is the first Gates venture into poverty and development after years of focusing largely on global health and education. The effort follows a doubling of the foundation's $30 billion endowment." The Post notes, "The Bush administration has increased U.S. aid to Africa significantly over the past five years, though much of it consists of food shipments and military assistance."

At Least 51 Killed In Yemen Stampede. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Dozens of people were killed in a stampede…in Yemen as the country's President wrapped up a political rally at a sports stadium. People still trying to enter were trampled by the crowds who were exiting. At least 51 people were crushed, hundreds of others injured."

Today's Events In Washington 44

DOJ_NMG_0062611

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney, Bolten Lobby Lawmakers On Anti-Terrorism Measures. The AP (9/12, Flaherty) reports, "President Bush dispatched the vice president and top aides to the Capitol on Tuesday to try to break an election-season deadlock with Republicans over the surveillance and prosecution of terrorism suspects." But "officials met stiff resistance from senators and House leaders who say they refuse to give the White House a blank check over the war on terror. The standoff raised questions about whether the president could unite Republicans on his anti-terror agenda before November's midterm elections."

The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Babinngton, 748K) says Cheney "urged Republican senators yesterday not to be too restrictive in setting legal limits on CIA interrogations of enemy combatants, the largest remaining barrier to an agreement between Congress and the White House on legislation that would also set new rules for special military trials for terrorist suspects." Cheney and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten "met for an hour with GOP senators in hopes of narrowing their differences over proposed legislation governing the treatment, questioning and prosecution of suspected terrorists and enemy combatants, such as those held at the US military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba."

Deal May Be Near On Detainee Trials. The New York Times (9/13, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "The leading Senate Republicans negotiating over proposed legislation to bring terror suspects to trial said Tuesday that they were close to a compromise on a main dispute with the White House: whether suspects had the right to see all the evidence used against them." But "the Senate Republicans warned that they would not go along with a White House proposal to redefine the provision of the Geneva Conventions that broadly guarantees humane treatment of detainees."

The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Babinngton, 748K) reports "key senators said they had made progress on several fronts, including the use of secret information against defendants and guidelines for handling allegedly coerced statements. The biggest sticking point, they said, was how narrowly to define practices that might subject CIA interrogators or others to charges of committing war crimes. That 'is still the area we are farthest apart on,' Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters." Sen. Lindsey O. Graham "said he and others are pressing the administration to accept a list of practices that would be considered illegal, bringing greater specificity to current language that bars 'grave breaches' of the Geneva Conventions, the treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war." White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said, "We're having an ongoing conversation with the Congress on all of the issues, and we're committed to reaching a resolution so that they can take the next legislative step."

Levin Continues To Block Wainstein Nomination Over FBI Guantanamo Documents. The Washington Post (9/13, B2, Cauvin, 748K) reports, "Six months after President Bush chose him to lead a new anti-terrorism arm of the Justice Department, Kenneth L. Wainstein is still U.S. attorney for the District -- his nomination stalled by squabbling in the Senate." Sen. Carl Levin "has blocked a vote because the Justice Department has not turned over to him several FBI documents that are connected to the abuse of detainees" at Guantanamo, "papers that would have passed through Wainstein's office when he was at the FBI. The delay creates uncertainty not only at the Justice Department but also at the U.S. attorney's office, which Wainstein has led since May 2004. The office, which handles federal and local cases, is the largest U.S. attorney's office in the nation." The Post notes, "Wainstein was a top aide to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III from 2002 to 2004, serving first as general counsel and then as the agency's chief of staff. In each job, he played a key role in the bureau's restructuring to focus more heavily on terrorism cases," but DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse "said the documents that Levin is seeking have nothing to do with Wainstein's qualifications for the assistant attorney general job."

US Officials Could Be Vulnerable To Prosecution Over Detainees. Time (9/13, Calabresi) reports, "On paper, at least, White House officials and CIA officers could be vulnerable to prosecution for past or future use of illegal methods of interrogation — unless Congress changes the law." Time continues, "The threat of prosecution comes not from some left-wing activists or even the House Democrats, but from the highest court in the country. In his concurring opinion in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case last summer, Justice Anthony Kennedy said that the administration had to live within the Geneva Conventions. 'Violations [of the Geneva Conventions] are considered "war crimes," punishable as federal offenses, when committed by or against United States nationals and military personnel,' he wrote. And for emphasis, Kennedy pointed to paragraph 2441 of the U.S. code, which lays out the penalties for those violations, including life imprisonment and the death penalty." Time adds, "It's hard to see how the methods the administration authorized for use against some of their detainees could not have violated the Geneva conventions. Common article 3 of the conventions prevents any 'outrages on the personal dignity' of detainees. Among the highlights of the administration's approved techniques — waterboarding, wherein a prisoner is made to believe he is drowning; intimidation using dogs; stripping of prisoners; and so on. … When the key swing vote on the Supreme Court goes out of his way to say you are breaking the law, and enumerates the penalties you face, you pay attention. … But just how much danger is the White House really in? It is rare for political leaders to be prosecuted for genuine attempts to protect the public, and few question the motives behind the extreme interrogation methods, even if they strongly disagree with them. More to the point, Graham, Warner and McCain have larded their bill with protections from prosecution for anything but 'grave breaches' of the conventions, which they believe should be adequate to protect the White House and CIA."

LATimes Says Bush Should Spell Out "Alternative Methods" For Interrogating Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, 918K) editorializes, "'The United States does not torture,' President Bush said last week. It can, however, make use of what he euphemistically called 'an alternative set of procedures' for eliciting information from prisoners suspected of being terrorists. The difference between torture and these 'alternative procedures' seems to be who's conducting the interrogation and where it takes place." The Times adds that as Congress writes legislation governing the treatment of detainees, it should "force the President to spell out what he means by alternative methods. And Congress should allow detainees who claim those methods violate their rights under the Geneva Convention to have their day in court."

House Leaders "Temper" Bill's Restrictions On Wiretapping Program. The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Weisman, 748K) reports, "House leaders moved yesterday to temper many of the controls that a bill headed toward rapid passage would have imposed on the Bush administration's program for wiretapping terrorism suspects without court approval." The bill, set for Judiciary Committee consideration today, "would have forced the administration to seek a warrant for surveillance within 60 days and bolstered consultations with Congress on the program." But "last-minute changes pushed by senior Republicans may allow warrantless surveillance to largely continue without those controls. Instead, House Republican leaders brought their bill in line with legislation agreed to by the White House and the Senate, which would allow but not require the administration to submit the program to a secret court for a constitutional review." The Post adds, "Republican leaders, in the midst of an increasingly angry attack on Democrats over defense matters, made it clear that they will not challenge President Bush's authority in matters of national security as they challenge their opponents' commitment to fighting terrorism." The move "put House GOP leaders at odds with some Republican moderates and civil libertarians in the House and the Senate."

Democrats Say NSA Played Politics In Support Of Program. The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Pincus, 748K) reports, "Democrats on the Senate intelligence committee are complaining that the National Security Agency has played politics in support of the secret program to intercept phone calls between alleged terrorists in the United States and abroad." On July 27, "shortly after most members of the committee were briefed on the controversial surveillance program, the NSA supplied the panel's chairman, Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), with 'a set of administration approved, unclassified talking points for the members to use,' as described in the document." The Post adds, "Among the talking points were 'subjective statements that appear intended to advance a particular policy view and present certain facts in the best possible light,' Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said in a letter to the NSA director. Rockefeller "and six Democrats on the panel wrote Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the NSA's director, on Aug. 29 that they believed those statements 'appear intended to advocate particular policies rather than provide guidance on classification.'"

Jury Seated For Albany Terrorism Trial. The AP (9/13, Virtanen) reports, "The trial of two Muslims charged with supporting terrorism is to open Wednesday after potential jurors faced questions on their feelings about Islam, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the war in Iraq and whether they could deal fairly with the defendants. A jury of six women and six men was chosen Tuesday to hear the case against the men arrested two years ago in an FBI sting. Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member, are accused of laundering money for an emigre businessman claiming to be a part-time arms dealer. They have pleaded not guilty, their attorneys arguing that full and accurate translations of the undercover tapes will show the men don't support terrorism."

The Albany Times-Union (9/13, Lyons) notes, "More than a dozen FBI agents are expected to testify during the trial, which is the culmination of the most intensive counterterrorism sting in the history of the Albany field office," and "much of the defense's case is expected to center on government translations of dozens of tape-recorded conversations that took place between Hossain, Aref and an FBI informant. The informant, a Pakistani immigrant, agreed to take part in the sting to help settle his own, unrelated criminal charges of unlawful supplying driver's licenses to other immigrants." The Times-Union adds that "part of the FBI's strongest evidence…is an undercover surveillance videotape that shows the informant holding a surface-to-air missile launcher as the men chatted inside the informant's Central Avenue storefront. During the meeting, the informant told Hossain that they would earn money through the sale of the weapons."

Hamas-Funding Probe Was Riddled With Difficulties. McClatchy (9/13) distributes the Chicago Tribune (9/3, Grossman, 623K) story which reported at length on the travails of the investigation of Muhammed Salah, soon to face charges of providing material support to Hamas. The Tribune story was included in the Sept. 5 FBI news briefings. "Given the White House's highly publicized strategy of maintaining a courtroom front in the war on terrorism, the government has bet a lot of chips on its prosecution of Salah and his alleged co-conspirators. Yet there was a point in 2000 when the case appeared to have been dropped. ... The current reversal of that decision epitomizes the Salah case, which besides raising civil libertarians' hackles, is also a saga with more twists and turns than a John le Carre spy novel. It includes enough bureaucratic infighting to send shivers up the spines of citizens who'd like to think of their government as a shield against a repeat of the World Trade Center tragedy." The Tribune noted that at one point, "Relations between FBI agents in Chicago and those assigned to Milwaukee became so hostile, an office had to be rented in Kenosha for a neutral meeting ground," according to former lead investigator Mark Flessner. "An Arabic-speaking FBI agent, Gamal Abdel-Hafiz, refused to wear a wire while tracking a suspect in the probe. 'He said a Muslim doesn't, or couldn't, record another Muslim without him knowing it,' Flessner says. 'It is not an option for an agent to decide how an investigation should be conducted, because of religious or philosophical reasons.'"

Administration Cites Progress Toward Shutting Down Terrorist Fundraising. Bush Administration officials told Congress yesterday that the US has made progress over the last five years in its efforts to shut down avenues for terrorist to raise and move money, but challenges remain. The AP (9/12, Aversa) reported that in testimony before the Senate Banking Committee, Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser "underscored the importance of the United States working closely with international allies to share information. The goal, he said, is to thwart terrorist financiers and improve coordination of this information among agencies. Glaser said authorities must stay ahead of terrorist financiers who not only try to use the traditional banking system to move money but also other methods, including cash couriers, trafficking of drugs, weapons and precious metals and jewels."

Arrests Spark Fears Terrorists Are Training In Rural England. The Washington Post (9/13, A14, Sullivan, Jordan, 748K) reports, "Yassin Mutegombwa, 22, a London resident whose family is from Uganda, was charged in court Tuesday with receiving training for terrorism on British soil, the first person to be charged under a law enacted this year. According to a statement from Scotland Yard, he received weapons training in two rural English locations, including 'at a woodland area'" in southwestern England in late April and early June. The Post adds, "The charges against Mutegombwa illustrate increasing worry in Britain that violent extremists are not only being recruited from the country's large Muslim population but also are being trained here. Officials say some of the training may have taken place at popular paintball fields."

The New York Times (9/12, Adam, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "Residents and employees at two recreation sites that have been cited in court documents as possible terrorist training camps expressed puzzlement on Tuesday, though one person said his resort had attracted police attention before. … The four men who appeared at a magistrates' court in central London on Tuesday were among 14 arrested in the Sept. 1 police raids. The raids were part of a police hunt for terrorist recruiters and trainers and not related to the Aug. 10 security alert surrounding what police called a conspiracy by Islamic radicals to bomb trans-Atlantic airliners."

UK Official Seeks To Put Human Face On Health And Safety Commission. The New York Times (9/13, Lyall, 1.21M) reports, "One of the received wisdoms about British life is that it is full of picayune rules that are meant to prevent injuries and accidents but are in fact patently ridiculous. … So it came as a surprise when Bill Callaghan, who as head of the country's Health and Safety Commission is supposedly responsible for such decisions, appeared on television last month to urge Britons to 'get a life.' … But to Britons who have accepted the notion that no one is allowed to do anything fun anymore, and that it is the government's fault, Mr. Callaghan's message was met with some skepticism." Callaghan's "irritation spurred him to action and to his new campaign to put a reasonable human face on the Health and Safety Commission, whose job is to recommend and oversee Britain's safety regulations."

Muslim Leader Says Coreligionists Can Help Win War On Terror. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 9, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight you'll hear from an Islamic American. There are as many as seven million in this country. About how he believes they can help win the war. Ahmed Younnis is national director of the Muslim Public Affairs Council." Ahmed Younnis: "I was recently in the desert of central Asia on a trek through old Soviet territory when an 80-year-old imam asked me whether Muslims in America are feeling the backlash of 9/11. I realized at that moment…that the story of the American Muslim is a core element of our winning hearts and mind in the international war on terror. Muslims around the world look at how we American Muslims are doing and make judgments about our country. Their biggest question? Can Muslims thrive in a Western society? Can Muslims thrive in the United States of America? The answer is yes. And we can help win the international war on terror if you include us in the fight."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats, White House Feud Over Charge That Bush Speech Politicized 9/11. President Bush's 9/11 speech has resulted in bitter recriminations from Democrats, who charged the President politicized the somber occasion to help GOP candidates. The AP (9/12, Pickler) reports the White House "quarreled with Democrats Tuesday over whether President Bush was trying to win political points by using a Sept. 11 anniversary speech to defend the war in Iraq and his war on terror." Said Tony Snow, "This was not a speech that was designed to single out anybody for partisan reasons, but gave the president's honest reflections and reactions to what has happened since September 11, 2001. … The president decided that yesterday wasn't a day for partisanship." Democrats, "in a campaign to win control of Congress from the president's Republican Party, charged that Bush was using a national day of mourning for partisan gain."

A number of media reports suggest the White House and Republicans on Capitol Hill welcome the controversy, and portray them as intent on using the terror issue to gain the momentum going into the November midterm elections. The New York Times (9/13, Rutenberg, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "Elapsed time between the conclusion of President Bush's speech Monday night on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the first Democratic charge that he had politicized the tragedy: 20 minutes. White House reaction: an appearance of glee. Next steps: to be determined by conditions on the ground." The Times adds, "With the White House having wrapped up the first phase of its all-out effort to gain control of this fall's political narrative by casting the Iraq war as part of an epochal struggle against tyranny, both parties are confronting questions about their tactics as they head into the homestretch of the campaign. Did the Democrats play into Mr. Bush's hands when Senator Edward M. Kennedy said Monday night that the president should have been ashamed of his speech, giving the White House a chance to intensify the national security debate against just the kind of liberal opponent it relishes? Did Mr. Bush overplay his hand by turning what had been billed as a nonpartisan commemoration of the attacks into what his opponents called a political defense of the war?" At the White House, Tony Snow "could hardly disguise his eagerness to go before the cameras to engage the Democrats on turf that Republicans have come to consider their own. He invited reporters who posed questions to him in the morning about Democratic complaints about the speech to ask again at his regular televised briefing, where he said Democrats were politicizing the anniversary and reasserted the White House line that a withdrawal from Iraq would turn it into a terrorist base."

Similarly, Roll Call (9/13, Davis, Billings) says, "With cautious hopes that the political winds may be turning in their favor, Republicans in both chambers are accelerating their election-year offensive this week with fundraising pitches" and "heightened rhetorical attacks on Democrats." A "senior GOP Senate aide" is quoted saying, "Hopefully we're back on the offensive on the issues that have worked for us and that Democrats are traditionally weak on. … We're going to focus on a couple key issues to get traction on and try to ratchet up the momentum.'"

ABC World News (9/12, story 2, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "There's been heated debate in Washington today about 9/11 and the politics of the Iraq war. This all began with the President's speech to the nation last night, marking the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. The White House said the speech would not be political. But then the President, in his remarks, said this." President Bush: "Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pull out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." Democrats "immediately denounced the speech, charging that the President was using a solemn day to rally support for his Iraq policies. Republicans said the President could not avoid talking about Iraq. Well, the argument all spilled out on the floor of Congress today." Sen. Harry Reid: "This was a political move, designed to tap the overwhelming public sentiment to destroy al Qaeda as a way to bolster sagging public opinion support for the war in Iraq. Despite the President's best efforts, the American people can see through this ploy." Analyst George Stephanopoulos said, "Our poll shows that voters who believe that Iraq is part of the war on terror, break in a big way, for the Republicans, 61%, 31%. The voters who think Iraq is not part of the war on terror, tend to vote for the Democrats by a bigger margin, 75% to 16%. This is the core debate of the midterms. The stakes couldn't be higher."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 2, 3:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The White House previewed last night's address as the President's reflection on the nation's pain five years after 9/11. Quickly, however, it became prime time political argument." Bush: "I'm often asked why we're in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks. The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat." Gregory: "And included this warning for voters." Democrats "condemned the White House for what they saw as a speech exploiting 9/11 rather than uniting the country as the President did from Ground Zero five years ago."

Democratic leaders "later released a letter to the television networks demanding equal time to respond to the President's address. Republicans responded to the complaints with an attack, suggesting Democrats are weak on terrorists." GOP Sen. Rick Santorum was shown saying, "If you listen to the Democratic leader, our lesson is, let's continue to ignore them. Let's continue to play politics. Let's put domestic politics ahead of the security of this country." NBC added, "The House Republican leader went even farther, John Boehner said of Democrats, 'I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than they are in protecting the American people.' The White House spokesman later conceded that comment was over the line. Do you think Democrats are more interested in protecting terrorists than the American people?" Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "No." The Hill (9/13, O'Connor) and Roll Call (9/13, Davis, Billings) run stories on Boehner's comments, with Roll Calling adding Republicans are "heightening their offensive on Democrats, with GOP leadership aides coordinating message points and media releases with their rank-and-file members in order to define Pelosi specifically and Democrats in general on national security."

The Washington Times (9/13, Dinan, Hurt, 88K) says "on Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush's speech stiffened the spines of Republicans who have grown weary of defending an unpopular war heading into a tight election season. Yesterday, they were back to skewering Democrats as harshly as ever."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Malveaux) reported, "Of course the question whether or not there was a political component to the speech -- of course there was. We're less than two months away from midterm elections, congressional elections. Everything is arguably political right now." Bush, "in his primetime address, went to the heart of the political debate, a debate that has divided this country and essentially set the stage for the battle over Congress. And that is the justification of the Iraq war. Now, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow today was asked on several briefings about this and he said the President went out of his way not to be partisan. He made a distinction between partisan and political, parsing the speech at times, saying it would be remiss if the President did not talk about the Iraq war. And he categorically rejected this notion that the president was using the occasion of 9/11 to score political points."

Fox News' Special Report (9/12, Garrett) reported, "White House Press Secretary Tony Snow says the President wasn't attacking Democrats who want to leave Iraq, he was merely saying it would turn to a terrorist haven as Afghanistan was before 9/11."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Wallsten, 918K) says "the dispute comes eight weeks before voters are to decide which party will control Congress for Bush's final two years in office, and underscores how each side is vying to make the issue of national security work to its advantage. … The rhetoric escalated after Bush's speech Monday night. " House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "accused Republicans of employing 'cynical tactics,'" and Democrats "pressed their case that the White House had misrepresented the tenor of Bush's speech, causing the broadcast networks to give him a prime-time slot without setting time aside for an opposition response or interviews with Democrats."

In appearances on the cable news programs, Democratic senators criticized the President's speech and what they perceive as a deliberate GOP strategy. Sen. Dick Durbin said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/12), "For the last two weeks, starting with Secretary Rumsfeld in Salt Lake City and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Vice President Cheney last Sunday and the President on many occasions, it is very clear that the Republicans view their vulnerability in the November election to be their policy in Iraq. So they've been very forthright in saying, this is a policy to fight terrorism, and they are fighting that political battle. I was disappointed yesterday. This should have been a day, the fifth anniversary of 9/11 where we set the politics over on the side and really appealed to the American people to remember where we were as a nation five years ago. We were unified. We were nonpartisan. We were determined to fight terrorism. I thought the references, a few of the references the President made were unfortunate when he brought up the issue of Iraq."

Sen. Carl Levin was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/12) if the Senate intelligence report puts to rest the allegation that Saddam Hussein had a relationship with and was cooperating with al Qaeda. Levin said, "It should put it to rest. It's a very strong, thorough, bipartisan report. It analyzes the allegations which were made both before the war, during the war, by the Administration, based on an alleged meeting that -- a report of a meeting that was supposed to have taken place in Prague between the secret service of Iraq and Atta, who is the lead hijacker. The report said that the meeting did not occur. And, yet, you have the Vice President of the United States, just last weekend, saying that we don't know. Well, this report says we do know, and it did not occur."

Bush Says Not Mentioning Iraq Would Have Also Sparked Criticism. The New York Times (9/13, Rutenberg, Hulse, 1.21M) reports that yesterday, "after he met with a group of conservative columnists, National Review Online quoted Mr. Bush as saying that he would have faced loud criticism had he not mentioned Iraq on Monday night, and that his goal was to highlight the stakes in this campaign." However, "even some Republicans had doubts about how much the new national security campaign would help in a climate both sides see as tough. 'I don't think the inside-the-beltway discussion about political tit-for-tat makes any difference in the majority of races around the country,' said Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire."

Bush To Meet With House GOP Leaders Thursday. CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush heads to Capitol Hill on Thursday morning to meet with House Republicans in the lead-up to the fall elections. He is expected to talk about his recent calls for Congress to approve military tribunals for terror suspects and to give him the authority to continue his domestic surveillance program -- both measures facing strong criticisms in Congress, including from some Republicans."

GOP Won't Negotiate With Democrats On 9/11 Resolution Language. The White House Bulletin / US News (9/12) reported, "House Republicans have rejected Democratic opposition to the wording of the annual 9/11 resolution and won't negotiate anymore. Instead they will put the GOP language on the floor" today. "There will be no more negotiations," a senior House Republican leadership aide told US News and the Bulletin. The Bulletin added, "GOP leadership offices have been arguing with Democratic leadership members over including in the resolution an expanded description of government programs Congress has approved to thwart future terrorist attacks. The language is similar to that used in past resolutions, though a bit longer considering the fact that other programs have been OK'd since the last resolution. A copy of the new resolution shown to the Bulletin had a line crossed through four paragraphs listing all programs, indicating Democratic opposition. Both sides are crying politics: The GOP says the Democrats are obsessed with proving that the Republican Congress did nothing to prevent future terrorism and Democrats say that the GOP is going too far by bragging. The result is that Hastert plans to put the GOP written language before the House and dare Democrats to vote against the resolution, something they are unlikely to do."

GOP Said To Be Relying On "Treason Season." In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/13, A2), Dana Milbank says "the majority leader's charge of treachery was no accident. Two months before Election Day, Republicans have revived the technique used with great success in 2002 and 2004: suggesting that the loyal opposition is, well, not so loyal." The "arrival of Treason Season, heralded by the charged address President Bush gave on Monday's 9/11 anniversary, is right on schedule." But the "aid-and-comfort line may not work as well this time, if only because polls show broad disenchantment with Bush and congressional leadership."

Meyerson Says GOP Using Scare Tactics. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (9/13, A17, 748K), "Wasn't it just a couple of years ago that Republicans were boasting that they were the party of ideas? They would privatize the commonwealth and globalize democracy, while Democrats clung to the tattered banner of common security in both economics and national defense. The intellectual energy in America, it seemed, was all on the right. That, as they say, was then. In 2006 the campaigns that the Republicans are waging in their desperate attempt to retain power are so utterly devoid of ideas that it's hard to believe they ever had an idea at all." Meyerson adds, "With fewer than 60 days remaining before the November election, the only two Republican strategies left standing are to scare the public about the Democrats collectively or to slime the Democrats individually. … The scare campaign is simply harder to wage this year than it was in 2002 and 2004, when Bush, Rove and company convinced just enough voters that the Democrats couldn't be trusted to take on the terrorists."

Frist Threatens To Scrap Port Security Bill If Democrats Force Their Provisions. The AP (9/13, Jordan) reports, "Ports security legislation that most senators agree would make the country safer was stuck Tuesday in election-year politics as Republicans threatened to scrap it if Democrats forced in a wide range of provisions. Facing an impasse, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist set a Thursday deadline to vote on the bill that was earlier considered a sure thing." GOP Sen. Ted Stevens said the Democratic plan "will kill the bill," adding, "We have a bipartisan bill to start with. ... All these amendments are just coming out of the sewer right now. There's just too many of them, and they're just nothing but attempts to block this bill." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid "said his plan would also bolster security on trains and buses and at chemical plants, strengthen US intelligence missions overseas and approve all of the 9/11 Commission's recommendations, half of which are still undone."

Chertoff Says Government Cannot Protect Every Possible Target From Terror Attack. The New York Times (9/13, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "Congress and the American public must accept that the government cannot protect every possible target against attack if it wants to avoid fulfilling Al Qaeda's goal of bankrupting the nation, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told a Senate committee Tuesday." Osama bin Laden, Chertoff said, "has made it clear that scaring the United States into an unsustainable spending spree is one of his aims. In a 2004 video, Mr. bin Laden, the Qaeda leader, spoke of 'bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy.'" Said Chertoff, "He understood that one tool he had in waging war against the United States was to drive us crazy, into bankruptcy, trying to defend ourselves against every conceivable threat." Chertoff spoke "at a hearing of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee," where he also said, "We have to be realistic about what we expect and what we do. We do have limits, and we do have choices to make."

Banned Items Said To Be Getting Past Airport Screeners. Under the headline "Newly Banned Items Often Fly Past Airport Screeners," the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Wilber, 748K) reports on its front page that "many people are inadvertently taking banned liquids and gels through security in their pockets and carry-on luggage, according to interviews with several dozen travelers at local airports and with pilots and security officials." Others "admit that they ignore the restrictions, slipping expensive cologne, perfume, lip gloss, lotion and other ointments into their carry-on bags or into their pockets in hopes of sneaking them past security. Some of the items get flagged by screeners, others do not." TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe says the agency has "no way of tracking people who succeed in disobeying the ban, but screeners have caught people trying to sneak items through checkpoints." However, "TSA officials point to a 20 percent increase in checked bags as an indication that most travelers seem to be complying with the rules."

Security Lines Returned To Normal Quickly. Meanwhile, a USA Today (9/13, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) analysis of TSA records has found "that five days after airline passengers were barred from carrying most liquids on airplanes, security lines were routine at almost all of the nation's 80 major airports. … The fast rebound 'gives the TSA wiggle time to test and deploy technology that will deal with liquid explosives,' said aviation-security consultant Douglas Laird. 'The public isn't going crazy.'" USA Today notes that the end of August and September are slow air-travel periods and Orlando International Airport screener Don Thomas "warned, 'If it was holiday time, it would be really bad.'"

Man Subdued After Attempting To Open Cabin Door On Flight To Dulles. The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Weil, 748K) reports a man on a flight from Los Angeles to Dulles "was jumped last night by fellow passengers who helped federal air marshals subdue him" after he allegedly tried to open a cabin door. "The man, who reportedly wore a camouflage jacket and spoke Portuguese, was questioned at Dulles last night by airport police, according to an airport spokeswoman. No motive was readily apparent, but a spokeswoman for the FBI emphasized that the incident was not terrorism-related." Passenger Stephen Lockwood told the Post that there was "a vigorous scuffle" and that the man "took quite a beating" before he was handcuffed by a federal air marshal. "Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration, said that she lacked details of the incident but that she understood two air marshals had subdued the man."

Stone Mulls Film Investigating 9/11 "Conspiracy." The Washington Times (9/13, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that filmmaker Oliver Stone "hinted in Moscow on Monday" that he is considering making a film "investigating the 'conspiracy' around September 11. 'There is a great story in a movie, a conspiracy by a group of people in the American administration who have an agenda and who used 9/11 to further that agenda,' he told reporters in Russia. There could be a 'fascinating project [on] what happened after September 11,' the director said at his packed press conference on the fifth anniversary of the attacks. Mr. Stone accused President Bush of mishandling the fight against Osama bin Laden's terrorists and using the crisis to stoke fear and bolster his own power at home in a way that was 'right out of George Orwell.'"

Attorneys See Homeland Security Practice Growing After 9/11 Attacks. The Legal Times (9/13, Crea) reports, "The attacks of Sept. 11 gave rise to a new world on K Street: the homeland security practice. Born out of the tragedy are scores of lawyers and lobbyists fine-tuning their young practices at some of the top firms in town, such as Van Scoyoc and McKenna Long & Aldridge. … 'It's truly an outgrowth of 9/11, and then again it isn't,' says Joe Whitley, a partner at Alston & Bird and the first general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security. 'So much of what is being packaged as homeland security is a lot of old wine -- old wine and some new wine in a new bottle.'" The Times continues, "The Department of Homeland Security was officially launched in March 2003, dumping 22 legacy agencies with different philosophies and temperaments, including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, United States Customs and Border Protection, the Coast Guard and the Secret Service, under one giant umbrella. The Cabinet-level agency is already on its second secretary, Michael Chertoff. … 'They each have unique cultures that have been utterly changed by being pushed together,' says Hunton & Williams partner Steven Solow, whose homeland security practice primarily involves the area of risk management and integration of security matters with regulatory issues. 'It's obviously a work in progress, which isn't always pretty, but it's what we have and what we have to learn to work through.'" The Times notes, "Many lobbyists say they are motivated to work in this field by a desire to protect and secure the nation. But money is not a bad motivator, either. … And the money is still increasing. … According to the Homeland Security Research Corp. (HSRC), the United States and the international community spent $44 billion on homeland security in 2005. The research firm estimates that by 2015, $174 billion will be dished out globally."

Nagin Pleads For Patience As New Orleans Recovers. As the first 100 days since his reelection passed yesterday, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin made a plea for patience and "perspective" amid continued

impatience over his city's slow recovery from Hurricane Katrina. The New York Times (9/13, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports, "The message Tuesday was mixed, the mayor's advisers recited what they pictured as a litany of progress, even as Mr. Nagin repeatedly reminded the reporters at a news conference in City Hall of the size of the remaining recovery effort, 'a task of epic proportions,' as he put it." Nagin "put forward a dual message Tuesday: while insisting that he is working hard, he also emphasized his trademark laissez-faire approach. It is not he but the 'citizens' who are in the driver's seat in the city's recovery, the mayor said."

USA Today (9/13, Konigsmark, 2.27M) reports that Nagin "said he'll have a comprehensive plan by the end of the year. But he said the city is taking 'the road less traveled' by allowing residents to decide where they want to live. … The Urban Land Institute, which Nagin hired to come up with ideas, recommended last fall that some hard-hit areas be closed to redevelopment. Less than half the population of New Orleans has returned since Katrina flooded 80% of the city for weeks. Shrinking the city's footprint would save money and encourage development on higher ground, the institute said."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Says World Cannot Afford To Exit Afghanistan. The AP (9/12, Gearan) reports Secretary of State Rice "acknowledged 'difficult going' fighting a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, but insisted Tuesday that the world cannot afford to pull out now." As she "thanked Canada for its role as a leader of NATO forces in the country," Rice said, "We owe it to the people of Afghanistan to help them finish the job." The AP adds that Canada's "combat role is unpopular at home, as is the U.S.-led war in Iraq." Opponents of the Afghanistan mission "suggested Rice's visit to Canada was an attempt to persuade Canada to commit more forces. But Rice and her host, Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, said she made no such request." During a news conference with MacKay, "Rice said the United States left too soon after supporting Afghanistan in the 1980s civil war. 'Afghanistan became a failed state' and a haven for terrorism, Rice said. 'We all came to pay for that.'"

AFP (9/13) reports Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher "told journalists in Brussels that it was "probably a little too early" to 'draw any conclusions about the efforts to get more troops.' He highlighted the dangerous situation in Afghanistan, where NATO and Afghan forces are making forays into areas held by Taliban fighters." His comments "came ahead of Wednesday's meeting at NATO's military headquarters in Belgium aimed at drumming up more troops for Afghanistan. The alliance's military chief, US General James Jones, has called for reinforcements of up to 2,500 troops to deal with increasing Taliban attacks."

NATO Countries Rule Out Boosting Contribution To Afghan Force. The Financial Times (9/13) reports, "Nato's plans to provide reinforcements for its hard-pressed troops in Afghanistan suffered a setback on Tuesday, as a series of countries ruled out providing further soldiers and controversy mounted over the alliance's tactics." Officials "conceded that a meeting on Wednesday, intended to obtain pledges for up to 2,500 extra soldiers, was extremely unlikely to meet its target."

Taliban Said To Be Adopting Tactics Of Iraqi Insurgency. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Peterson, 58K) reports, "Among the keys to the Taliban resurgence -- which is sparking lethal violence on a scale unknown here for almost five years -- are crucial lessons drawn from Iraq." Such "keys" include "include suicide attacks, assassinations of government officials, moderate clerics, and civilians, along with guerrilla tactics now in use against Western forces in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, where NATO claims to have killed more than 500 insurgents in 10 days of intense fighting."

Musharraf Says Taliban Insurgents Bigger Danger Than Al Qaeda. USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf "warned the West on Tuesday that Taliban insurgents are a more dangerous terrorist force than al-Qaeda because of their broad support in Afghanistan. 'The center of gravity of terrorism has shifted from al-Qaeda to the Taliban,' he told European Union lawmakers in Brussels. Pakistan is a counterterrorism ally of the EU and United States. Musharraf blamed the West for breeding terrorism in his country by bringing in thousands of mujahedin to fight the Soviet Union in neighboring Afghanistan in the 1980s and then leaving Pakistan to face the militants a decade later. 'We armed the Taliban and sent them in. We did it together,' he said."

WPost Criticizes Musharraf. The Washington Post (9/13, A16, 748K) editorializes that an "enduring favorite of the Bush administration, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Mr. Musharraf, whose country has been the main base for leaders of both al-Qaeda and the Taliban since 2002, last week concluded a peace deal with tribal leaders in North Waziristan, a territory near the border with Afghanistan. The Pakistani strongman agreed to withdraw his army from the area and release prisoners in exchange for promises by militants not to attack the Pakistani army or set up a parallel government." The Post adds, "Why would Mr. Musharraf strike this deal? The simple answer is that his army was defeated in its attempt to eliminate the al-Qaeda sanctuary by force; since launching the campaign in 2003, it had suffered more than 500 killed. … The cost of his decision will be borne by American and NATO troops in Afghanistan, whose commanders already say that the ability of Taliban and al-

Qaeda fighters to retreat to Pakistan greatly complicates the challenge of defeating their escalating attacks. So why did Vice President Cheney call Mr. Musharraf 'a great ally' just days after his separate peace? Administration officials seem more willing to forgive their autocratic friend than they are domestic critics of the war on terrorism."

Maliki Asks Ahmadinejad For Help In Quelling Violence In Iraq. The New York Times (9/13, Wong, Fathi, 1.21M) reports Iraqi PM Nouri Kamal al-Maliki, on his first state visit to Iran, "discussed the security situation in Iraq with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and asked for Mr. Ahmadinejad's support in quelling the violence that threatens to fracture this country." Maliki said at a news conference, "We had a good discussion with Mr. Ahmadinejad. Even in security issues, there is no barrier in the way of cooperation." Ahmadinejad said Iran "will give its assistance to establish complete security in Iraq because Iraq's security is Iran's security.' For Mr. Maliki, the visit was a kind of homecoming, since he had spent a part of his exile years during Saddam Hussein's rule living in Tehran."

Iran Proposes Talks On Nuclear Impasse. The Washington Post (9/13, Anderson, 748K) reports Iran's "confidential response three weeks ago to an international proposal over its nuclear program offered extensive negotiations to resolve the standoff, but only if proceedings against Iran in the UN Security Council were stopped." In a "detailed and sometimes rambling document given to foreign governments, Iran stopped short of rejecting demands to halt its nuclear enrichment program, saying the issue could be resolved in talks." Iran's proposal suggests "ending enrichment should not be a prerequisite to negotiations, as demanded by the United States and other countries." Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "have been in preliminary talks in recent days over Iran's proposals." On Monday, Secretary Rice "suggested that a temporary suspension might be enough to clear the way for formal negotiations."

The AP (9/12, Schweid) reports the Bush Administration "was dismissive Tuesday of Iranian suggestions that it might suspend uranium enrichment for up to two months to set the stage for negotiations over its nuclear program and to head off US sanctions." State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said, "To the best of my knowledge, there has been no Iranian proposal. … There's been no change in the Iranian position."

Meanwhile, says the Financial Times (9/13, Dombey, Smyth, Dinmore), "Europe is poised to compromise on Iran's nuclear programme, in a step that could break the year-long stand-off over Tehran's atomic ambitions." European "diplomats stress that they will require Iran to allow United Nations inspectors to carry out spot-checks on its nuclear facilities to ensure that the Islamic republic has kept its side of the bargain."

Zilmer Says US Has Sufficient Troops For Mission In Anbar. The classified report by Marine Col. Peter Devlin on the situation in Anbar province received more coverage from major print media, which highlighted the Marine commander's definition of the mission in Anbar as training Iraqi forces rather than defeating the insurgency. The New York Times (9/13, Gordon, 1.21M) reports, "The senior Marine commander in Iraq said Tuesday that he had sufficient forces to carry out his mission but that the mission did not include defeating the insurgency." Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said the "force levels are about right" for what he called his "primary mission," namely, "training the Iraqi force" that ultimately will patrol restive Anbar province. The Defense Department "arranged the interview after articles in The Washington Post and The New York Times reported that General Zilmer's senior intelligence officer had submitted a grim assessment about the political and security situation in Iraq." General Zilmer "insisted that the United States was winning the war." The Times says that his comments "contrasted" with those of subordinates in the field, some of whom "recommended" additional forces.

The Washington Post (9/13, Ricks, 748K) plays down any disagreement that Zilmer found with the analysis, reporting that the general said, "I do concur with that assessment" and that he praised the analysis as "frank and candid." The Post quotes several upbeat comments by the general, such as, "I think we are winning this war," and a prediction "that he will have an adequate number [of Iraqi policemen] in the province by next year."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, McDonnell, Barnes, 918K) reports, "The general was called in to rebut reports, first published this week in the Washington Post, that a secret Marine intelligence assessment last month had concluded that the prospects for securing Al Anbar were dim. ... The strikingly frank findings by the top Marine intelligence officer in the region, which have not been released publicly, are said to have unsettled U.S. policymakers and top brass at the Pentagon." The markedly pessimistic article states, "Many Al Anbar residents see U.S. forces as agents of a regime that intends to disenfranchise and marginalize Sunnis while forging alliances with Shiite Iran" and "To some critics, the U.S. effort in Al Anbar and elsewhere in Iraq also has suffered from the unduly optimistic forecasts of American commanders.."

Zilmer Says US "Stifling" Insurgency. The AP (9/12, Burns) reports, "A senior American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that U.S.-led military operations are 'stifling' the insurgency in western Anbar province but are not strong enough to defeat it." Like the Times, the AP observes that

Zilmer defined his "main mission" as training Iraqis rather than defeating the insurgency in Anbar. Zilmer called troop increases helpful "in the short term," saying that the long-term answer was "progress on the economic and political fronts that will undercut support for the insurgency." The AP predicts, "As long as the insurgency rages, it is unlikely that Sunni Arab politicians in Baghdad can win over significant numbers of Sunnis to support the government of national unity." It adds that White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "If the president gets a recommendation from the combatant commanders to send more troops to al-Anbar province, they will get them." USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) carries a shorter version of this AP article.

Kristol, Lowry Urge Bush To Send More Troops To Iraq. On its "In the Loop" column in the Washington Post (9/13, A15, 748K), Al Kamen writes, "Bush 's forceful and, of course, nonpartisan 9/11 commemoration speech Monday night obviously didn't suit some of his critics." But" the address also may have disappointed those conservative supporters who think things aren't going exactly swimmingly in Iraq. For example, early and staunch war backers such as the Weekly Standard's William Kristol and the National Review's Rich Lowry called on Bush yesterday 'to stop the downward slide in Iraq' by putting 'substantially more troops' there. (Lowry was among several conservative journalists who met with Bush later yesterday.) Kristol and Lowry didn't talk numbers, but it shouldn't require that many."

At Least 24 Iraqis Killed. The AP (9/12, Quinn) reports, "Violence killed at least two dozen people across Iraq on Tuesday, including six who died when a car bomb blew up in western Baghdad. The attack also wounded 18 people in Mansour, an upscale neighborhood that has been the scene of repeated bombings and kidnappings." The AP adds, "A group of lawmakers tried Tuesday to take advantage of the unpopularity of U.S. troops among many Shiite and Sunni legislators to seek approval of a resolution setting a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops." The resolution, sponsored by Moqtada al-Sadr's supporters, was "effectively shelved" by being sent to a committee for review.

Iraqi Speaker Says Partition Plan "Dead." The Washington Post (9/13, A11, Paley, Ibrahim, 748K) reports, "The speaker of the Iraqi parliament said Tuesday that a controversial plan to partition the country into three autonomous regions is politically dead." Sunnis "have generally opposed the plan, on grounds that it would leave them only with vast swaths of desert in the country's middle, devoid of the oil reserves in the other regions." Support "began to erode after a vast array of Sunni, Shiite and secular groups boycotted parliament on Sunday to protest the plan. [Speaker] Mashhadani said Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq, had ordered Shiite politicians to back off from the plan in order to prevent bitter infighting."

Saddam Trial Continues. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, McDonnell, 918K) reports, "A Kurdish villager mocked Saddam Hussein in court Tuesday as the man recalled the disappearance of his relatives during a 1980s military campaign in northern Iraq." The witness "congratulated" Hussein "for being in a cage." Several witnesses recounted how "bushes had turned white" and how their relatives were killed or imprisoned. The Times adds, "Elsewhere, the country's communal slaughter persisted amid grisly new finds of bodies."

Soldier Describes "Anguish" Of Turning In Alleged Killers. USA Today (9/13, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports in a 2,414-word story the "anguish" of Pfc. Justin Watt, who eventually told "Army investigators that he suspected soldiers from his own platoon had raped a 14-year-old girl and then killed her and her family." Having endured many comrades' deaths, Watt had to decide: "Put yourself in my shoes ... My roommate's dead. A bunch of my friends are dead. Two of my buddies are being tortured to death. [Suspect Steve] Green is back in the States. He doesn't have to suffer at all. These good men are dead." Watt, who was transferred to another unit, has since received "threats," according to Senator Jon Kyl; the Army claims to be investigating "whether Watt is in danger."

Army Secretary Reveals Combat Death Notification Plan. USA Today/AP (9/13, Lindlaw) reports, "Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey says he is aiming to 'achieve perfection' in a new drive to inform families of soldiers killed in combat about the circumstances of their deaths. In a memo obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, Harvey outlines a far-reaching review he recently initiated of some 2,000 casualty reports from Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere." The memo, addressed to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-CA), "reveals a previously unknown element of the reforms: Commanders in the field must investigate even if the cause of death was apparent." The plan follows "highly publicized" instances in which families got misinformation about their relatives' cause of death, including the friendly-fire shooting of ex-NFL player Pat Tillman. Other problems mentioned include the "heart-rending" case of a soldier who allegedly "was left to bleed to death" by a medic and two soldiers who "were deliberately killed by Iraqi trainees patrolling alongside them."

No-Confidence Vote Against Rumsfeld Would Be "Unprecedented." Roll Call (9/13, Yehle) reports, "Now in their sixth year of complaining about Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Congressional Democrats have found a creative new way to make their case — borrow from Britain" by staging a "vote of no confidence." However, "in Congress, the term would have only a symbolic effect," as opposed to in the UK. In any event, Sen. Harry Reid's resolution "never reached a vote, as the GOP procedurally blocked it from being attached to the Defense appropriations bill."

US Becomes Concerned About Terrorist Havens In "Failed" States. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Dreazen, Shishkin, 2.03M) in a pessimistic, 2,159-word front page article reports, "Concern about extremism seeping out of Iraq underscores a painful irony in the five-year-old war against terrorism: The U.S. and its allies now face the distinct possibility that the same kind of 'failed state' that gave terrorists a haven when the Taliban ruled Afghanistan -- leading to Sept. 11 -- could be forming again, in more than one place." Iraq and Lebanon "are threatening to degenerate" into places "where extremists can thrive," and "Afghanistan itself now appears to be sliding backward so much that it could again become an international terror breeding ground." The US has had to "abandon" plans to withdraw troops from Iraq and "faces a diplomatic cost" as Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Turkey "chart their own courses because they see a possible threat ... from extremists in Iraq."

Ignatius Sees "Young Anger" As Wellspring Of Jihad. In the Washington Post (9/13, 748K), columnist David Ignatius approvingly quotes the book "Understanding Terror Networks," by former CIA case officer Marc Sageman. The latter argues "that we are facing something closer to a cult network than an organized global adversary. Like many cults through history, the Muslim terrorists thrive by channeling and perverting the idealism of young people." Sageman's analysis implies "that the Sunni jihadism of al-Qaeda and its spinoff groups is a generational phenomenon. Unless new grievances spawn new recruits, it will gradually ebb over time. In other words, this is a fire that will gradually burn itself out unless we keep pumping in more oxygen." For example, starting a war with Iran would be "the only sure way to ignite revolutionary zealotry in the younger generation."

DOJ:

DOJ IT Official Discusses Tech Security. Government Computer News (9/13, Jackson) reports, "A key element of the Justice Department's security program is managing vulnerabilities in its IT systems. According to director of IT security Dennis Heretick, when it comes to compliance with the Federal Information Security Management Act, this is even more important than implementing operational controls. … 'Vulnerability management has been the emphasis of our program,' Heretick said. 'That is what FISMA is all about. What are your weaknesses, and what can you do about it?'" GCN continues, "The department started with network and configuration scanning, using tools such as FoundScan from Foundstone Inc. (now a division of McAfee Inc.) and the open-source Nessus scanner, managed by Tenable Network Security Inc. of Columbia, Md. This year the department is expanding its scanning capabilities to assess application security, beginning with database software." GCN adds, "Two Justice offices, the FBI and Office of Justice Programs, already had been using the AppDetective scanner from Application Security Inc. (www.appsecinc.com) of New York. Other offices in the department were making plans to use it, Heretick said. 'We expanded that with an enterprise license' this summer, he said. 'We've started scheduling our training now.' … AppDetective is AppSecInc's flagship product. It is a network-based scanner that can work with other tools such as FoundScan, but it is specialized for identifying and fixing database—rather than network—vulnerabilities. Heretick said he had been aware from the beginning of the need for application-level assessments, but the network and security configurations came first."

Accenture Gets DOJ Debt Collection Contract. Washington Technology (9/13, Gerin) reports, "Accenture Ltd. won a contract potentially worth $54 million from the Justice Department to construct a new, integrated debt collection system." Washington Technology adds, "Under the contract, Accenture of Hamilton, Bermuda, will consolidate multiple legacy systems into an integrated system. The management and technology consulting firm also will operate and maintain the system. … The Justice Department and all of its component agencies, including the U.S. Attorneys Offices, tax and litigation divisions, and the offices of the chief finance officer and CIO, will use the system."

The Washington Business Journal (9/13) reports, "Accenture, which has local offices in D.C. and Reston, says the Justice contract calls for the company to deliver a new integrated debt collection system to the department and all its component organizations, including U.S. attorneys' offices." The Journal adds, "Accenture will also provide operations and maintenance to support the new system, which will help the Justice Department improve its communications and reporting and provide better financial controls."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Resigns Amid Expanding Criminal Probe. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Waldman, Lublin) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. named Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd to succeed its embattled chairman, but the computer maker faced a graver legal threat as California's attorney general said he has enough evidence to bring criminal charges against people at the company." The Journal continues, "Mr. Hurd will succeed Patricia Dunn, H-P's nonexecutive chairman, in mid-January 2007. Her efforts to catch boardroom leakers last year led the Palo Alto, Calif., company to hire a contractor that scrutinized the private phone records of H-P's own directors and nine journalists. … H-P has said those records were improperly obtained by outside investigators through the use of 'pretexting,' or masquerading as the directors and journalists in order to request their records from phone companies. Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn apologized for the company snooping yesterday, though Ms. Dunn reiterated boardroom leaks had been a substantial problem for H-P. … In addition, H-P said George Keyworth, a former presidential science adviser and H-P's longest-serving director, resigned from the board. Mr. Keyworth was identified in Ms. Dunn's probe as a leaker of information to the press." The Journal notes, "A spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation said yesterday an investigation started by the agency on Monday hasn't determined whether anyone in the case violated federal laws. LaRae Quy, a special agent in the FBI's office in San Francisco, said the investigation is focused on how the confidential information was obtained, not on H-P itself. The FBI normally doesn't discuss ongoing investigations but made an exception because there is 'such a national interest,' Ms. Quy said. H-P says it is fully cooperating with all the investigations."

The Washington Post (9/13, D1, Noguchi, Nakashima) reports, "It's unclear how soon charges in the scandal could be filed, but on last night's 'NewsHour With Jim Lehrer' on public television, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said, 'We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard, as well as contractors on the outside.'" The Post adds, "Meanwhile, Congress and federal and state investigators continue to pressure HP about the methods used to obtain those phone records, with calls from lawmakers from both parties to pass legislation, now pending, that would make it a crime to obtain people's phone records by impersonating them. … That follows separate probes by the FBI, a House subcommittee on investigations, the California attorney general and the Federal Communications Commission."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Granelli, Piller) reports, "Criminal charges could be filed as early as next week -- deepening a weeklong corporate spying scandal that has riveted the close-knit technology industry, but has been largely ignored by Wall Street. … Criminal charges against HP employees ratchets up the pressure on the Palo Alto, Calif., company and could threaten the turnaround engineered by Hurd, who was recruited last year from NCR Corp. to revive the storied maker of computers and printers. … It was unclear Tuesday whether Dunn is being targeted by Lockyer, who also said he had sufficient evidence to indict contractors outside the company. Neither HP nor Lockyer has identified the firms that conducted the leak probe, which was carried out earlier this year."

The New York Times (9/13, Darlin, Richtel) reports, "The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, said that after looking into the company's investigative effort, 'we have enough information to indict people inside H.P. and outside.' … For the garage-born company, whose H.P. Way set a standard for corporate behavior in Silicon Valley, the troubles have clouded its image but underscored the resilience of its resurgent business. Even after a week of intense publicity over its upheaval, the company's stock closed at its highest level since 2001." The Times adds, "Hewlett-Packard's investigation now appears to have included active surveillance and the review of videos to see if board members were meeting with reporters, according to people with knowledge of the company's examination of its private detectives' activities. … They also identified a Massachusetts company, Security Outsourcing Solutions, as a Hewlett-Packard contractor hired to find the source of internal leaks. Efforts to reach that company by phone and e-mail were unsuccessful."

USA Today (9/13, Kessler, Hopkins) reports, "The scandal began in 2005, when Hurd ran Ohio-based tech company NCR. Hewlett-Packard's then-CEO, Carly Fiorina, was clashing with her board. Information about it leaked to the press, so she hired a law firm to find the source. … The search was unsuccessful, and Fiorina was ousted in February 2005. Yet the leaks continued." USA adds, "Responsibility for the search passed to Dunn, appointed non-executive chairman after Fiorina left. The former CEO of Barclays Global Investors, who gave up that job to fight a bout with breast cancer, has a reputation for integrity and honesty, says Christian. … Dunn hired a yet-unidentified detective firm and told it to conduct a legal investigation, HP says. But a subcontractor used a controversial technique called 'pretexting' to obtain phone records. Pretexting is when someone contacts a company pretending to be someone else, in order to get that person's confidential records. … It worked, and Keyworth was exposed as the source of a leak to tech website CNet. He was outed during a May 18 board meeting. Dunn asked him to resign. He refused."

The AP (9/13, Robertson) reports, "The pressure on Dunn to step down began rising sharply on Monday when Congress and federal investigators entered the fray surrounding HP's investigation. The FBI, the U.S. Attorney for Northern California and the House Energy and Commerce Committee all joined the probe of the scandal swirling around HP's Board of Directors."

The Financial Times (9/13, Allison, Waters, Nuttall) reports, "News of Mr Hurd's appointment followed two days of emergency meetings by the HP board. It will allay fears that the spying scandal could put Mr Hurd's role as chief executive in jeopardy. … He has led a resurgence at the world's second-biggest computer maker since he took over following the removal of Carly Fiorina as chief executive last year. The leaks included details of discussions to oust her." The San Jose Mercury News (9/13, Carey) and Bloomberg (9/13, Gullo) also report this story.

Boston P-I Firm Tied To HP Probe. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Waldman, Stecklow, Emshwiller) reports, "For the past week, Hewlett-Packard Co. has refused to identify private investigators the company retained to investigate leaks by its board of directors. People familiar with the matter say H-P has told them one of the investigators connected to the case is Ronald R. DeLia, from a small Boston firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. that says it specializes in corporate-security investigations." The Journal continues, "H-P, a Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker, has said that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out its inquiry; that firm then hired a second entity that used so-called 'pretexting' to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists. … People familiar with H-P's leak probe say the company's private investigators also dispatched monitors to attend at least one director's speeches and to see if this board member met with journalists afterward." The Journal adds, "According to its Web site, Security Outsourcing Solutions 'was formed to provide small- to medium-size corporations and institutions with the same level of security currently available only to Fortune 1000 companies.' At one time, it published a newsletter called 'Corporate Homicide: Life in a Global Economy.' In a 1999 edition of the newsletter, Mr. DeLia warned that 'identity theft is becoming a major law-enforcement problem about which consumers can ill afford to become indifferent.' The newsletter said the Internet had made it easier for identity thieves to obtain addresses and Social Security numbers for a fee."

DOJ To Review Policy On Corporate Cooperation. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Burns) reports, "Amid criticism from business and legal groups and even some of its own former officials, the Justice Department is revisiting its policy of rewarding companies that agree to waive certain legal protections in criminal investigations. … But a senior official said any changes that would chill cooperation 'would not be a good thing.'" The Journal continues, "Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that corporations are eager to cooperate with federal prosecutors and expect to be rewarded for doing so, with or without an explicit federal policy to that effect. He later said the Justice Department is open to changes that 'improve the process we have,' but he raised concerns about inhibiting executives from sharing information with prosecutors. … Business and legal groups have been critical of the Justice Department policy, outlined in a 2003 memo on business prosecutions by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue told the panel that the Thompson memo 'emboldened federal prosecutors' to demand that companies and employees forgo rights, including the right to confidential discussions with lawyers, if the company wants credit for cooperating in an investigation." The Journal notes, "American Bar Association President Karen Mathis said the policy has eroded basic constitutional protections and is discouraging firms and individuals from talking to lawyers. The ABA complained in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this spring, and a bipartisan group of 10 former Justice Department officials did the same last week, calling for a revised policy telling prosecutors that waiving attorney-client privilege and work-product protections 'should not be a factor' in determining whether a company has cooperated with the government in an investigation."

The AP (9/13, Yen) reports, "At a Senate hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said the department would take another look at the 2003 policy in light of public criticism. But he added that there were no plans to change the guidelines, which reward companies if they cooperate with prosecutors in investigations such as by handing over confidential documents. … 'We see nothing wrong in asking a corporation to disclose to us the results of their internal investigation to assist us in investigating a corporation's claim of innocence,' McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee. 'Indeed, we believe it is good practice because it conserves public and private resources.'" The AP adds, "An array of business and legal groups such as the American Bar Association as well as former top Justice officials have come out against the policy, saying it coerces companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and deters employees from getting critical legal advice. … 'Lawmakers must intervene and abolish the provisions that rob executives and employees of their right to candid and confidential consultation with their attorneys,' said Tom Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce." The AP notes, "Sens. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both expressed concern that the Justice Department policy was unduly coercive and abrogated a fundamental right. They said prosecutors should be neutral in taking into account waivers of attorney-client privilege when considering charges to ensure fair representation. … McNulty responded that the policy was not coercive because prosecutors are instructed to consider waiver of the privilege as just one factor in determining charges. More critical factors include the degree to which a company CEO is involved in potential wrongdoing, he said."

The New York Times (9/13, Browning) reports, "The Justice Department's guidelines for prosecutors, as outlined in a 2003 document known as the Thompson memorandum, describe nine factors that prosecutors must consider when weighing whether to indict a company for corporate misconduct. Among them are whether a company has demonstrated cooperation with prosecutors by disclosing legal communications to investigators, and whether it has stopped paying legal fees to employees caught up in investigations. … Companies that do not demonstrate cooperation face a greater risk of indictment — which can be a death sentence, as it was for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen in 2002. … Any changes to the guidelines could alter the way prosecutors pursue companies and white-collar defendants." The Times adds, "The guidelines in the Thompson memorandum, Mr. McNulty said, 'are nothing more than a structured recitation of what common sense would lead a prosecutor to consider.' … Nonetheless, he said that amid the recent criticism, 'we are giving thoughtful consideration to everything,' and that 'we'll have new guidance if, and that's the key here, if something should be identified that would improve the process.' He said that the Justice Department would consider making the guidelines nonbinding for prosecutors." The Times notes, "Mr. Specter, the committee chairman, asked if Mr. McNulty would consider President Bush's frequent assertions of executive privilege during the confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. to be an example of noncooperation, in the same vein as companies that do not disclose legal communications. … Mr. McNulty said that he did not."

Paulson Backs Panel Formed To Study Sarbanes-Oxley Law. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson is backing the Committee on Markets Regulation, a 17-member panel of US businessmen and academics formed to study why US capital markets are losing ground to foreign rivals. The Financial Times (9/13, Grant) reports that the group, the second of its kind to be formed since the US Chamber of Commerce launched a similar initiative last year, is "a sign of increasing clamour in the US business community for a re-examination" of the Sarbanes Oxley law, "whose Section 404 internal audit control provisions have been widely criticised as being too onerous. The new committee will be directed by Hal Scott, Nomura Professor at Harvard Law School, and co-chaired by Glenn Hubbard, dean of Columbia Business School, and John Thornton, chairman of the board of the Brookings Institution. It will 'assess the degree to which US public markets are losing ground to foreign and private markets, the causes of this decline, and its impact on the financial industry and the economy.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Norris, 1.21M) reports that Paulson praised the creation of the panel, saying that "the issue of American competitiveness 'is important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me.'" The Times adds, "Among the issues to be considered are whether laws need to be changed to limit both civil and criminal liability for companies, auditors and directors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Reid Presses For Polygamy Task Force In Wake Of Jeffs Arrest. The AP (9/13) reports, "The U.S. Senate's top Democrat called Tuesday for a federal investigation into the activities of polygamists in Western states." The AP continues, "Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that a task force should be formed to look into interstate activities of polygamists. He also asked the Justice Department to help state prosecutors dealing with polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs. … 'For too long, this outrageous activity has been disguised in the mask of religious freedom,' Reid said. 'But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated.'" The AP adds, "Reid, a Mormon, added that Jeffs is part of a sect that broke away from the Mormon Church more than a century ago and has been disavowed by leaders and mainstream members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. … A reporter's call to the Justice Department's after-hours command center was transferred to the department's press office, where there was no answer."

DOJ Cuts Plea Deal With "Girls Gone Wild" Over Age, Identity Documentation. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Muskal) reports, "The California company responsible for the successful 'Girls Gone Wild' series of videos has pleaded guilty to violating a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department announced today." The Times continues, "Mantra Films Inc. of Santa Monica pleaded guilty to charges that it failed to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in sexually explicit films that it produced and distributed. The company also failed to label its DVDs and videotapes as required by federal law, the Justice Department said. … Mantra Films entered its plea agreement today before U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak in Panama City, Fla. A second related company, MRA Holdings LLC, also entered into an agreement." The Times adds, "The companies, founded and owned by Joseph Francis, agreed to pay $2.1 million in fines and restitution. Of that, $1.6 million is to be paid by Mantra and MRA, and $500,000 by Francis. .. . The case is believed to be the first to be filed under a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department said. … 'This case sends an important message about the Justice Department's commitment to protecting children from all forms of sexual exploitation,' Assistant Atty. Gen. Alice S. Fisher said in a statement. 'Today's agreements ensure that "Girls Gone Wild" will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well.' … 'This prosecution makes clear that those who seek to enrich themselves at the expense of our children's innocence in violation of the laws intended to protect them will be held to answer in federal court,' U.S. Atty. Gregory R. Miller of the Northern District of Florida said."

The AP (9/13, Yen) reports, "Separate state charges in Florida alleging that two 17-year-old girls were videotaped by a 'Girls Gone Wild' cameraman in sexual situations remain pending against Mantra and Francis. … An attorney for Mantra, Aaron Dyer, said the company would clean up its record keeping. … The charges involved 'serious record-keeping issues that occurred several years ago,' he said. 'Mantra takes these issues very seriously and has done everything it can to make sure this never occurs again.'"

CNN.com (9/13, Frieden) reports, "The law, which prosecutors call Section 2257 -- is intended to protect minors by requiring producers to create and maintain age and identity records for every performer in sexually explicit movies and other media. … Distributors also must label their tapes and discs with the name of the custodian of the records and their location, prosecutors said."

Broadcasting & Cable (9/13, Eggerton) reports, "In addition to paying the fines, the company has agreed to admit criminal wrongdoing. In addition the charges will be dropped only if the company remains in compliance for the next three years. It has also agreed to allow a government-approved monitor to assure that compliance."

Judge Rejects Motion For New Safavian Trial. The AP (9/13, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal judge declined Tuesday to throw out a conviction or order a new trial for a former Bush administration official convicted of lying about his relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff." David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, "was convicted in June of making false statements and obstruction. It was the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding Abramoff." His attorneys "argued that the charges didn't meet the legal standard for conviction. They also said US District Judge Paul Friedman improperly admitted into evidence e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian. The e-mails discuss two pieces of GSA-controlled property that Abramoff wanted for himself or his lobbying clients." Friedman "rejected that argument, denying the request for a new trial. He said the e-mails were properly admitted and noted that Safavian discussed the e-mails when testifying in his own defense."

NBC News (9/13) reports, "Judge Paul Friedman writes, 'This Court concludes that there are no grounds for granting either defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal on any of the counts for which he was convicted, or his motion for a new trial.' … The trial also provided new details of the lavish golf trip, as well as photos taken on the historic St. Andrews course of Ney with Abramoff and others. Volz, a longtime Ney loyalist who went to work for Abramoff's firm in 2002, pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges. Volz was a star prosecution witness in the Safavian trial." NBC adds, "Volz detailed the Scotland trip as a fete of eating and drinking and telling funny stories on the plane ride overseas. He said playing golf on the fabled Old Course totaled $400 per round. And, as far as he knew, Volz said, none of the public officials on the trip, including Ney and Safavian, ever paid for golf rounds or entertainment in Scotland. Ney has been the subject of a Justice Department investigation, but has not been charged. … Safavian's attorneys had argued that including hundreds of e-mails between him and Abramoff as evidence constituted hearsay that might have prejudiced jurors."

Ohio Fundraiser Sentenced For Funneling Donations To Bush Campaign. The AP (9/13, Seewer) reports, "A federal judge sentenced a GOP fundraiser at the center of an Ohio political scandal to two years and three months in prison Tuesday for funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign." The AP continues, 'Tom Noe, a former Toledo-area rare coin dealer whose large donations made him a powerful political figure, apologized for scheming to give friends money to donate to Bush to fulfill Noe's promise to generate $50,000 at a fundraiser. … 'I recruited others to make contributions to the campaign,' Noe said in court. 'I knew it was wrong to do so. I alone accept responsibility.'" The AP adds, "Noe said he arranged the scheme because 'in 2003 I was pressured by Bush-Cheney officials to become a Pioneer,' a name the campaign gives to people who raise $100,000. … Federal prosecutors say Noe wanted perks such as invitations to the White House and the president's ranch in Texas, and he wanted to impress various state officials. … The money-laundering scheme was the largest prosecuted under the 2002 campaign finance reform law, which set limits on donations, prosecutors said last October."

The Cleveland Plain Dealer (9/13, Caniglia) reports, "Tom Noe's zealous quest to be a Republican kingmaker ended in a cramped courtroom Tuesday, far from the Beltway spotlight he once craved." The Plain Dealer continues, "A federal judge sentenced an apologetic Noe to 27 months in prison and fined him $136,200 for making $45,400 in illegal campaign contributions to President Bush's re-election campaign. Authorities called the case the country's largest fundraising scandal in recent years. … Noe, however, will not go to prison until after his trial next month in Lucas County Common Pleas Court, on unrelated state charges of racketeering and stealing nearly $2.3 million from a $50 million investment in rare coins that he managed for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation. … If convicted in that case, he could receive decades in prison. … 'This was an ego-feeding and a stupid act by Mr. Noe,' said U.S. District Judge David Katz. … 'And I think he realizes that today,' added Katz, who imposed the sentence."

Former House Leaders To File Amicus Brief Supporting Jefferson On FBI Search. Roll Call (9/13, Bresnahan) reports former House Speakers Newt Gingrich and Tom Foley and former House Minority Leader Bob Michel "have notified an appeals court that they will intervene in the legal challenge by Rep. William Jefferson…to the May 20 FBI raid of his Capitol Hill office." Former DC Circuit Chief Judge Abner Mikva "also will file an amicus brief on Jefferson's behalf. In addition, a bipartisan group of former House general counsels, including Charles Tiefer, Stanley Brand, Steven Ross and Thomas Spulak, as well as Congressional scholars Norman Ornstein and Thomas Mann, have notified the appeals court of their intentions to weigh in on the case. Former House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt…was asked to join with his three former colleagues but declined to do so, several sources said." Roll Call notes Gingrich, Foley and Michel and the "Congressional experts will not defend Jefferson…but will argue that the Justice Department overstepped its bounds when it searched Jefferson's office."

Harman Says Intelligence Panel At Impasse On Cunningham Subpoena. The AP (9/13, Werner) reports House Intelligence Committee leaders "are at an impasse over whether to subpoena jailed former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham as part of an investigation into his actions on the committee." Ranking Democrat Jane Harman said "the disagreement threatens to end chances for a bipartisan outcome to the investigation." Harman said, "We've hit a problem, and I hope we can get past it and come up with a joint report. That is my preference, my strong preference, and I don't know if that's possible. It may not be possible." The AP adds Harman "believes the panel's investigation can't be complete without interviewing Cunningham, the San Diego Republican who resigned from Congress last November after admitting taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors." But Chairman Peter Hoekstra "has not agreed." A congressional aide, "speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said Hoekstra wants to hear from Cunningham but doesn't want to issue a subpoena only to have him invoke Fifth Amendment protections and refuse to testify, as his attorney has warned the committee he would do."

Animal Rights Advocates Given Prison Terms Under New Law. The New York Times (9/13, B8, Mansnerus) reports a federal district judge in New Jersey Tuesday "sentenced three people to prison terms of four to six years for their roles in a campaign of threats and harassment against a company that runs an animal testing laboratory." The three were described at their trial as "coordinators of a group dedicated to shutting down" Huntingdon Life Sciences, a British company with a laboratory in New Jersey. The Times notes that the case "has drawn international attention, not only because Huntingdon Life Sciences is the largest contract animal testing laboratory in Europe but also because the convictions were the first under the federal Animal Enterprise Protection Act."

The AP (9/13, DeFalco) reports from Trenton, NJ, "Three animal-rights activists convicted of using their Web site to incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals received prison sentences ranging from four to six years Tuesday." The AP continues, "They were also ordered to pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people they terrorized. All three said they planned to appeal their convictions and requested they receive vegan meals while in prison. … Three other members of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty are awaiting sentencing within the next two weeks." The AP adds, "Along with the organization itself, the six activists were convicted in March of using a Web site to incite threats, harassment and vandalism against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a company that tests drugs and household products on animals. .. . Huntingdon Life Sciences general manger Mike Caulfield said the company 'was grateful that justice was served.' He said as a result of the threats and harassment, the company's health insurer and other firms severed ties with it. … 'It generally made the cost of doing business with us more expensive than our competitors during that time,' he said. … And that was the point, prosecutors said. … 'This was a conspiracy to shut down Huntingdon Life Sciences,' said assistant U.S. Attorney Charles McKenna."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/13, Graham, 399K) reports Kjonaas said before the sentencing, "At this point in my life, I am utterly humbled. I've come here with my mother. This has been a traumatic experience and a learning experience." Outside court "after the hearing, Kjonaas…said a prison term would not deter him from his cause. 'Others have gone through worse things,' he said. 'The history of social-justice movements is filled with people who went to jail. ... I'll be back.'" The Inquirer notes, "The so-called 'SHAC 7' were the first defendants ever charged under a federal law designed to criminalize the stalking, vandalism and other tactics of militant animal-rights organizations," but Lindsay "said that home protests would continue," and "she maintained again that the defendants were legitimate activists who did nothing wrong, and said the sentences only encouraged 'underground' activists who break the law."

Alleged Israeli Mob Enforcer Sentenced For Racketeering. The AP (9/13) reports, "A reputed enforcer for an Israeli crime group was sentenced to more than 10 years in federal prison for racketeering." The AP continues, "Hai Waknine, 35, pleaded guilty in June to using extortion and threats of violence to help an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds. Authorities say the syndicate enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe and around the U.S." The AP adds, "Waknine, an Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, asked for leniency during sentencing Monday. But U.S. District Judge Manuel Real, citing Waknine's extensive criminal history, gave him 13 months in prison beyond the nine years that prosecutors recommended. … Prosecutors alleged that Waknine kidnapped debtors, aimed handguns at them and threatened their families to make them pay up. … 'That was Waknine's role, a shakedown collections guy,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas P. Sleisenger. 'There are a lot of people in the Israeli community who will sleep better tonight because he is behind bars.'"

Boston SAC Says FBI Big Dig Probe Is "High Priority." The Boston Herald (9/13, Ross, 203K) reports, "The federal investigation into the $15 billion Big Dig has mushroomed into a 'high priorty' public corruption probe focused on project financing and whether officials ignored requirements to conduct crucial inspections, Boston's FBI chief said yesterday. 'We've got a lot of agents assigned to it and there are several avenues to the case,' said Ken Kaiser, special agent in charge of the Boston FBI. 'Basically it's looked at as a public corruption investigation, which is the highest criminal priority we have.' … Kaiser said top FBI officials in Washington are monitoring the investigation and have pledged additional resources if necessary." The Herald adds, "Asked whether the probe reaches beyond contractors to public officials, Kaiser replied, 'If I would tell you that out of a $15 billion project we're not looking into other areas, I'd be lying,' he said. 'I mean, the money went someplace.'"

Vigil Retrial Jurors See FBI Tapes Of Alleged Bribery Payments. The AP (9/13, Korte) reports, "Jurors on Tuesday watched and listened to FBI videotapes showing California investment adviser Kent Nelson handing over thousands of dollars in cash to former state Treasurer Robert Vigil. … The videos and tape-recorded telephone conversations -- some of them also were played for the jury -- are among the government's strongest evidence against Vigil." FBI Special Agent Marcus McCaskill testified "that Vigil approved $2.5 billion in flexible repurchase agreements during his term as treasurer from 2003-2005, leading to $1.8 million in fees for Nelson and other investment advisers."

Peter Gotti Testifies He Was Not Brother's Gambino Go-Between. Newsday (9/13, DeStefano) reports, "John A. Gotti's younger brother took the witness stand Tuesday in Manhattan federal court and said he never collected any extortion cash or passed any messages to others on behalf of his sibling. Peter Gotti said that, despite a testy relationship over the years with his brother…he still kept in touch in the late 1990s and early part of this decade while John…was under house arrest and later serving a federal prison sentence." Newsday adds, "Even under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Peter Gotti denied ever collecting money on his brother's behalf." Hou also "brought up a taped conversation Peter Gotti had with his brother at Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York talking about the Colombo crime family infighting of the 1990s. Hou was apparently using the conversation to cast doubt on Peter Gotti's claim that he never talked about mob business. But Peter Gotti pointed out that the conversation centered on a column that had appeared on the Web site Ganglandnews.com."

Meanwhile, the New York Daily News (9/13, Zambito, 729K) reports John Gotti "invested $20,000 into a failed hip-hop magazine that would have targeted prisoners by dispensing free legal advice beside photos of rapper babes. But the Hottie Publishing venture never took off and Gotti ended up losing his dough, Gotti pal Steve Dobies told jurors yesterday at Gotti's racketeering trial in Manhattan Federal Court. … Dobies was called by defense attorneys to counter prosecution claims that he regularly visited Gotti at the federal prison so he could relay Mafia messages back to the street. Gotti was serving a nearly six-year prison hitch after pleading guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges and renouncing his ties to the mob."

Former Bank President Pleads Guilty In Arizona Ponzi Scheme. The Arizona Republic (9/10) reported, "The former president of a private bank in Arizona has pleaded guilty in a Ponzi scheme that cost Native American depositors millions of dollars." Edward James Driving Hawk Sr. of Chandler "admitted mail and wire fraud in a conspiracy with others through a company known as U.S. Reservation Bank and Trust, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. … An indictment says the company raised as much as $67 million in unsecured investments, and Driving Hawk diverted an estimated $4 million to himself and his family during the two years of operation." The AP (9/10) noted, "He faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he's sentenced November 13th."

Florida Men Indicted For Medicare Fraud Using Stolen SSNs. The Naples (FL) Daily News (9/9, Freeman) reported, "A Naples man and his cousin who worked at Cleveland Clinic in Weston were indicted Friday on charges they stole personal information of more than 1,100 patients from the former Cleveland Clinic in Naples, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami. … Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, registered as an owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, and Isis Machado, 22, of Miami Lakes, were indicted on charges they stole patient information for fraudulent purposes." Machado allegedly stole the information and sold it "to Ferrer, who used the stolen information in connection with the submission of about $2.8 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the indictment. The pair could face 30 years in prison and more than $1 million in fines if convicted as charged." The Miami Herald (9/9, Dorschner, 310K) noted FBI Miami SAC Jonathan Solomon said, "We expect healthcare employees to keep our personal information confidential and secure. Criminals who commit healthcare fraud steal from all of us as U.S. taxpayers and, in the end, make medical care more expensive for all of us."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/9, Diaz, 265K) reported, "They are also charged with fraud in connection with computers and violations related to the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, or HIPAA, which forbids the unauthorized release of private patient information. 'Medical files have some of our most private information,' said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. 'Each of us rightly trusts that our health-care providers will keep them confidential.'" The Lakeland Ledger (9/10) and AP (9/9) also reported on the indictments.

Pennsylvania Man Pleads Guilty To Copyright Infringement. IDG News Service (9/13, Gross) reports, "An Erie, Pennsylvania, man involved in a BitTorrent peer-to-peer network has pleaded guilty to copyright infringement and faces up to five years in prison and a US$250,000 fine, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said. Scott R. McCausland, 24, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement in violation of the Family Entertainment Copyright Act, the DOJ announced Tuesday." IDG notes, "McCausland's conviction is the third in a series of convictions arising from Operation D-Elite, a federal crackdown against the first providers of pirated works to the Elite Torrents network. … U.S. federal agents shut down the Elite Torrents network on May 25, 2005, seizing its main server and replacing its log-in Web page with the notice: 'This site has been permanently shut down by the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.'"

Sweep Nets 18 Members Of Los Angeles Gang. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Winton) reports, "Federal prosecutors indicted 18 members of the 18th Street gang, including one imprisoned leader of the Mexican Mafia, on racketeering, conspiracy and narcotics charges for a scheme where they allegedly would sell streets in the Wilshire, Koreatown and Pico Union areas to drug dealers for weekly and monthly fees." The Times continues, "The criminal organization, prosecutors allege, was run by Ruben 'Night Owl' Castro, a Mexican Mafia boss and leader of the 18th Street gang, from his federal prison cell with the help of his girlfriend. In 1997, Castro was convicted in the first federal Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) case against a gang." The Times adds, "In a sweep across Southern California this morning, federal and local law enforcement personnel arrested 10 members of two powerful cliques within the 18th Street gang known as the Hoover Locos and the Shatto Park Locos. Prosecutors allege that the 18th Street cliques in those areas answered to Castro and its shot callers collected so-called 'tax' or 'rent' from drug dealers for the right to sell narcotics on a street with a guarantee of protection from the 18th Street gang enforcers. … 'It is a form of old-fashioned organized crime. Drug dealers would buy a street, say a section of Alvarado from 3rd to 4th street,' said Bruce Riordan, assistant U.S. attorney." The Times notes, "Castro was housed in a Colorado federal prison during the time he allegedly oversaw the organization dubbed the 'Ruben Castro organization' by prosecutors. Authorities admitted that even one of the toughest prison systems did not stop Castro from operating his criminal business. 'No matter what we do, some people intent on committing crimes will do it,' said George S. Cardona, chief assistant U.S. attorney."

Judge Strikes Missouri Execution Procedure. The New York Times (9/13, Davey) reports, "A judge ruled that (Missouri's) newest protocol for execution by lethal injection is an improvement, but still falls short of providing constitutional protections." The Times continues, "Ordering the state to revise its rules again, the judge, Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. of Federal District Court, said that a doctor who had long mixed the drugs used in executions should no longer 'participate in any manner, at any level, in the State of Missouri's lethal injection process.'" The Times adds, "The doctor, identified in court documents only as John Doe I, had acknowledged sometimes giving inmates smaller amounts of anesthesia than the state had said was its policy."

Judge To Consider Class-Action Status In Tobacco Suit. The AP (9/13, Hays) reports, "Lawyers for smokers of light cigarettes have asked a federal judge to grant class action status to a lawsuit against major tobacco companies, allowing tens of millions of people nationwide to seek as much as $200 billion in damages." The AP continues, "In the lawsuit, filed in 2004, the smokers accused Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which is now part of Reynolds American Inc., based in Winston-Salem, N.C., and other defendants of deceiving them for more than 30 years by claiming low-tar cigarettes were less harmful than regular cigarettes. The manufacturers, they allege, knew the health risks were about the same. … U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein was scheduled to hear arguments Tuesday in Brooklyn." The AP adds, "As a class, light cigarette smokers would be entitled to between $120 billion and $200 billion in refunds for a deceptive product, plaintiffs attorney Michael D. Hausfeld said Tuesday. … The tobacco companies 'continue to believe that the class should not be certified,' said R.J. Reynolds spokesman David Howard. 'Class certification is not appropriate when you're talking about individual smokers and health claims.'"

Judge Adds Prison Time In Texas Human Smuggling Deaths. The AP (9/13) reports, "A judge sentenced three people convicted in America's deadliest human smuggling attempt, exceeding the maximum recommended prison term in two of the cases." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore sent Emma Sapata Rodriguez to prison for 15 years Monday for her part in trying to smuggle more than 70 immigrants inside a stifling trailer in 2003. The truck trailer was abandoned about 100 miles southwest of Houston and nineteen of the immigrants died." The AP adds, "Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez, who was convicted partly by the testimony of her two sons, received the recommended maximum sentence of 12 years and seven months. She smuggled one person into the trailer. … Sapata and Sarrata were convicted along with Victor Sanchez Rodriguez of conspiracy to harbor and transport illegal immigrants. In addition to the conspiracy charge, the jury found Sarrata guilty of one count of harboring and Sapata guilty of eight counts of harboring and six counts of transporting. Sanchez was convicted of eight counts of harboring and nine counts of transporting." The AP notes, "Sapata's prison term exceeds federal sentencing guidelines by three years and seven months. Her husband, Sanchez, was sentenced Monday to 23 years and four months in prison. The sentence is three years and four months longer than the maximum recommended penalty. … His attorney said the sentences 'makes no sense' and is appealing. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that judges are not bound by federal sentencing guidelines."

Justice Officials Under Growing Pressure To Re-Open Cold Civil Rights Cases. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/13, Kemper) reports, "Congress is weighing whether to create special cold-case units at the Justice Department and FBI that, with a $5 million annual budget, would focus exclusively on unsolved killings from the civil rights era. But Congress has come late to the movement. Federal and state authorities already are reopening those cold cases in Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama and elsewhere." The AJC continues, "This new urgency over unsolved killings from one of America's most violent eras was ignited in part by a series of successful prosecutions of civil rights murder cases in recent years and the fear among victims' families and law enforcement agencies that suspects and witnesses, now in their 70s and 80s, may not live much longer." The AJC adds, "Further fueling the movement to close cold cases is the growing clout of black elected officials in the South, the appearance of a new generation of Southern prosecutors eager to put that racially explosive era behind them and the need of aging witnesses and perpetrators to clear their consciences before they die, according to civil rights groups and police. … Nationwide, 29 civil rights era killings have been reinvestigated since 1989, resulting in 27 arrests and 21 convictions, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center, a nonprofit organization in Mongtomery, Ala., whose missions include monitoring hate groups and providing legal expertise in civil rights cases. Twenty-two of those cases were in the South."

9th Circuit Finds Racial Motives Behind Juror Strikes. The California Recorder (9/13, Hirsch) reports, "Almost 12 years after the fact, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals shot down a Humboldt County, Calif., prosecutor's decision to yank three American Indian jurors and one Asian juror from an infamous murder trial, finding all were singled out on the basis of race." The Recorder continues, "The court, in a narrow 6-5 majority ruling, swept aside a series of earlier decisions in state and federal courts that upheld the jurors' exclusion in the trial of Richard Kesser. In 1995, Kesser was convicted and sentenced to life without parole for hiring a hit man to kill his ex-wife." The Recorder adds, "Though the prosecutor's handling of jury selection had been unsuccessfully appealed up to the California Supreme Court, the 9th Circuit gave it a closer examination under the Batson and Wheeler standards. The lower courts had accepted the prosecutor's nonracial explanations, but the 9th Circuit judges said those excuses fell flat when compared to the full record of the jury selection process. … 'The racial animus behind the prosecutor's strikes is clear,' wrote Judge Jay Bybee, who authored the majority opinion in Kesser v. Cambra, 06 C.D.O.S. 8481 . … In his opinion, Bybee reprinted at length prosecutor Worth Dikeman Jr.'s notes, without citing Dikeman by name. … There, Dikeman described one juror as a 'darker skinned' '[N]ative American female.' Noting that the juror worked for a local tribe, Dikeman indicated he wanted to keep such people off the jury because 'they are sometimes resistive of the criminal justice system generally and somewhat suspicious of the system.' … Dikeman's notes also included race-neutral reasons for excluding the American Indian jurors. … Among those was the prosecutor's observation that one juror appeared 'somewhat unstable [and] fairly weak.' … Upon earlier review, the 1st District Court of Appeal concluded that those reasons were not 'sham excuses' and upheld the jurors' exclusion. … Bybee and the 9th Circuit majority disagreed. Dikeman's 'ostensibly "race-neutral" reasons show themselves to be only a veneer, a pleasing moss having no depth,' Bybee wrote."

Group Sues To Block Federal Aid For Bible-Based Marriage Counseling. A group called Americans United for Separation of Church and State yesterday filed suit on behalf of 13 Washington state residents to block federal financing for an organization that provides Bible-based marriage counseling. The New York Times (9/13, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports, that the suit "is another challenge to the Bush administration's efforts to channel money for social services to religious organizations. While religious groups are not barred from getting public money, such financing can only be used for secular purposes, not 'worship, religious instruction or proselytization,' according to government guidelines." Americans United objects "to federal funds being used to support the Northwest Marriage Institute, which states in its newsletter that it offers 'Bible-based premarital and marriage counseling.'"

Bristol-Myers CEO Resigns After Bungled Plavix Deal. The New York Times (9/13, Saul) reports, "The troubled five-year term of Peter R. Dolan as chief executive of the drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb ended yesterday when the board dismissed him over the mishandling of a patent dispute involving the company's blockbuster drug, Plavix." The Times continues, "Mr. Dolan, 50, was replaced with an interim chief, James M. Cornelius, a Bristol-Myers director. Mr. Cornelius had recently served as the interim chief executive of the medical device maker Guidant and was a crucial player in its agreement to be acquired earlier this year by Boston Scientific. … Although the Bristol-Myers board said it would mount a search for a permanent chief executive, Mr. Cornelius's interim appointment increased speculation on Wall Street that the company might become an acquisition candidate."

The Washington Post (9/13, D01, Masters) reports, "Bristol's board announced the departure of Dolan, its chief executive since 2001, and general counsel Richard K. Willard one day after the company's independent directors met with the monitor, Frederick B. Lacey, and Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey. … The New York firm has been operating since last year under a deferred prosecution agreement with Christie that resolved an earlier, unrelated accounting scandal by requiring it to stay out of trouble for two years and allowing Lacey, a former judge, to call for management changes, as he did Monday night." The Post adds, "Dolan's ouster is one of the highest-profile management changes at a company operating under a deferred prosecution agreement. Prosecutors often seek new management as part of such settlements -- Bristol named an independent chairman as part of its initial deal -- but subsequent changes are far less common. … Christie's spokesman, Michael Drewniak, said that the U.S. attorney 'was fully supportive of Judge Lacey's recommendations' for management change but noted that 'there was no finding of a violation of the [agreement] or criminal wrongdoing.'"

Bloomberg (9/13, Rapaport, Voreacos) reports that Dolan "and General Counsel Richard Willard stepped down after a court-appointed monitor last night told the Bristol-Myers board they should be fired. The monitor, former U.S. Judge Frederick Lacey, was probing corporate governance issues related to a patent accord on Plavix, Bristol-Myers's biggest-selling product, the company said today in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "James Cornelius, the former chairman and interim chief executive officer of the medical device maker Guidant Corp., was appointed to replace Dolan while the board searches for a successor. Dolan, who is staying on as an adviser, didn't have an obvious heir apparent within the company, analysts said."

The AP (9/13) reports, "Sandra Leung, the company's corporate secretary, was named interim general counsel, and will be aided by former FBI Director Louis J. Freeh, a board member and former general counsel. … The board formed a special committee to fill the positions permanently." The AP notes, "The apparent last straw was Dolan's and Willard's conduct stemming from a failed agreement between Sanofi-Aventis, Bristol-Myers' partner for the drug Plavix, and Canadian drugmaker Apotex Inc. to keep a lower-priced generic version of the best-selling blood thinner off the market. … The agreement soured when state attorneys general refused to sign off on it. … As a result, Apotex launched its generic version in early August, and quickly grabbed about 75 percent of new prescriptions. Plavix is the second-best-selling drug in the world, with annual sales of about $5.9 billion. … The Plavix agreement also fell under a federal criminal investigation, leading FBI agents to raid Bristol-Myers' offices, including Dolan's, in New York. In the meantime, a judge halted further sales of Apotex's generic version of Plavix but declined to order a recall, leading some to believe that there could be generic product on the market well into 2007."

The Newark Star-Ledger (9/13, Jordan) reports that "in a startling move for a company that likes to play things close to the vest, board chairman James Robinson suggested the company could go on the block. … 'We will deal with any bona fide proposal that anyone wants to make in an orderly and professional manner,' Robinson said in a conference call with reporters last night. Robinson declined to comment further on talk of a possible takeover."

The London Times (9/13, Doran) reports, "Analysts were quick to pounce on the latest unsettling news from Bristol-Myers with claims that the company is more vulnerable than ever to a hostile takeover bid from one of its rivals. Industry sources said European pharmaceutical companies like Sanofi-Aventis, Schering-Plough and AstraZeneca could be interested. … Under Mr Dolan's five-year stewardship Bristol-Myers has lurched from crisis to crisis and the shares have lost almost 60 per cent of their value." The Times adds, "Last year the US Attorney in New Jersey forced the company to comply with a deferred prosecution agreement after an investigation into $2.5 billion worth of 'channel stuffing' — a practice that involves overloading wholesalers with drugs to meet quarterly sales targets. The company also paid $300 million to settle the claims. In 2001, soon after Mr Dolan became chief executive, he was forced to relinquish the role of chairman when authorities began an accounting inquiry that led to Bristol-Myers spending more than $800 million to settle lawsuits and government inquiries."

The New Jersey Law Journal (9/13, Daks) reports, "The June 2005 accord meant that Bristol-Meyers could avoid further federal litigation if it kept its nose clean. But under Dolan's and Willard's watch, the Department of Justice's antitrust division began probing the company's agreement to pay at least $40 million to a Canadian competitor, Apotex Inc., to delay putting its generic version of Bristol-Myers' blood thinner Plavix on the market. … In a prepared statement announcing the personnel changes, Bristol-Myers noted that the federal monitor and Christie did not find any violation of the deferred prosecution agreement."

Backers Of Wright Amendment Get Expert Help. The AP (9/13, Koenig) reports, "Supporters of legislation to shrink Dallas Love Field and bar long flights there for eight more years have enlisted help in countering the charge that their proposal violates antitrust laws." The AP continues, "Four experts in antitrust law, including two former Federal Trade Commission members, wrote to congressional leaders last week to say the restrictions are part of a necessary compromise to end a decades-long fight over Love Field. … The proposed legislation, they said, 'will be far better for airline competition and consumers than the regime that prevails today — and that will continue to prevail if the legislation does not pass.'" The AP adds, 'The letter was released Tuesday by officials of Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport. It was signed by former FTC members Thomas B. Leary and Christine Varney, and two other private antitrust lawyers, Harry M. Reasoner of Vinson & Elkins LLP and Janet L. McDavid of Hogan & Hartson LLP. … Reasoner's law firm works for the city of Dallas and Southwest Airlines Co., and the other three work for a firm that represents Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport — all supporters of the legislation."

The Dallas Morning News (9/13, Reddy, Dodge) reports, "With time quickly ticking off a short calendar, Texas lawmakers worked into the evening Tuesday to address antitrust concerns and save their effort to lift the Wright amendment." The News continues, "The legislation would implement a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co. … Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, along with House members from Texas and Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, lobbied legislators across Capitol Hill throughout the day. … 'We're all begging, pleading, cajoling – doing anything we can to address their concerns,' Mr. Cornyn said." The News adds, "The legislation to end flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field is scheduled to go before the House Judiciary Committee today. The meeting will give lawmakers on the panel a chance to amend the bill before the committee's authority runs out on Friday. … Officials from North Texas feared that the committee's chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., would try to strip provisions protecting the agreement from antitrust challenges."

FCC Head Hopes For AT&T-BellSouth Vote In Fall. Market Watch (9/13, Hughes) reports, "Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin on Tuesday appeared to suggest that he is hoping to vote over the next month or so on whether to approve AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp." Market Watch continues, "Federal regulators in late April commenced a review of the transaction, which was valued at $67 billion when it was announced. The FCC generally tries to approve transactions six months after beginning its review. … 'We have an informal clock of 180 days that we try to act on, and I think that 180-day clock runs sometime this fall, the end of October,' said Martin after testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee. 'We always have a goal of trying to act within 180 days.'" Market Watch adds, "The Justice Department hasn't yet approved the merger. Traditionally, the FCC waits to act until the Justice Department had completed its own review. The FCC meets in two weeks and again on Oct. 12. … Martin still faces questions about whether he will be able to count on both Republican colleagues on the five-member commission. FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell on Tuesday reiterated he may be recused from voting, given that his former employer opposes the merger. McDowell would be a crucial swing vote because the two Democrats may favor imposing conditions that don't fit in with Martin's largely hands-off approach."

EU Debates Vista Security Issues With Microsoft. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/13, Bishop) reports, "European regulators warned Tuesday that Microsoft's addition of security programs to Windows Vista may run afoul of antitrust laws and increase risks for consumers long term by endangering other companies that protect against online threats." The P-I continues, "Microsoft called the programs important security features and said it hopes the European Commission doesn't require them to be removed from Windows Vista in Europe." The P-I adds, "The back-and-forth comes less than a week after Microsoft said antitrust questions not yet answered by the commission could force the company to delay the European release of Windows Vista, the upcoming version of its biggest product. … 'We want to launch Windows Vista in a fully lawful manner, and we want to avoid regulatory decisions that could increase security risks for European consumers,' Erich Andersen, Microsoft associate general counsel said, in a statement from the company Tuesday." The P-I notes, "Regulators want to make sure Microsoft doesn't use its dominant PC operating system to give its other programs unfair advantage over rival programs by using Windows as a distribution mechanism. Vista's built-in anti-spyware protections and Windows Security Center software are among the programs discussed in letters between Microsoft and the commission."

Class-Action Suit Against Microsoft Heads To Iowa Courtroom. The AP (9/13, Pitt) reports, "One of the last remaining consumer class-action antitrust lawsuits filed against Microsoft Corp. in a state court is set to go to trial in November, and the company's co-founder and chairman is on the witness list to testify." The AP continues, "That doesn't mean Bill Gates will end up in the witness chair in Polk County District Court defending his company's business plan, but it's a possibility. … The lawsuit against Microsoft has made its way to the Iowa Supreme Court three times and unlike those in most states, which have been either settled or dismissed, it is scheduled for trial on Nov. 13. … Attorneys expect the trial to last six months." The AP adds, "Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin said Tuesday her experts have estimated that individuals and businesses have been overcharged as much as $453 million for Microsoft products in the last 12 years because a lack of competition has inflated the cost of the company's products. … In Iowa, about 5.1 million licenses for Microsoft Windows have been issued, 1.8 million for Office, 446,373 for Word and about 21,349 for Excel. … The average consumer overcharge ranges from $10.50 for buyers of Word to $56.99 to those who purchased Excel, Conlin said. … Many customers may have purchased more than one version in 12 years, Conlin said, so they could be eligible for multiples of those amounts."

German Truck Maker May Target Rival For Takeover Bid. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Singer, Power) reports, "German truck maker MAN AG is considering a bid for Swedish rival Scania AB, a potential move to consolidate the European market for heavy commercial vehicles and diesel engines, according to people close to the matter." The Journal continues, "Scania, of Sodertalje, Sweden, has a market value of about $9.6 billion. It isn't clear if Scania would be receptive to any approach, these people said. A MAN spokesman didn't return calls seeking comment. A Scania spokesman couldn't be reached for comment." The Journal adds, "Munich-based MAN has been looking for acquisition targets after restructuring its business to focus on commercial vehicles, diesel engines, turbines for the energy industry, and services such as logistics, Chief Executive Hakan Samuelsson said in a recent interview. Mr. Samuelsson, a Swede, spent 23 years at Scania before joining MAN in 2000 to turn around the German company. … Scania operates with one of the global industry's highest profit margins. The high-quality vehicles Scania produces for premium prices have made it known as the Porsche of the truck business among people in the industry."

Interior Department IG Set To Criticize Failures Of Agency Officials To Fix Ethical Problems. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/12) reported congressional investigators "said that Earl Devaney, the Interior Department inspector general, is scheduled to drop a few haymakers on Interior officials for failing to fix ethical lapses uncovered by his investigators." Devaney is set to testify today "before the House Government Reform's subcommittee on energy and resources. Investigators said he is expected to criticize, among others, former Interior Secretary Gale Norton." In one case, Devaney "wrote a sharply critical report on Interior's number two official, Steven Griles, and Norton took no action to remove him from office. Griles later left the department." In a memo, congressional aides said, "What he [Devaney] has discovered is a culture of unaccountability and managerial irresponsibility that pervades many areas of the department." The panel "also plans to explore Interior Department bungling that led to its failure to include provisions for royalty payments in valuable oil leases in the Gulf of Mexico."

Environmentalists Oppose GOP Effort To Maintain Hunting On California Island. Environmentalists and parks officials are opposing a House GOP effort to continue big game hunting in a national park on a California island. The Washington Post (9/13, A8, Eilperin, 748K) reports that House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter is seeking to maintain the hunting preserve on Santa Rosa Island, part of California's channel islands. Environmentalists and parks officials "say preserving the nonnative deer and elk herds for hunters will further damage the delicate habitat." Hunter, "who came up with the idea while driving down the California coast with a group of Iraq veterans, said it could 'provide wonderful outdoor activities for those American veterans who have protected our freedom.' The House has adopted the language, but the Senate passed a resolution opposing it. Lawmakers must reconcile if they hope to pass the defense bill before adjourning for the election."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Agent Pleads Guilty To Lying About Relationship With Informant. The AP (9/13) reports former FBI Special Agent Ronald LeBlanc "pleaded guilty Tuesday to false-statement charges after he was accused of concealing his relationship with a Colombian illegal immigrant so she could stay in this country following a drug arrest. … At his plea, he also admitted making false statements regarding the substance of the information the woman provided to law enforcement. LeBlanc faces a maximum of five years in prison when he is sentenced Dec. 20." The AP notes, "LeBlanc met the woman in the summer of 1999 while working on a squad investigating South American drug trafficking and money laundering organizations. He registered her in November 1999 as a cooperating witness and acted as her supervising agent, an indictment said." The New York Daily News (9/13, Zambito, 729K) also briefly reports on LeBlanc's plea, under the headline "Ex-Agent Aided Drug Mule."

Senate Panel Recommends Cutting ONDCP Salaries. The AP (9/13, Freking) leads, "White House employees who oversee the war on drugs could be in for a huge pay cut next year," as "Salaries and expenses at the Office of National Drug Control Policy would fall from $26.6 million to $11.5 million under the recommendation of the Senate Appropriations Committee." Seen as a response to their "frustration" with ONDCP, "the legislation states that the committee's staff must make numerous inquiries before they can get information from the drug policy office. Plus, the office has prevented directors of various programs from meeting with the committee." They also called for a study by the National Academy of Public Administration, and "ordered a Government Accountability Office study on the distribution of grants." Furthermore, they directed Director John Walters "to provide quarterly updates on travel expenditures, staffing levels and plans for future hirings."

Supermax Prisoner Accused Of Directing LA Drug Gang. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, A1, Mozingo, Winton) reports, "Sending hidden messages in letters from his cell at Colorado's 'Supermax' prison," Ruben "Nite Owl" Castro, the kingpin of the 18th Street gang, "controlled an elaborate drug operation on the streets west of downtown Los Angeles, federal prosecutors charged Tuesday." Their "indictment of 18 members of the gang capped a four-year investigation by a task force of Los Angeles Police Department detectives and FBI agents," who "have been trying for decades to bring down the 18th Street gang." They "said they were surprised by the sophisticated hierarchy that they discovered," adding it was "more akin to the Cosa Nostra than a traditional Latino street gang."

Judge Grants Bail To Reputed Mobster In Marijuana Case. The New York Daily News (9/13, Marzulli) reports that Bari Mascitti, "a reputed Bonanno crime soldier charged by the feds with supervising a marijuana distribution ring in Queens," received $1 million bail and house arrest while waiting for trail. The judge "insisted that Mascitti's three children co-sign the bond," saying "If he violates a single condition of release, it will have serious financial consequences, and I want it to hurt significantly." While "he's not charged with racketeering or membership in the crime family in the criminal complaint, Mascitti 'is an active member,' according to prosecutors." Before he was busted, "DEA agents watched him and codefendant Michael Santoro shop at a Staples office supply store for airtight plastic storage bins to keep their marijuana fresh and potent."

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced For Selling Crack. The Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA) (9/13) reports that Percy Harris of Harrisburg "was sentenced to 12 years in federal prison on charges of distributing and possessing crack cocaine and nearly 2 kilograms of cocaine." He "was under investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration since 1998. A search of his home found digital scales, a false-bottom can, $30,000 in cash, about 4 ounces of crack cocaine and the cocaine."

Senate Committee Holds Meth Hearing. The Des Moines Register (9/13, Norman) reports, "Law officials told members of the Senate Finance Committee that 80 percent of meth now is manufactured in 'super labs' in Mexico and smuggled over the border," so that the meth supply hasn't been effected even though "mom-and-pop meth labs are vanishing from the landscape." Gregory Passic, director of the office of drug interdiction for customs and border protection at the Department of Homeland Security, called meth, "a weapon of mass destruction introduced by Mexican criminal organizations." Also, committee chairman Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley "said constituents in his town meetings in Iowa often link the arrival of illegal immigrants in the state to the spreading use of meth." Radio Iowa (9/13, Kelley) adds, "Grassley says the purpose of the hearing is to gather testimony about the 'changing geography of meth use and production.'"

The Billings Gazette (9/13, Straub) notes that Lt. Dan Springer, commander of the Missouri River Drug Task Force and Crow Tribal Chairman Carl Venne testified that "Congress must provide more funding and encourage better cooperation between law enforcement agencies to combat the methamphetamine problem in Montana." Springer said he need more people, as "The only way work gets done is by people beating the street." He added that "there is no DEA agent within 160 miles of the task force, so that the group must work with those in Billings."

UN Anti-Drug Official Urges NATO To Destroy Afghanistan's Opium Industry. The AP (9/13, Brand) reports, "The United Nations urged NATO forces Tuesday to take military action to destroy the opium industry in southern Afghanistan, saying cultivation of the crop is out of control in the embattled Asian country. U.N. anti-drug chief Antonio Maria Costa said opium production was being used to fund terrorist groups, and that eradicating it was crucial to establishing order in the south." He also "called for increased development aid from international donors such as the European Union to get farmers off their dependency on growing opium. Costa said the aid should be made conditional on commitments by regional political leaders to fight opium cultivation and to curb corruption." He added that "legalizing Afghanistan's opium trade was not a solution," as "the market for opium-made morphine was not lucrative enough." In an article on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comments about Afghanistan, Bloomberg (9/13, Johnson) adds that Costa said "the counter-insurgency and counter-narcotics efforts must reinforce each other 'so as to stop the vicious circle of drugs funding terrorists and terrorists protecting drug traffickers.'" The United Press International (9/13) also covers this story.

ATF Joins Probe Of California Tire Shop Fire. The San Diego Channel, News 10 (9/13) reports, "Federal fire scene detectives joined Tuesday in local investigations into a blaze that raged through an East Village tire shop over the weekend, causing an estimated $3.5 million in damages." News 10 continues, "The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will aid the San Diego Fire-Rescue Department in determining the cause of the conflagration in the 1000 block of Broadway, ATF information officer Susan Raichel said." News 10 adds, "Sunday night's blaze at Tire Express forced the evacuation of about 200 people from neighboring Sara Frances Hometel, SDFRD officials said. … It took several dozen firefighters more than three hours to extinguish the main body of the inferno, which caused no serious injuries but left several people suffering from smoke inhalation. … The investigative assistance of the ATF's National Response Team will bring additional expertise and state-of-the-art equipment to the probe, Raichel said."

Utah Man Charged With Impersonating Federal Marshal. The AP (9/13) reports, "A Salt Lake City man who ran a business called U.S. Marshalls Salvage has been charged with impersonation of a U.S. marshal and bank fraud, the U.S. attorney's office said." The AP continues, "Andrew A. Costa, 41, has no connection to the U.S. Marshals Service. But he is accused of telling people he was a federal marshal and of handing out business cards with a five-point star similar to the U.S. marshal insignia, the U.S. attorney's office said." The AP adds, "Costa used the business cards and other documents containing the star insignia to create the impression he was associated with the federal agency, James Phelps, supervisory deputy of the Salt Lake City office of the Marshals Service, said in an affidavit filed with the complaint last week. … Costa is accused of carrying out the deception from about January to August and of depositing fraudulently obtained money in a credit union account. He is accused of accepting $22,000 for a truck he had repossessed, Phelps said in court documents. … Bank fraud carries a penalty of up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine. … He is also charged with illegal possession of marshal insignia and unlawful use of the marshal name."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Judge Allows Salvadoran Boy To Stay In US. The AP (9/13, Prengaman) reports, "A 10-year-old Salvadoran boy who was apprehended while trying to cross the U.S. border on his own to find his mother can stay in America at least until next summer, an immigration judge ruled Monday." The AP continues, "Judge William Martin's decision means Jonathan Martinez can live with his mother in Inglewood while the family prepares an asylum claim to keep him here, lawyer Julianne Donnelly said. That case is expected to be heard in August." The AP adds, "Donnelly said the family will argue that Jonathan does not have anyone to take care of him in El Salvador, making him susceptible to gangs and violence. … 'He would be forced to fend for himself on the streets,' Donnelly said." The AP notes, "Jonathan's case illustrates a growing problem with the federal program known as 'temporary protective status' under which his mother is staying in the United States. Officials don't know what to do with the thousands of kids from Central America who come to the country illegally to join their parents. … The program provides legal residency to illegal immigrants from El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, all countries that have suffered devastating natural disasters in recent years. The idea is that they can best serve their homelands by working here and sending money home. … But only immigrants in the United States when a program starts - for Salvadorans, after two major earthquakes in 2001 - are eligible. That means children who come later to join parents don't qualify, putting them in a sort of immigration limbo. Many end up being deported. … Jonathan's mother had left him with an aunt in 2000 to illegally immigrate to the U.S. Since 2001, she has had the temporary status."

DOJ_NMG_0062635

House Republicans Offer Border Security Proposals. The New York Times (9/13, Swarns, 1.21M) reports, "House Republicans proposed a series of border security and immigration enforcement strategies, calling for more fencing along the Mexican border, more Border Patrol agents and counterfeit-proof Social Security cards for citizens and immigrants searching for work." The proposals "are likely to form the basis for a legislative package House Republicans plan to announce this week." The initiatives "are expected to pass the House this month, either attached to other legislation or as a stand-alone bill. House Democrats called the Republican effort political grandstanding in the weeks before the November midterm elections."

The Washington Times (9/13, Hurt, 88K) reports House Republicans, "returning from a month of field hearings on illegal immigration, yesterday warned of a gaping disconnect between American voters and many 'elite' lawmakers." GOP Rep. Peter T. King, who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, said, "I have never seen such a disconnect between the American people and the elite." King "said securing the border this year is a cornerstone to national security and the war on terrorism. He called for more Border Patrol agents, more detention facilities for captured illegals and more unmanned aerial vehicles to patrol the border." Testimony by King and others "came during a 'forum' yesterday before the Republican Policy Committee at which committee chairmen who held field hearings during the August recess could report their findings to Republican leadership."

The AP (9/13, Abrams) says the "Republicans-only forum…confirmed the House's rejection of the Senate approach of combining enhanced border security with creation of a guest worker program and a means for illegal immigrants to move toward eventual legal status." House Speaker Dennis Hastert said at the meeting of GOP leaders and committee chairmen, "The state of our borders is a security crisis. … The American people want…immediate, targeted legislation specifically designed to secure the border, protect our homeland and vigorously enforce our immigration laws." The purpose of the forum was "to share results from some 22 hearings Republicans held in 13 states during the August recess to press the importance of the border security issue."

TAX:

Columnist Explains Recent Tax Code Changes. In his "Tax Report" colulmn for the Wall Street Journal (9/13), Tom Herman writes, "Among the revisions (to the tax code) effective this year are higher limits for 401(k) contributions, a new charitable-giving incentive and new breaks for energy-efficient vehicles and home improvements. These are in addition to perennial year-end techniques such as selling losing stocks. Many taxpayers can also take steps to blunt the impact of other, more onerous changes, such as the expanded 'kiddie tax.' … 'With all the new laws, you've got many new ways to cut your taxes' and soften the blow from other new provisions, says Sidney Kess, a New York lawyer and accountant." Herman continues, "Some tax changes this year that you can still take advantage of -- or blunt the impact of: The maximum workers under age 50 can contribute to their 401(k)s rises to $15,000, from $14,000. For those 50 and over, the max is now $20,000. … Taxpayers age 70½ and older can move up to $100,000 a year out of their IRAs directly to charity, tax-free. … Congress has expanded the so-called kiddie tax; parents can consider investments for kids that don't generate much taxable income. … But year-end planning could be tricky for millions of people this year because of continued uncertainty about the fate of several popular tax breaks that expired at the end of last year. Chief among these is a provision allowing people who itemize their deductions to deduct either their state and local income taxes or sales taxes. Unless Congress revives this provision, taxpayers will be able to deduct only their state and local income taxes for 2006. The option to deduct sales taxes, instead of the income taxes, is especially important to people in states with no state income tax, such as Florida, Texas and Washington."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Says He Senses A "Third Awakening." The Washington Post (9/13, A5, Baker, 748K) reports President Bush "said yesterday that he senses a 'Third Awakening' of religious devotion in the United States that has coincided with the nation's struggle with international terrorists, a war that he depicted as 'a confrontation between good and evil.'" Bush told a group "of conservative journalists that he notices more open expressions of faith among people he meets during his travels, and he suggested that might signal a broader revival similar to other religious movements in history." Bush noted "that some of Abraham Lincoln's strongest supporters were religious people 'who saw life in terms of good and evil' and who believed that slavery was evil. Many of his own supporters, he said, see the current conflict in similar terms." In his "comments yesterday, aides said Bush was not casting the war as a religious struggle but was describing American cultural changes in a time of war."

House To Vote On Earmark Reform Measures. McClatchy (9/13, Talev) reports "the Republican-led House of Representatives will vote this week on two measures that could help reveal who's behind billions of dollars in pork-barrel spending each year." That "could help Republicans appeal to fiscally conservative voters who are frustrated by Congress's runaway spending and threatening to stay home from the polls in November." McClatchy adds, "Taxpayer-watchdog groups praise the sentiment behind House Majority Leader John Boehner's decision to schedule these votes, but he's being squeezed between lawmakers who are reluctant to cede power and critics who say the legislation doesn't respond forcefully enough to a spate of congressional corruption scandals."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) writes, "Like drunks checking into rehab, House Republicans will take one final stab this week at reforming the 'earmark' epidemic on Capitol Hill. So far this year more than 10,000 projects -- for baseball parks, bovine genetics, bicycle paths, beaver management grants and bridges to nowhere -- have been stashed into budget bills at a cost of nearly $30 billion. That ain't peanuts." The House GOP leadership "finally seems to comprehend the stakes in this pre-election budget fight. Majority Leader John Boehner calls the anti-earmarking bill 'must-pass legislation,' and has agreed to separate it from a bottled-up lobbying-reform bill. All that can block this from passing now are the spend-happy Republicans on Appropriations. If they succeed, they will have inflicted a far greater wound on their majority than the Democrats ever could."

House, Senate Fail To Reach Agreement On Broader Ethics Bill. The AP (9/13, Abrams) reports, "Unable to agree on sweeping ethics legislation, the House this week will try to pass a narrower bill to shed light on pet projects that lawmakers tuck into spending and tax bills. The measure on 'earmarks'…is a small part of comprehensive lobbying and ethics legislation that the House and Senate both passed last spring in the wake of a spate of scandals involving lawmakers and lobbyists." But "the two chambers have been unable to find common ground, and prospects for legislation that was deemed a top priority when this session of Congress convened last January are not good."

NIH Scientists Avoid Ethics Punishment. The AP (9/13, Beamish) reports, "Most of the federal scientists who improperly accepted personal money from drug or biotechnology companies walked away with reprimands or were allowed to retire unscathed." The AP continues, "Only two of the 44 scientists found to have violated rules governing private consulting deals are being investigated for possible criminal activity, and they remain on the government payroll, the National Institutes of Health told The Associated Press this week in the most detailed accounting it has released." The AP adds, "NIH spokesman John Burklow said his agency wanted eight others reviewed for possible crimes, but those cases were rejected by the investigating office at the U.S. Health and Human Services Department. … The two still outstanding - Drs. Trey Sunderland and Thomas Walsh - both committed 'serious misconduct,' so grave that they would be fired if they were civilians, NIH internal ethics reports contend." The AP notes, 'NIH says it has been unable to act against the two because they are part of the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, which provides medical help during disasters. .. Lawmakers plan to push for answers Wednesday at a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing, part of continuing scrutiny into how the agency polices conflicts of interest. Responding to congressional criticism, NIH last year barred federal scientists from the once-common practice of earning lucrative paychecks from private companies."

Medicare Premiums To Increase By Less Than Anticipated. The AP (9/13, Freking) reports, "Most elderly and disabled people on Medicare will see their premiums rise to $93.50 a month next year, a 5.6 percent increase that is much lower than had been anticipated." Officials "had been projecting that premiums would again grow at double-digit rates, but there has been an unexpected slowing in the volume of services and tests that doctors are ordering for their Medicare patients." The AP adds, "The news was not as good for wealthier beneficiaries. For the first time in the program's history, wealthier beneficiaries will pay more for the insurance that covers doctors' visits and outpatient hospital care, known as Medicare Part B."

McClatchy (9/13, Pugh) reports, "Under the new guidelines, seniors who earn $80,000 to $100,000 a year- and married couples with incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 - will see their premiums increase by 10 percent, or roughly 3 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. They'll pay Part B premiums of $106 in 2007. Individuals who earn $100,000 to $150,000 -- and married couples with incomes of $200,000 to $300,000 -- will see their premiums increase by 25 percent, or roughly 8 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. Their 2007 Part B premiums will increase to $124.70."

USA Today (9/13, Appleby, 2.27M) reports Medicare chief Mark McClellan says yesterday, "These income-related premiums will reduce Medicare costs by $7.7 billion over five years and $20 billion over 10. … They are an important step in improving Medicare's sustainability." But "critics of the income-based premiums took issue with McClellan's statement that the income-based premiums will help Medicare's finances." They argue "the additional charges will do little to bolster Medicare's finances and could drive wealthier, healthier seniors out of the program, possibly causing costs to rise faster. Critics also suggest that income levels at which additional payments are required will be gradually reduced, requiring more seniors to make the higher payments."

The New York Times (9/13, Pear, 1.21M) reports that "listing factors that contributed to the new premium, Dr. McClellan reported 'a modest slowdown in physician spending growth'" but "very rapid growth in spending for hospital outpatient services." Kirsten A. Sloan, a health policy analyst at AARP, said, "The standard premium for Part B is less than originally projected, and that's good news. But the premium is artificially low. It assumes a continuation of current law, under which Medicare payments to doctors will be cut 5 percent next year. If Congress decides to prevent that cut, beneficiaries may have to make up the difference by paying higher premiums in 2008."

The Washington Post (9/13, A9, Lee, 748K) notes Democratic Rep. Nita M. Lowey "introduced a bill in April that would repeal the income-based premium increases, but it has not gotten out of a House committee." Medicare officials "said they expect 9,000 people to drop out of the program next year because of the new income-based premiums, and 30,000 to leave by 2010. Overall, that's not a lot, they said."

House Republican Leadership Contests "Subtly" Underway. The Hill (9/13, O'Connor) reports that this summer, Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) "sat down with a handful of Republican colleagues to gauge their support for a potential leadership bid. The talks were very preliminary, a Carter spokeswoman said, but the former judge is hardly alone in considering a run." As Republicans "focus their energy and fundraising efforts on retaining their majority this fall, a handful of ambitious lawmakers are also angling for a promotion within the conference. At least seven chairmanships will open next year if the GOP holds the House, and other members are mulling a challenge of the current leaders." Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) is "expected to challenge current Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) should Pryce triumph in her tough reelection race." But "uncertainty about" the midterm results "has somewhat muted the internal leadership campaigns." Rep. Adam Putnam, "a member of the Republican Steering Committee, the 28-member panel that decides committee slots," said, "It's very subtle." The Hill adds that during a "closed-door meeting last week of the elected leadership in House, Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the GOP campaign chief, told the other leaders that he still expects Republicans to retain their majority in November, a GOP aide familiar with the meeting said earlier this week." Most members "believe House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) control their own fate in the next Congress." If the House "remains in GOP control and Hastert decides to stay for another term, many Hill staffers and lobbyists speculate that he would name Reynolds as leadership chairman, former Rep. Rob Portman's (R-Ohio) old job, in order to give the New York Republican a seat at the table while preventing a two- or three-way race for leader or whip." A loss of House control "could create an opening for a dark horse candidate, such as Republican Study Committee (RSC) Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.), to launch a bid for the leadership."

VA-Funded Study Concludes There Is No "Gulf War Syndrome." Media across the nation report that there is no Gulf War Syndrome, according to an Institute of Medicine study commissioned by VA. Almost all of the coverage emphasizes that although there is no unifying "Gulf War Syndrome," the Institute of Medicine study of studies found that Gulf War veterans nevertheless report diverse health problems. At least 30 broadcast stations offer the same facts as the print reports. Additionally, at least five local TV stations interview local veterans who report suffering from illnesses they term "Gulf War Syndrome."

The Washington Post (9/13, A10, Brown, 748K) reports, "An expert panel reviewing hundreds of studies has concluded there is no single 'Gulf War syndrome' afflicting thousands of veterans of the 1990-91 conflict, although they have suffered vague symptoms at a much higher rate than other veterans. They have also experienced post-traumatic stress disorder and depression two to three times as frequently as other veterans, the panel found. Less certain is a possibly higher risk for the neurological ailment Lou Gehrig's disease, and possibly a rare birth defect in their children." The Post adds, "Previous blue-ribbon panels, including several convened by the IOM, one by the Defense Department and one by the White House under Bill Clinton, reached the same conclusion." For the report, Dr. Lynn Goldman of the Insitute of Mediine "and her colleagues read 850 studies done" of Gulf war veterans, and found "29 percent of Gulf War veterans reported physical complaints arising from several body systems, compared with 16 percent of servicemen and women who were not sent to the gulf. This was not just an American phenomenon."

The AP (9/12, Bridges) reports that VA spokesman Phil Budahn "said the VA would not comment until it had a chance to study the report." The AP ads, "Tuesday's report is the latest in the important series, which the VA will rely on to determine whether Gulf War veterans are eligible for special disability benefits if they are found to suffer from illnesses that can be linked to their service."

Groups Oppose Dudley Nomination To OMB Post. The Washington Post (9/13, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Advocacy groups yesterday assailed Susan E. Dudley, the president's nominee to head up regulatory policy at the Office of Management and Budget, and called on the Senate to reject her nomination. … By custom, presidential nominees remain silent until their confirmation hearing, so the Bush administration fired back at Public Citizen on Dudley's behalf. 'When a fringe group like this one criticizes Susan Dudley, I think it's a good indication that she's actually squarely in the thoughtful mainstream along with most Americans,' said Scott Milburn , press secretary at the OMB. 'She's very well suited to...keep our regulatory process on track.'"

Government Grant Submission System Not Mac-Friendly. The Washington Post (9/13, A15, Weiss, 748K) reports, "Scientists, scholars and others planning to use their Macintosh computers to submit grant proposals to the federal government in the months ahead should be prepared for a rocky, or at least error-message-littered, road ahead. Luckily, Mac users are used to it." Since its "inception several years ago, the government's electronic grant submission system has been compatible only with Windows-based computers. That has forced Mac users to go with paper submissions or use clumsy patchwork programs -- or 'workarounds' -- that government officials have conceded are 'not ideal' and Mac users have called, well, insert your favorite PC expletive here." Earlier this year, "the Department of Health and Human Services -- a central manager of the Grants.gov system -- promised that by November the system would be compatible with Macs, which are popular among scientists and academics. That was based on promises from Northrop Grumman Corp., which has been paid tens of millions of dollars to run Grants.gov for the government." But a "new twist emerged this week when HHS announced that Grumman had lost its bid to win a renewal of its contract and will be moving on as of Nov. 1."

Gallup Poll Finds Bush's Job Approval Rating At 39%. CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Blitzer) reported, "A new Gallup poll…shows 39 percent of Americans approve of the way President Bush is doing his job. Averaged together with two other recent surveys, Mr. Bush gets a 41 percent approval rating. All these polls were conducted before the President's 9/11 anniversary speech to the nation last night."

Dowd Says Cheney Is "Ruining America." Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (9/13, 1.21M), "If Dick Cheney didn't try to hose himself down after his outlandish performance on 'Meet the Press,' he may be so deep in denial he doesn't even know he's ruining America and needs a symbolic moral superwash. … On 'Meet the Press,' Mr. Cheney warned that America cannot let its adversaries 'break our will" and show we 'don't have the stomach for the fight.' … After all the miscalculations and billions wasted, projects screwed up, lives and limbs lost, foreign enemies made, American stature squandered, Taliban strength regained, North Korean bombs and Iran-Iraq alliances built (visiting the American-hating, Holocaust-denying Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad yesterday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq called Iran 'a good friend and brother') Dick Cheney wouldn't do anything differently? … Break out the Wet Wipes, Mr. Cheney. Time for a good scrubbing."

OTHER NEWS:

Falling Oil Prices May Boost Economy, Cool Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Ip, Conkey, 2.03M) reports, "The recent drop in oil prices could provide a welcome and surprising boost to consumer pocketbooks this fall, cushioning the economy from a falloff in home prices and construction while venting an important source of inflation pressure. The easing of energy prices is an unexpected -- and little-noted -- positive amid economic anxiety over falling housing activity, previous energy-price increases and the possibility of recession." The Journal says, "Crude oil was at $77 a barrel as recently as early August. Yesterday, the price of the October crude-oil future contract settled at $63.76, a near six month low, down $1.85 from Monday ... ." Moreover, "the average retail price of gasoline has fallen to $2.67 from $3.08 a gallon, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration." The Journal writes, "For now, the price drop's impact on inflation will be as important as its effect on economic growth."

The Washington Times (9/13, Hill, 88K) says, "Oil prices plunged below $64 a barrel yesterday and settled 19 percent below this summer's record highs, bringing a major dose of inflation relief to hard-pressed consumers and the economy." The decline in gas prices has left "an unexpected dividend of spare change jangling in consumers' pockets that is likely to be quickly deployed into spending on other items." The Times reports, "Some analysts say a sea change is occurring in the oil market, and it will not revisit soon the record high of $78.40 set in July by premium crude in New York."

Oil Prices Data Boost Stocks. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, McDonald, 2.03M) reports "investors emboldened by the prospect of lower energy prices and better-than-expected earnings from big Wall Street firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc. looked past reports of a record trade gap and a thwarted terrorist attack in Syria and bought stocks by the bushel."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stock Market rallied today. The Dow was up about 101 points today [to close at 11,1498.09]. The Nasdaq gained 40 points [to close at 2,215.82]. USA Today (9/13, Krantz, 2.27M) says "the Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 13.57 points to 1313.11. The index is up 5.2% this year."

Trade Deficit Hits New Record, But Falling Oil Prices Expected To Drive It Down. The Financial Times (9/13, Pimlott) reports, "The US trade deficit surged to its highest ever level in July as the cost of oil imports rose to a record high and exports fell." But "the swelling deficit, which rose much more than expected, will probably fall back again as oil prices have fallen in recent weeks, analysts said." The Times adds, "About one-third of the increase in the July figure came from higher prices for oil imports. But oil prices have dropped to their lowest levels since March this week, after rising to an all time high in July of $77.03 per barrel. The price is now 15 per cent lower."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Hitt, 2.03M) reports, "Though overwhelmed by surging imports, US exports came in at $119.97 billion in July. That was down 1.1% from June, but still the second-highest monthly total on record."

Administration Seeks To Focus On Economy In Run-Up To Election. Edward Lazear, chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers yesterday said that after years of stagnation, US wage growth will start to catch up with high productivity and economic growth. The Financial Times (9/13, Luce) reports that Lazear "also sought to dispel the increasingly widespread view that the median US employee is suffering from a long-term decline in earnings potential." His speech "is part of a broader administration campaign to focus on the strong US economy in the build-up to critical mid-term congressional elections on November 7. … However, the Bush administration's arguments have been met with growing skepticism among economists who point out that real wages for most Americans are marginally below where they were four years ago, in spite of strong overall growth in gross domestic product."

LATimes Praises Economy's Strength Since 9/11 Attacks. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (9/13, 918K) says that after the 9/11 attacks, Osama bin Laden "boasted that the attacks had "hit hard the American economy at its heart and its core." If they did, the effect was transitory. In all the commemorations and assessments on the anniversary of 9/11, the resilience of the U.S. economy has attracted less notice than it deserves." Following the attacks, Americans "enjoyed five years of strong productivity and corporate profits, a booming real estate market and rising trade volumes." The Times adds, "Another terrorist strike, in the US or abroad, could still do untold damage to the economy. But nowadays economists tend to be less concerned about such a possibility (or unnecessary spending to protect against it) than about high energy costs or a real estate bust. Both would be worrisome, of course. But those kinds of worries are in a whole different category than the fear of a terrorist attack."

NYTimes Says Rising Labor Costs Reflect Growing Income Inequality. An editorial in the New York Times (9/13, 1.21M) says, "Compensation is business's biggest expense, so rising labor costs -- if passed on to consumers -- could certainly push up prices. But so far, there are no clear signs of that happening. Instead, today's rising labor costs seem to reflect a different economic phenomenon: growing income inequality." The Times adds, "When statisticians talk about 'labor costs' and economists -- and politicians -- talk about 'compensation,' they mean all forms of earned income, like wages, salaries, bonuses and stock options, plus benefits, like insurance and pensions. Measured that way, employees don't look too terribly squeezed. But for most workers, increases in wages or salaries, if any, have been steadily eroded by inflation while health insurance, if any, costs more and covers less."

Voters In Six States To Consider Minimum Wage Increases. USA Today (9/13, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports that voters in Colorado, Arizona, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio will consider increases in their states' minimum wage laws in ballot measures November 7. According to USA, "Backing the state campaigns to raise the minimum wage are labor unions, advocacy groups for the working poor — such as the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now and 9to5, the National Association of Working Women — and religious organizations. … Opponents include chambers of commerce and associations representing hotels, restaurants and small businesses."

A separate story in USA Today (9/13, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports that this year's elections "could be a watershed in the nearly 70-year history of the federal minimum wage: For the first time, a majority of states could require higher pay than the federal rate of $5.15 an hour. This year, 10 states have enacted laws mandating a higher minimum than federal law requires. Twenty-three states and the District of Columbia are now above that threshold."

Chafee Wins Hard-Fought Republican Senate Primary In Rhode Island. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Cummings, 2.03M) reports Rhode Island Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee "beat back a very tough primary challenge from Cranston, R.I., Mayor Steve Laffey to run for re-election, an outcome national Republican Party officials believe will give them the best chance of holding the seat in midterm elections." Chafee's victory "was substantially aided by a roughly $1 million infusion of cash from Washington Republican Party committees to run ads and flood mailboxes with fliers criticizing Mr. Laffey, a tough-talking social conservative." It is a strategy "of lavish spending Republicans used earlier this year to hold onto to the House seat of California Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, who pleaded guilty to bribery. That race cost the national party $5 million." Laffey "conceded the race with roughly 70% of the voting reported and trailing 54% to 46%."

USA Today (9/13, Page, 2.27M) reports Chafee's "battles aren't over: He now faces former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination." The race "is rated a toss-up, and Democrats have targeted it as one of the six Republican-held seats they need to pick up to win Senate control."

The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Murray, Goldfarb, 748K) reports the story on the front page, noting Chafee's "victory came amid heavy turnout, after the same Republican establishment that Chafee has so often defied rallied to his side with money and logistical support for a vigorous get-out-the-vote effort. While there is little personal affection for Chafee at the White House, operatives there and in the Republican Party leadership calculated that he is the GOP's best chance of holding the seat in a Democratic-leaning state in November." Although Chafee "escaped the Laffey threat, Democrats believe he compromised his general election chances by waging a negative campaign marked by pointed attack ads and by accepting such high-profile Republican Party help. The senator himself expressed regret last week that the tone of the campaign had turned nasty. But, he pointed out, 'negative ads do work.'"

CQ (9/12, Horrigan) reported the "race forced the national Republican Party to coalesce behind Chafee, who has the least conservative voting record in the Senate among Republicans and has refused to toe the party line on key issues including the war in Iraq and President Bush's nomination of Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court." Chafee "stumbled in the closing days of the campaign, as he disavowed attack ads against his opponent that he said his aides pressed him to air."

The New York Times (9/13, Zernike, 1.21M) reports Chafee's win "dealt the Democrats a big setback in their bid for control of the Senate. The state is crucial to their goal of winning six seats. Polls had shown Mr. Chafee's challenger, Stephen Laffey, running far behind Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination on Tuesday, and the national Republican Party said it would cede hopes of keeping the seat if Mr. Laffey won."

The Washington Times (9/13, Fagan, 88K) reports the battle "between Mr. Chafee and Mr. Laffey was in the spotlight yesterday because national Republicans said it was key to their party's hope of maintaining its Senate majority. They insisted that Mr. Chafee, who has bucked his party on issues such as tax cuts and abortion, has the only shot in this left-leaning state to beat a Democratic challenge and win the general election in November."

Voters Nominate Candidates In Nine States' Primaries. USA Today (9/13, Page, 2.27M) reports voters "from Arizona to Vermont cast ballots in hard-fought primary battles on Tuesday, soundly renominating New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and effectively choosing Adrian Fenty as mayor of the nation's capital." Rep. Ben Cardin "was leading former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic Senate nomination in Maryland. The winner will face Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the Republican Party's best hope for electing an African-American to major statewide office this year." Meanwhile, "a Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday had good news for Democrats hoping to pick up the 15 seats they need to regain control of the House. By 53%-41%, registered voters in a generic ballot test" said "they were inclined to support the Democratic candidate in their district over the Republican."

Spitzer, Clinton Win Easily. The New York Times (9/12, Healy, 1.21M) reports Attorney General Eliot Spitzer "won the Democratic nomination for New York governor tonight, with his party hoping he will lead it to a potentially historic moment this November: a sweep of top statewide offices." Meanwhile, Andrew M. Cuomo "won the Democratic nomination for attorney general, and Senator Hillary Clinton won renomination for a second term in the Senate. In the day's most closely contested major race, Yvette D. Clarke won the primary for a Congressional seat in Brooklyn." Clinton, by "showing strength among a relatively liberal, antiwar primary electorate…demonstrated that her vote for military action in Iraq in 2002 did not damage her political standing as it did with Senator Joseph I. Lieberman." Clinton's "little-known opponent in the New York race, a union organizer named Jonathan Tasini, tried to tap into antiwar sentiments in New York, yet he had little money and did not effectively turn the race into a message-sending moment about Iraq. With 95 percent of the precincts reporting, Mrs. Clinton had 83.2 percent of the votes and Mr. Tasini had 16.8 percent."

WSJournal Says A Vote For Spitzer Is A Vote For The Status Quo. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) editorializes, "Yesterday [Eliot] Spitzer won the Democratic nomination for Governor in a rout, and on the campaign trail he's spent a lot of time talking about ending 'the pay-to-play culture in Albany by making it against the law for those who do business with the state to give gifts to state employees or to donate to candidates for state office.' But it turns out that the Spitzer campaign hasn't been practicing what it preaches. Mr. Spitzer has accepted discounted rides to fund-raisers nationwide on the private jet of Richard Fields, a casino developer whose companies have donated $200,000 to Mr. Spitzer's campaign." While Spitzer has "decided to pay 'all the costs' when chartering flights in the future," the "whole episode calls into question the sincerity of his calls for reform in Albany. Campaign speeches notwithstanding, his behavior suggests that a vote for Mr. Spitzer is a vote for the status quo."

Cardin Projected To Win Maryland Democratic Primary. The Washington Times (9/13, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin "last night was leading the Democratic nomination for a U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, topping former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume in a widely watched contest in which race was a key issue." With 49 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Cardin "had 46 percent of the vote, and Mr. Mfume had 37 percent." In November's general election, Cardin, "a 10-term congressman, would face Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who easily bested nine rivals for the Republican nomination. Mr. Steele received about 85 percent in the Republican primary."

The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Mosk, Wagner, 748K) reports in a front page story that Maryland's Democratic primary voters gave Cardin "a commanding lead over" Mfume "last night in the race to be the party's candidate for U.S. Senate, but chaos at polling sites delayed final results for that and other key races." All morning, "confusion reigned as outraged voters were turned back from voting sites in Montgomery County because an election worker failed to provide key cards needed to make the electronic voting machines functional."

Election Officials' Errors Create Chaotic Primary Vote In Maryland. The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Davenport, Spivak, 748K) reports, "The most basic of human errors threw Maryland's primary election into chaos yesterday: Someone forgot the wallet-size plastic cards needed to operate the voting machines in Montgomery County, frustrating early morning voters who lined up outside polling places and often were turned away without voting." Courts ordered polls "to remain open an extra hour in the county and in Baltimore, where at least two dozen polling places opened late, but it seemed doubtful that the extensions would resolve the confusion."

RNC Plans To Spend $60 Million-Plus On Midterm Elections. The Hill (9/13, Bolton) reports the Republican National Committee (RNC) "will spend its entire bank account, $60 million or more, helping Republicans try to retain control of Congress in the midterm elections." The "looming spending spree appears to have spurred Democratic House leaders to reach agreement over how much the Democratic National Committee (DNC) will help counter this onslaught." It is "an open question whether the deal between the DNC and DCCC will be enough to offset the financial advantage that the RNC cash will give Republican candidates this fall." RNC chairman Ken Mehlman "has put in place a plan to raise money aggressively throughout the fall and has made clear that he will not hold back any money for the 2008 presidential election."

Statehouse Reporters See Frustration, No Anti-GOP Wave. Roll Call (9/13, Jacobson) reports the national polls "are showing high — and in many cases, increasing — levels of voter frustration with the direction of the country, politics as usual and the Republican leadership." But "in Out There's second unscientific poll this year of state capitol reporters from around the country, we find surprisingly few indications that voter anger is translating into a national anti-Republican — or even an anti-incumbent — wave." During August, "Out There sent a survey to a range of members of capitol-beat, a national association for reporters who cover politics and government in the state capitals. Twenty-six reporters in 20 states responded." Though "not a substitute for professional polls," the reporters "generally detect a modest sentiment against Republicans, but not one that inevitably will translate into political gains for Congressional Democrats."

Dean, Emanuel Reach Agreement On GOTV Funds. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Calmes, 2.03M) reports, "Finally, after months of sometimes expletive-laced sparring," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee

Chairman Rahm Emanuel "seems to be having his moment with Howard Dean. The Democratic Party chairman apparently has agreed to pony up $12 million for get-out-the-vote drives aimed at capturing control of Congress Nov. 7." The funds, "together with the House Democrats' own money and the $40 million that the AFL-CIO has said it will spend to mobilize voters for Democrats in the most hotly contested congressional races, could effectively put the Democrats on par financially with the vaunted Republican 'GOTV' program, for which party Chairman Ken Mehlman has pledged about $40 million. And that would blunt the Republicans' one clear advantage in an otherwise bleak election year for the party in power." But Dean "remains in talks with New York's Sen. Chuck Schumer, Mr. Emanuel's counterpart, over funds for Senate races."

Roll Call (9/13, Whittington) reports Dean "has pledged $12 million to his party's 2006 campaign efforts — with at least $5 million going to House and Senate Democrats — in a move that may help soothe tensions between the national party chief and his Congressional counterparts." Dean "struck a deal with Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) on Tuesday to devote roughly $60,000 to get-out-the-vote efforts in 40 targeted House races." The deal was "brokered by DCCC Executive Director Karin Johanson and DNC Executive Director Tom McMahon. One source familiar with the discussion indicated that initially Dean wanted to seek assurances that Emanuel would stop attacking Dean and his 50-state strategy in return for the financial commitment, but that never materialized." The "massive financial shortfall of the DNC in comparison to the Republican National Committee has been a source of concern for Emanuel and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.)."

The New York Times (9/13, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports Dean ended "a long and cantankerous standoff with House Democratic leaders" by agreeing "to a limited program to finance get-out-the-vote operations this November, party officials said Tuesday." But Dean "remained at loggerheads with Senate Democrats, who continued to insist he provide more money." The committee "said it would provide $12 million to finance turnout operations for candidates running for the House and the Senate, and for state races. Just $2.6 million would go to finance turnout operations in 40 House races, far less than House Democratic leaders had asked for."

The Washington Post (9/13, A5, Balz, 748K) reports Dean said "the national party is making an unprecedented investment in the fall elections, but other Democrats said the $12 million figure is roughly the same as what it spent on House and Senate races in 2002. That year, the DNC spent millions more on gubernatorial races and redistricting and lent the DCCC close to $5 million in the final weeks of a losing campaign."

Many Democrats Feel "Contract" Not Needed To Win House Majority. In a McClatchy commentary (9/13), Steven Thomma says, "If they're still looking to close the deal on November's midterm elections, why haven't the Democrats rolled out their own 2006 version of the Republicans' Contract with America, which was widely credited with helping that party win control of Congress in 1994?" One reason "could be the influence of Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who thinks the contract is overrated." Mellman's "professorial take on 1994 is that the conventional wisdom is wrong, that the contract did not work as advertised" and it "might have cost as many Republican votes as it delivered was that it became a big juicy target. Democrats launched a $2 million ad campaign against it and hammered Republicans who signed on to it." Republicans today "would love to see a Democratic contract so they could line up ads against it." Many Democrats "think there's no need for a contract-like set of bumper-sticker proposals this year. The key to victory in November, they say, is the same force that drove the 1994 elections: anger and disappointment with the president and his party."

New Democrat Coalition To Give $120,000 To Top Challengers. Roll Call (9/13, Kurtz) reports as the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "showcases the candidates in its 'Red to Blue' program tonight in Washington, D.C., members of the New Democrat Coalition will announce today that they are contributing at least $120,000 to the program's recipients." Several "top-flight Democratic challengers and open-seat candidates will be in town tonight as part of House Democrats' 'March to the Majority' events." The NDC "will give $5,000 each to Darcy Burner, who is challenging Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.); Phyllis Busansky, in the race to replace Rep. Mike Bilirakis (R-Fla.); Joe Courtney, challenger to Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.); Tammy Duckworth, the Democrat in Illinois' open 6th district race; Diane Farrell, who is in a rematch with Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.); Gabrielle Giffords, who was expected to win the Democratic primary Tuesday in Arizona's open 8th district; Ron Klein, who is challenging Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.); Lois Murphy, who is in a rematch with Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.); and Ed Perlmutter, the Democrat in Colorado's open 7th district race."

Strategists See 2006 Loss As Possible Boost For 2008. The Hill (9/13, Schor, Kaplan) reports a "growing number of House Republicans are taking to the trail warning swing voters that a Democratic takeover would hand key chairmanships to the party's liberal wing. But some strategists see a silver lining to a GOP loss in November: its White House hopefuls can don the mantle of outsiders." 2008 could "find Republicans turning a Democratic House majority into bogeymen or Democrats continuing to link GOP majorities to the Bush administration." University of Virginia professor Larry Sabato "wondered whether Democrats would find success in a narrow electoral failure." Sabato said, "You can [argue] that Democrats would be much better if they got 217 seats in the House and 49 in the Senate, just enough to make sure nothing was done but not enough to be held accountable. Republicans, by contrast, will benefit almost certainly from a Democratic takeover … because they can not be in charge of everything and can respond that Democrats are causing gridlock."

In a New York Times op-ed (9/13), National Review editor Ramesh Ponnuru says if Democrats re-take the House, "conservatives will find several silver linings in the outcome. It would be worse for conservatives if Republicans actually gained seats. The Congressional wing of the party lost its reformist zeal years ago and has been trying to win elections based on pork and incumbency. An election victory would reward that strategy, leaving the congressmen even less interested in restraining spending, reforming government programs and revamping the tax code. Political incompetence and complacency, sporadic corruption and widespread cynicism: having paid a price for none of it, Republicans would indulge in more of the same." But the "question is whether they will have a reduced majority or no majority. And outright loss might be preferable. A narrower House majority would most likely accomplish even less than the current one has." A straight loss, "on the other hand, would make the Republicans hungrier and sharpen their wits. Freed from the obligation of cobbling together thin majorities for watered-down legislation, Republicans would be able to stand for something attractive."

Mollohan Criticizes Wakim Over Video Poker Payouts. The Hill (9/13, Kaplan) reports Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W. Va.) "faulted Republican state Del. Chris Wakim's ethics in a recent television advertisement alleging that Wakim, a bar owner, illegally paid winnings on video poker machines." The allegations "stem from 1996 when a patron of Wakim's bar, Knotty Pines, in Wheeling, W. Va., sued Wakim after being charged with driving under the influence of alcohol. In testimony from the deposition obtained by The Hill, Wakim's wife, Jeannette, said the bar paid winnings to patrons who gambled on video machines. Under state law, this was illegal." Will Holley, "a spokesman for Wakim, defended the business practice, saying, 'Everybody was doing it.'" The Hill adds Democrats "also raised questions about whether Wakim paid sales tax on revenue earned from gambling machines. Holley said that tax records do not exist because they do not have to be saved for more than three years." Allegations "of ethical misconduct define the race, which is one of the few bright spots for Republicans in an otherwise terrible political climate."

Courtney Ad Targets Simmons For Bush Support. The Hill (9/13, Schor) reports Democratic House challenger Joe Courtney (Conn.) "unveiled his first campaign commercial yesterday, tagging incumbent Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) as 'George Bush's No. 1 supporter' on energy, healthcare and Iraq." The TV spot "underscores Courtney's effort to publicize Simmons' record of votes supporting the White House, which a recent study ranked first in the state delegation."

Bush Strategy Could Hurt Wilson's Bid To Demonstrate Independence. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Rogers, 2.03M) reports that for Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, "proving her independence to the voters of New Mexico's First District gets harder with each passing day of the Iraq war." Polls show Wilson "running neck-and-neck with her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid, New Mexico's attorney general and a proven vote getter. As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, Ms. Wilson is feeling public anger over faulty prewar assumptions and the U.S.'s costs and casualties." For President Bush, the race "poses a two-part test. First is public support for the war." Sen. John McCain, who campaign with Wilson last weekend, said, "The eyes of the nation will be on this race." The Journal adds the second part is "the administration's fall offensive on national security, with which the White House hopes to knock Democrats back on their heels. But unless Mr. Bush calibrates his demands for additional powers from Congress, he risks smothering endangered Republicans just when they need to show some independence." Other Republicans, "such as Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays, are also paying a political price for supporting the president's Iraq policy. But Rep. Wilson's military background, past White House service under the president's father, and position on the Intelligence panel make her unique, and her race largely dominates this Southwest state."

Democrats Make Gains In Illinois Poll Of Party Preference. The Chicago Tribune (9/13, Pearson, 623K) reports the percentage of Illinois voters "who call themselves Democrats is at its highest pre-election level in more than a decade, posing a problem for Republicans trying to win the governor's mansion and key congressional seats, a Tribune/WGN-TV poll shows." The poll "found 43 percent of voters identified themselves as Democrats while a little more than a quarter of the voters identified themselves as Republicans. The 17 percentage point difference ranks among the most polarized partisan spreads in more than 16 years of Tribune surveys taken prior to an election day." The results of the poll "echo surveys taken nationally that show an increase in voters lining up in the Democratic column, a factor attributed to dissatisfaction with the Republican White House and GOP-led Congress on issues ranging from the war in Iraq to economic uncertainties." The findings of the Tribune poll "indicate the potential for trouble in Illinois for Republicans trying to revitalize a political party beset by scandal and infighting." The survey "of 600 registered voters likely to vote Nov. 7 has a margin of error of 4 percentage points."

Lawmakers Seeking Higher Office Racking Up Missed Votes. The Hill (9/13, Kirtley, Ruben) reports Reps. Jim Davis (D-Fla.) and Butch Otter (R-Idaho) "are both running for governor. Davis has missed 152 votes in 2006; Otter has missed 3." They are "among 16 members of the House that are running for a higher office this year. Statewide campaigns require time, money, and a great deal of energy. For some House members, it also leads to a lot of missed votes." The 16 congressmen "have missed an average of 50 floor votes in 2006. Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), who is running for the Senate, has been absent on 113 votes while Rep. Jim Nussle (R-Iowa), who is in a tight race for governor, has missed 110 votes." When such "a significant focus is placed on the campaign for the next office, missed votes can often resurface as political liabilities. In the 2004 presidential election, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and John Edwards (D-N.C.) were consistently criticized for missing votes on the Senate floor in favor of holding campaign events across the nation."

Some Catholics Angered At University's Invitation To Casey. The Washington Times (9/13, Hallow, 88K) reports some Catholic conservatives are "accusing the Catholic University of America of publicly favoring Democrat Bob Casey Jr. over Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania two months before an election that could decide who controls the Senate next year." With the "explicit permission of Catholic University's president, the Rev. David M. O'Connell, Mr. Casey will give the prestigious 38th annual Pope John XXIII Lecture tomorrow at the university's law school, Veryl Miles, the law school's dean, confirmed. Mr. Casey is an alumnus of Catholic." Bob Destro, a professor and former acting dean at the law school, said, "The university is clearly taking sides and has no business doing this in one of the most important elections in the country." The Times adds, "Other prominent people have been barred from formal addresses on the campus because their views differed from Catholic teaching, Mr. Destro and others noted."

Angelides Campaign Source Of Controversial Schwarzenegger Tape. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Vogel, 918K) reports the campaign "of Democratic gubernatorial candidate and state Treasurer Phil Angelides today said it was the source of audiotapes of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that were published last week by The Times." But campaign officials "said a researcher obtained the tapes legally from Schwarzenegger's website." Earlier, Schwarzenegger administration officials "had said the tape was downloaded from a password-protected section of the governor's computer system and thus was unauthorized and 'a breach of one or more security protocols.'" The administration "also said the California Highway Patrol, which is responsible for safeguarding state property, would investigate." Angelides campaign manager Cathy Calfo "said her camp came by the audiotape easily without a password or hacking."

The AP (9/13, Kurtzman) reports Angelides' campaign acknowledged "that it downloaded — and leaked to the media — a recording of a private meeting in which the governor described a Hispanic legislator as having a 'very hot' personality." Calfo said, "No one hacked. They accessed information that was available to the public." Calfo said "she was unhappy that two campaign staffers had passed the audio clip to the Times without her knowledge. Angelides did not know about it, either, she said."

The New York Times (9/13, Steinhauer, 1.21M) reports Calfo "called the Schwarzenegger camp's characterization of the episode 'politically motivated' and 'outrageous' and added, 'We believe these audio files accessed through a public Web site requiring no password are a matter of public record.'" She said "that anyone who received a news release e-mailed by the governor's office in August with an audio file about Hurricane Katrina could have clicked on a link and with a few strikes of the backspace key have been linked to the audio files. Those files, she said, have since been removed from the site." The episode is "perhaps the singular snapshot of the sleepy governor's race, in which Mr. Schwarzenegger has trotted far ahead of Mr. Angelides but once again has found that his biggest liability can be the space between his nose and his chin."

Colorado Official Seeks To Restrict Anonymous Union Contributions. The Washington Times (9/13, Richardson, 88K) reports Colorado Secretary of State Gigi Dennis "is taking on the state's powerful unions over their anonymous donations on behalf of their members to political campaigns." Dennis, "a Republican, ruled last month that small-donor committees, the source of most union contributions, must have permission from contributors before they can use dues money for political campaigns." Dennis also "required such committees to attest that the donations came from U.S. citizens, as mandated by the state constitution. Small-donor committees typically bundle contributions of less than $20, which are not subject to disclosure laws." State Democrats and union leaders "have fired back with a lawsuit that goes before a hearing tomorrow in Denver District Court." But state Republicans, "who have long complained about the lack of transparency in union giving to Democrats, cheered the move as a necessary step in ridding the political system of potentially illegal donations."

Researchers Want To Buy Human Eggs For Stem Cell Research. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Kaplan, 918K) reports that scientists involved in stem cell research are grappling with "a shortage of eggs that they say is crippling their work." According to the Times, "Women routinely provide their eggs to fertility clinic patients, who pay $5,000 to $50,000. But stem cell researchers are forbidden to pay for eggs by ethical guidelines from some of the most influential scientific organizations in the world, including the National Academies, which advises the US government on scientific issues. California, Massachusetts, Canada, South Korea and the European Union all have passed laws barring payments. … But stem cell researchers argue that it is only fair to pay donors because of the time, discomfort and risks involved. They note that research subjects are compensated for their time."

Shelby Indicates Flexibility On Limiting Mortgage Giants' Stock Portfolios. Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby has indicated a new flexibility on the issue of specific limits on the stock portfolios of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Paletta, 2.03M) reports that Shelby's move "could clear the way for congressional passage of legislation toughening the regulation of" the mortgage giants. Shelby said that "as long as the risks posed by the companies' size are addressed, it might not matter if specific portfolio limits are written into law or if this is overseen by a strong new federal regulator."

Wyoming Courts Rust Belt Workers. The New York Times (9/13, Johnson, 1.21M) reports that Wyoming is courting Rust Belt workers, particularly Michigan's auto industry. According to the Times, "Wyoming economic development officials and company representatives are planning their third recruiting trip this year, visiting job fairs next month in Flint, Lansing and Grand Rapids. A billboard depicting a lush Wyoming will go up on the highway outside Flint later this month and be seen by an estimated 65,000 people a day. … So far, about 1,500 Michigan residents have signed up to receive job postings through the Wyoming work force Web site, and at least several hundred, employers and recruiters say, have moved to the state."

Chao Praises American Workers As Strong, Resilient. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao writes in The Hill (9/13) that five years after the 9/11 attacks, "America's economy is strong and growing — thanks to the strength, resiliency and competitiveness of our nation's economy and our workforce. The national unemployment rate (4.7 percent in August) is a full one percent lower than the 5.7 percent average for the decade of the 1990s. … After-tax income, per capita, has gone up by 8.9 percent since the beginning of President George W. Bush's administration." Chao adds, "America's greatest economic strengths are our workforce and an economic system that empowers the individual and creates limitless opportunities to build better lives. … With the right tools and skills, American workers can and will out-compete anyone in the world."

Norquist Says Companies Should Hire Lobbyists Who Share Their Goals. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and founder of the K Street Project, writes in USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) that he created the K Street Project in 1989 "to encourage trade associations and Washington offices of Fortune 500 firms to hire men and women who share their values and goals: low taxes, less spending, free trade -- and to avoid the pressures to hire for 'access.' … My goal is a Washington where labor unions hire big-government, tax-and-spend liberals because that is what they believe in -- regardless of whether the presidency or Congress is Republican or Democrat. And where businesses that want simply to be left alone should hire free-market men and women who understand that low taxes, limited government and an end to runaway labor union and trial lawyer abuses are good for America and good for their employees, customers and stockholders. Hire for principle and sound policy, not access."

USA Today Decries K Street Project's Philosophy. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) says that "one might think that a sense of shame would prompt Congress to clean up the stench, particularly with the elections a mere eight weeks away. Think again. Virtually nothing has changed. Nowhere is this clearer than in an organization called the K Street Project." USA adds that the philosophy behind the K Street Project "says a lobbyist's political ideology and donations are more important than his or her ability to marshal facts on behalf of the client. That kind of thinking explains why Washington is such a mess these days."

WPost Blasts Voting Problems In Montgomery County. The Washington Post (9/13, A16, 748K) editorializes, "Untold numbers of people were turned away from polling places yesterday in Montgomery County. The official responsible for their disenfranchisement called it 'a clerical error.' We call it gross incompetence that strikes at the very heart of our government. More than apologies are in order. … The county Board of Elections has one essential job -- to ensure fair elections -- and yesterday that job wasn't done." The Post adds, "Voters, Democratic and Republican, want one thing -- for their votes to count. The officials charged with that should take a hard look at yesterday's voting in Montgomery, as well as in Baltimore, which also experienced problems, and make sure there is not a repeat on Nov. 7."

NYTimes Praises Harvard Decision To End Early Admissions Plan. The New York Times (9/13, 1.21M) writes in an editorial, "Harvard did the right thing by abandoning its early admissions program." And "we hope other institutions follow its lead" because early admissions programs are "inevitably unfair" and increase "the frenzy of a college application process that is unnecessarily pressurized."

Islamic Militants Storm US Embassy In Syria. The AP (9/12, Ghattas) reports, "Syrian guards foiled an attempt by suspected al-Qaida-linked militants to blow up the US Embassy on Tuesday, exchanging fire outside the compound's walls with gunmen who shouted 'God is great' and tried to storm in with automatic weapons and hand grenades. The brazen, midmorning assault in a heavily guarded neighborhood of the capital could highlight the Syrian regime's weakening grip on militants, who have battled Syrian security forces repeatedly in recent years." The attack "left at least 10 civilians and a Chinese diplomat wounded."

McClatchy (9/13, Roumani, Strobel) reports Syria's interior minister, Gen. Bassam Abdul Majid, "told state-run television that the assailants tried to detonate two cars full of explosives next to the embassy. One car exploded, but another one failed to detonate, he said."

The Washington Times (9/13, Kralev, 88K) reports, "Three of the four attackers were killed in a shootout with Syrian police and one was arrested, US and Syrian officials said. … A State Department official said the attacker arrested yesterday was 'providing information,'" but "it was not clear whether US officials would be permitted to question him." The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Murphy, Roumani, 58K) notes "no American citizens were hurt in the assault, though a Syrian guard employed by the embassy was wounded but in stable condition, according to a brief statement by the embassy."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, McIntyre) reported, "According to Syria's Information Ministry, the assault began when heavily-armed gunmen detonated a car bomb near the American embassy and then tried to storm the US compound. They were met there by Syrian security forces which formed the outer line of defense at the embassy. Three attackers and a Syrian guard were killed. A fourth attacker was wounded and taken into custody. … There was quick praise from American officials. Although at the White House, it came with a dose of criticism." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow: "The Syrian police forces did their job and they were professional about it. Now the next step is for Syria to play a constructive role in the war on terror. Stop harboring terrorist groups, stop being an agent in fomenting terror, and work with us to fight against terror, as Libya has done. That's the next step for Syria."

The Financial Times (9/13, Saleh) quotes Snow saying, "Syrian officials came to the aid of the Americans. … The US government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided in going after the attackers. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists." The US, adds the Times, "withdrew its ambassador last year after Damascus was linked to the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, former Lebanese prime minister. Syria's support for the Lebanese Shia group Hizbollah and the Palestinian Islamist movement Hamas have also put it at odds with Washington." USA Today (9/13, 2.27M) also says the State Department "lists Syria as a supporter of terrorists, specifically Hezbollah in Lebanon."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 2, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported that Syria and the US "have had a fairly frosty relationship lately. Especially since the start of the Iraq war with the US accusing Syria of not doing you have no stop al Qaeda and other foreign terrorists from crossing its boarder to fight US forces here. But the Syrians did respond fairly quickly to the attack and the US is hoping that Syria will take a much firmer line from now on." CBS (Axelrod) added, "The White House hasn't said much beyond thanking the Syrian authorities for its response and pointing throughout illustrates the points the President was making in his speech last night from the Oval Office which is that there are many forces in the Arab world that would like to kill Americans."

ABC World News (9/12, lead story, 3:30, Gibson) reported, "The day of remembrance for 9/11 barely ended when terrorists launched another attack on another American target in still another country." ABC (Ross) added, "In Canada, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice offered begrudging thanks to the Syrians." Condoleezza Rice: "We expect the Syrians to carry out their duties. Even if we have very deep differences in the governments." Ross: "There have been 12 attacks on US Embassies since 1998. And the US has gone through all kinds of tests to figure out how to harden the sites. The tests include attempts to make new barriers and walls that the truck bombs can't get through. They've done a lot of work to make that happen. … The US has not met by any means all the standards that were met. They spent a lot less money than was required. And the last embassy will not be conformed until 2010." Gibson: "Eight years later, there's embassies that are not fixed up." Ross: "That's right."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 3, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) said "an obscure Islamist militant group calling itself the Soldiers of Greater Syria claimed responsibility. They're inspired by al Qaeda and they've bombed mostly Syrian government targets in the past, trying to topple Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. The US diplomatic sources were telling NBC News tonight that the fact that this group was able to penetrate such a secure, diplomatic zone suggests more attacks to come."

On the CBS Evening News (9/12, lead story, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M), Rice was shown saying, "I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people and we very much appreciate that." NBC (Roth) added, "That was a rare compliment for a nation accused by America of supporting terrorists, including Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. But Syria says it's fighting terrorism and today's the proof."

On Fox News' Special Report (9/12, Housely), Rice was shown saying, "I want very much to give condolences to those who lost their lives defending the embassy and among them, apparently Syrian security personnel. I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people and we very much appreciate that."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Fam, King, 2.03M) reports, "In a statement, the Syrian Embassy in Washington called the assault 'a heinous terrorist attack by an extremist group.'" But "it also lay the underlying blame on US policies in the Middle East, which the embassy said 'have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-US sentiment.'" The statement "urged Washington to 'take this opportunity to review its policies in the Middle East and start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace' for the region."

The New York Times (9/13, Smith, 1.21M) reports Tom Casey, the State Department's acting spokesman, said yesterday in response to that statement, "I think you have to take a look at who is really responsible for the violence in the region. … The violence is the responsibility of those who do believe that the only response to any questions or concerns is to throw bombs, is to shoot bullets, is to assassinate people." He said "Washington continued to consider Syria a sponsor of terrorism, alluding to its support for Hezbollah and the Palestinian group Hamas, both of which are considered terrorist organizations by the United States and many allies."

The Washington Post (9/13, A11, Roumani, 748K) reports, "In the months following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Syria shared information related to terrorism with the United States, but after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, President Bush blamed Syria for failing to close its border with Iraq to insurgents." The US Embassy compound in Damascus "is in the capital's diplomatic neighborhood, close to the Iraqi, Italian and Chinese embassies. It is surrounded by white walls described variously as eight to 15 feet high, with U.S. Marines providing security inside the compound and Syrian security forces outside." The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Stack, 918K) also reports the story.

US Sounds Skeptical Note On New Palestinian Government. The AP (9/13, Schweid) reports, "The Bush administration expressed worry Tuesday that a Palestinian national unity government now in formation may not be ready to renounce terrorism or accept Israel's right to exist." State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey also "reiterated that unless those conditions are met, the Bush administration would not resume US aid to the Palestinian government." The "skeptical comments" came "a day after the Hamas-led administration and President Mahmoud Abbas' more moderate Fatah Party said they would form a coalition government. In the past half-year international financial sanctions have crippled the Palestinian Authority's ability to pay its 165,000 employees." The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Richter, Ellingwood, 918K) runs a similar report under the headline "US Wary of Palestinian Plan."

Meanwhile, another AP story (9/13, Hadid) reports, "Hamas officials gave Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas the go-ahead Tuesday for negotiations with Israel, a major shift in the militant Islamic group's position as it works to end its international isolation." An Israeli military court, also yesterday, "ordered the release of 19 Hamas officials -- including Cabinet ministers and lawmakers -- from an Israeli prison. The men, arrested by Israel after the June 25 capture of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit by Hamas-linked militants, will remain behind bars for several more days pending an appeal by prosecutors." Israel "said the court decision was not meant to reward Hamas for its moves toward moderation."

Under the headline "More Palestinians Urging An End To Paralyzed Governing Authority," the Washington Post (9/13, Wilson, 748K) says "the unity government platform would commit Hamas to accept past agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization that recognize Israel." It "would mark the first time that Hamas, which does not belong to the PLO and has long opposed the 1993 Oslo peace accords that created the Palestinian Authority, would tacitly accept a two-state solution to the conflict." But "Hamas has so far refused to renounce violence or explicitly recognize the Jewish state -- two of the three conditions set by the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union for a renewal of aid." Israeli "officials indicated Tuesday that Israel would not release hundreds of millions of dollars in frozen tax revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority or support an easing of international sanctions against it unless those terms were met." The result "could doom the new coalition government."

Blair Urges Lifting Of Sanctions. AFP (9/13) reports, "Britain's Tony Blair urged the lifting of economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority, so long as a deal on a cabinet of national unity there meets international conditions." He "made the comments a day after returning from a three-day trip to the Middle East, during which he faced protests over his stance notably during the recent conflict between Israel and Hezbollah militants in Lebanon." Said Blair, "Yesterday's announcement of a government of national unity in Palestine is precisely what I hoped for. … On the basis it is faithful to the conditions spelled out by the Quartet, that is the UN, EU, US and Russia, we should lift the economic sanctions on the Palestinian authority."

Annan Says Israeli Withdrawal From Lebanon "Significant." The AP (9/12, Wadhams) reports, "Israel has made 'significant progress' in the gradual withdrawal of its forces from south Lebanon in the month since the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution to end the conflict there, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Tuesday in a report." The report "said both Israel and the Islamic militant group Hezbollah had mostly complied with the cease-fire that was called for in that resolution, aside from one major raid by Israel on Aug. 19 and several minor violations." Annan, "who recently returned from an 11-day trip to the region, said the process would be finished in the coming weeks. He did not say how many Israeli troops remained in south Lebanon."

More Commentary On Lebanon War. In his column for the New York Times (9/13, 1.21M), Thomas Friedman writes, "Listening to the post-Lebanon-war debate in Israel leaves me wanting to say just one thing to Israelis: Get a grip on. Israel is behaving like it lost the Lebanon war and now needs to tear itself apart, limb by limb, with investigations and new elections. Clearly the Israeli Army's logistics broke down, and clearly it was ill-prepared for a guerrilla war against Hezbollah. And clearly it is a sign of the health of Israel's democracy that Israelis feel free to castigate their leadership." Nevertheless, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "did a better job, under the circumstances, than he is being credited with, and, more important, the situation evolving in south Lebanon now has the potential to offer a whole new model for peacemaking."

Terror Attack Targets Kurdish City In Turkey. The AP (9/12, Harvey) reports, "A bomb struck a predominantly Kurdish city in southeastern Turkey on Tuesday, killing seven people and wounding 17, the local governor's office said." Authorities said "the bomb was made from powerful explosives and was set off by a cell phone timer. It was not immediately known who placed it, and nobody claimed responsibility." AFP (9/13, Bozarslan) says "eight people, among them six children, were killed" in Diyarbakir, "the largest city in Turkey's mainly Kurdish southeast, officials and hospital sources said."

Sarkozy Delivers Pro-US Message During Washington Visit. The Washington Post (9/13, Kessler, 748K) reports French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, "the leading presidential candidate for France's ruling conservative party, swept through Washington yesterday, delivering an unabashedly pro-American speech and landing meetings" with President Bush and Secretary Rice. Sarkozy "covered many of the bases that French politicians hit when they want to laud the United States, such as mentioning Lafayette's role in the American Revolution and citing the French love of blue jeans, hamburgers and American movies. But then he went beyond those standards, proudly noting that his distinctly pro-American viewpoint had earned him 'substantial criticism' in France." Sarkozy said, "I'm not a coward. I'm proud of this friendship, and I proclaim it gladly."

The New York Times (9/13, Sciolino, 1.21M) notes that Sarkozy, "on a four-day trip to the United States…pinned the Legion of Honor on the police commissioner of New York, honored firefighters in Midtown Manhattan for their losses on 9/11 and signed hundreds of copies of his new best-selling book on France's future." He "told Jewish leaders of his love of Israel, American business leaders of his love of free enterprise, and Francophiles of his love of America. He confessed that he loves to read Hemingway and watch movies like 'Miami Vice.'" He "was received by President Bush at the White House (an exceptional event for a mere minister) and by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, on Capitol Hill." Sarkozy declared in a speech before the French-American Foundation in Washington, "My devotion to our relationship with America is well known and has earned me substantial criticism in France. … I'm not a coward. I'm proud of this friendship, and I proclaim it gladly."

The Financial Times (9/13, Dinmore) runs a similar report under the headline "Sarkozy Looks To Closer Ties After Bush Era," in which it says "a bomb scare near the White House on Tuesday delayed a speech by…Sarkozy," but "only served to strengthen his personal pro-American, pro-Israel message while burnishing his presidential credentials overseas." However, "like David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservatives in an address in London a day earlier, Mr Sarkozy was clearly looking towards the post-Bush era, directing his enthusiasm at the American nation and not its current administration." Sarkozy "mentioned President George W. Bush only briefly and France's Jacques Chirac not at all. In fact the interior minister seemed to distance himself from his own president, speaking of French "arrogance" and calling for a new era in transatlantic relations."

Five US Agencies Monitor Cuba In Preparation For Castro Transition. The Miami Herald (9/13, Bachelet, 310K) reports, "Convinced that Fidel Castro will never regain the power he once wielded, the Bush administration has created five interagency working groups to monitor Cuba and carry out U.S. policies." According to U.S. officials "three of the newly created groups are headed by the State Department: diplomatic actions; strategic communications and democratic promotion. Another that coordinated humanitarian aid to Cuba is run by the Commerce Department, and a fifth, on migration issues, is run jointly by the National Security Council and the Department of Homeland Security." The Commission on Assistance to a Free Cuba, co-chaired by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, issued a report in July just before Castro's illness that "recommended more aid to Castro opponents, a diplomatic campaign to offset Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's alleged efforts to prolong communism in Cuba, and stricter enforcement of existing sanctions. It also recommended more coordination between government agencies."

State Denies "Rice-MacKay Innuendoes." The New York Times (9/13, Cooper, 1.21M) writes, "There are perils to being unattached in the stodgy world of diplomacy. Sometimes it has seemed that all" Secretary Rice "needs to do is show up in public with a man, and people start talking." The Times calls Rice the "single, sophisticated American secretary of state," and goes on to say that it "took a two-hour flight to Halifax, Nova Scotia, this week, followed by a 90-minute motorcade north up Highway 102 to Pictou County, for Ms. Rice to find herself linked to someone with similar star appeal: Peter MacKay of Canada, the single, sophisticated foreign minister, routinely named Canada's sexiest M.P. by The Hill Times in Ottawa, and the closest thing to eye candy on the diplomatic circuit." The State Department "has been quick to dump cold water over MacKay-Rice innuendoes. 'No, there were no candles,' Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said in exasperation when reporters asked for further details about a working dinner on Monday when the two sat side by side at the Pictou Lodge Resort."

Disagreement Over North Korea Hangs Over Bush-Roh Summit. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Ramstad, 2.03M) reports that when President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun meet today divisions over how to handle North Korea are expected to "provide an uncomfortable backdrop." According to Yale University professor of East Asian history Michael Auslin the "danger" is that the US and South Korea "aren't preparing for the long-term problem of what to do when the Kim regime ends." Meanwhile, "Bush and Roh are expected to focus mainly on matters on which the U.S. and South Korea are aligned, including the development of a free-trade agreement and plans to shift wartime control of their joint military command to a Korean general from a U.S. one, for the first time in half a century. That shift is likely to occur between 2009 and 2012." Those "issues are controversial in South Korea. Support for free trade divides along political lines, but opposition to Korean control of its military in wartime is broader, arousing fears that it is a step toward the withdrawal of U.S. troops."

The Washington Times (9/13, Sands, 88K) notes that former US ambassador to South Korea Thomas Hubbard "said he expected a 'productive meeting' between Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh, but acknowledged, 'We could do a better job managing the relationship.'" Meanwhile, "South Korean officials said last week that the two leaders may discuss but are unlikely to resolve one of the more ticklish bilateral issues -- a push by Seoul to reclaim operational control in wartime of its own forces."

IMF Says Global Imbalances May Threaten US Dollar. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, McDonald, 2.03M) reports, "The risk of a disorderly decline in the U.S. dollar could increase unless policies are put in place to address global savings-and-investment imbalances, the International Monetary Fund said." Investors are becoming more risk averse and the IMF "said emerging Asian countries should be more ambitious in increasing exchange-rate flexibility, the U.S. should consolidate its fiscal position and Europe and Japan should speed up structural changes." The IMF "noted that foreign holdings of U.S. assets continue to climb, rising to $6.3 trillion by June 2005 from $1.2 trillion in 1994."

Concerns Raised Over Increasing Chinese Exports. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Miller, 2.03M) reports, "The U.S., the European Union and Canada are set to file a joint complaint with the World Trade Organization against China's import tariffs on auto parts." It "marks the first time the Western allies have teamed up to seek a formal investigation by the global trade body in a dispute with the Asian giant." The Journal explains, "China exempts companies with factories in China -- such as General Motors Corp., Volkswagen AG and DaimlerChrysler AG -- from paying the tariff only if they buy at least 40% of their parts from local producers" which violates free-trade rules China pledged to meet when it joined the WTO in 2001. The rule handicaps foreign auto-parts suppliers competing for a share of the four million autos made every year in China."

The Washington Post (9/13, D1, Goodman, Blustein, 748K) notes, "Criticism over China's currency policy has alternately flared and subsided for several years, but the problem is reaching a new and potentially explosive stage as the Chinese export juggernaut moves up the ladder from clothes, toys and televisions to goods such as auto parts." It will be a topic of discussions at the IMF-World Bank meeting this weekend and when Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson visits China next week. While "some economists view the matter as overblown, others say the yuan's exchange rate is so far out of line as to constitute a dangerous distortion in global trade." According to Treasury undersecretary for international affairs Timothy Adams "China needs to do a lot more than just allow the yuan to appreciate. … Paulson's trip will also stress the need for Beijing to shift away from exports toward greater consumer spending. But Congress is pressing for action on the currency, with lawmakers threatening punitive tariffs on Chinese goods."

Profits Seen As Motive Behind Chinese Effort To Control Media. The Washington Post (9/13, A14, Fan, 748K) reports, "Journalism and human rights groups on Tuesday blasted China's efforts to further control the distribution of news and financial information by foreign news agencies, saying revised regulations showed that the government was tightening censorship." Yet "other experts said the impact of the new rules was limited in a country that already bans direct delivery of general news to Chinese media. They said the new rules signaled an attempt by China's state media to grab a piece of the lucrative financial information market."

The New York Times (9/13, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes that what Chinese "autocrats understand is how rich they've gotten since joining the World Trade Organization. These new rules appear, at a minimum, to violate their W.T.O. pledges to liberalize access to financial information. Trade officials and foreign business leaders need to remind Beijing's leaders of those promises. And they need to warn them that a country that keeps a stranglehold on information is not a great place to invest."

Lawyers For Chinese Advocate Protest Sentencing. Beijing-based lawyers Li Jinsong, Zhang Lihui, Li Fangping, Teng Biao And Xu Zhiyong in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) write that their client "Chen Guangcheng, a blind advocate for the rights of Chinese villagers," complain their client was recently sentenced unjustly and without fair representation and claim, "The real criminal suspects in this case are the officials responsible for obstructing justice and undermining the country's legal reform. These local officials could hardly have acted with such contempt and disregard for the law unless they had been given the green light by authorities higher up in the government. Nonetheless, in appealing Mr. Chen's case to a higher court, we will act on the assumption that the country's legal system can, without official interference, deliver a fair verdict and remedy wrongs. This may prove to be too optimistic. But we can only find out by fighting for justice, case by case, one client at a time."

Blair Receives Hostile Reception From British Labor Unions. The AP (9/12, Gardiner) reports, "Tony Blair received a tense farewell Tuesday in his last address…to the annual gathering of Britain's labor unions, with more than a dozen activists walking out as he began speaking to protest his pro-business stance and aggressive foreign policy." The AP continues, "Many others booed and hissed as he mentioned controversial topics such as Iraq. Blair snapped back at some of the hecklers and joked with others, frequently referring to his fraught history with the unions, traditionally an important part of his governing Labour Party's base but now disgruntled by its centrism."

The Financial Times (9/13, Adams, Taylor) reports that in his speech Blair "warned of the need to meet the challenges posed by globalisation, terrorism and migration. He defended Britain's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan." In the face of some in the audience waving "banners saying 'Blair Out', 'Go Now' and 'Troops Out', Mr Blair came close to losing his cool." Blair "said angrily: 'We should be proud of what we are doing to support democrats in Iraq and are proud of it.'"

Brown May Not Support Bush Foreign Policy As Ardently As Blair. Times Literary Supplement editor Peter Stothard in an op-ed describing the internal political bickering between supporters of Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chancellor Gordon Brown in the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) notes that Blair's with Brown in 1994 allowing Brown control over domestic policy "forced" Blair "more to the challenges of foreign affairs. Mr. Blair, a natural idealist, as rhetorical and risk-taking as the chancellor is pragmatic, laconic and cautious, was allowed an unusual freedom to follow those fundamental instincts, which he shared with the president, towards terrorism and Iraq." In contrast, Brown "would never have expressed the Bush doctrine with the passion that Mr. Blair deployed."

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) in an editorial writes that while "he has never outlined his views on Iraq or terrorism, Mr. Brown will not bring the same passion and moral suasion as Mr. Blair did to his foreign policy." After the 9/11 attacks Blair "eloquently explained that Islamic terrorism posed the gravest threat to free society today." Meanwhile, the Journal criticizes new Tory leader David Cameron who faulted US foreign policy and "wants a 'a new emphasis on multilateralism' where the U.N. 'confers the ultimate legitimacy.' If these are the new Tories, we'll take the French." In contrast, on the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks Former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher "urged Britain and the U.S. to stand firm against "Islamist fanatics who hate our beliefs, our liberties and our citizens.'" Her "remarks were interpreted as a rebuke to the new Tories" and "echoed so well Mr. Blair's views. For in reality, this Prime Minister is her worthy heir. His Labour party could never forgive him for that. History will be kinder."

Gates Launches Long-Term Effort To Solve Hunger In Africa. The Washington Post (9/13, A1, De Young, 748K) in a front page article reports that in an effort to seek a long-term solution for hunger in Africa the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and the Rockefeller Foundation launched "a new development initiative for sub-Saharan Africa that they said would revolutionize food production and reduce hunger and poverty for tens of millions of people." It will be based on "the Rockefeller-pioneered 'green revolution' that transformed farming methods and staved off widespread famine in much of the developing world nearly a half-century ago" and "is the first Gates venture into poverty and development after years of focusing largely on global health and education. The effort follows a doubling of the foundation's $30 billion endowment." The Post notes, "The Bush administration has increased U.S. aid to Africa significantly over the past five years, though much of it consists of food shipments and military assistance."

At Least 51 Killed In Yemen Stampede. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Dozens of people were killed in a stampede…in Yemen as the country's President wrapped up a political rally at a sports stadium. People still trying to enter were trampled by the crowds who were exiting. At least 51 people were crushed, hundreds of others injured."

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House, Senate Republicans At Impasse On Terror Bill. Fox News' Special Report (9/13, Hume) reported, "Congressional Republicans today struggled to work out their differences with the Bush Administration over legislation the President has requested governing the treatment of captured terror suspects and the tribunals before which they could be tried." Fox (Garrett) added, "There is now a full blown impasse in the Senate," and "for first time, Congressional Republicans and the White House are looking at the reality that this legislation will not be passed before Congress adjourns at the end of this month to campaign for reelection."

McClatchy (9/14, Talev, Rosen) reports "President Bush and trio of influential Republican senators appeared headed for a showdown Thursday as they suspended talks on legislation outlining how to try suspected terrorists." Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner "announced that his panel will meet behind closed doors Thursday to consider legislation that he's sponsoring along with Sens. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and John McCain, R-Ariz." Their bill "aims to set new rules for military commissions that try detainees; the Bush administration's current approach was invalidated by a June Supreme Court ruling. The administration prefers a competing proposal much like the one the court struck down that's moving through the House of Representatives and is supported by some Senate Republicans."

The New York Times (9/14, Lichtblau, Zernike, 1.21M) reports the impasse "signaled the tough road the White House faces in trying to sell…key planks in its national security agenda to sometimes skeptical Congressional Republicans less than two months before the midterm elections." Democrats "have allowed Republicans to fight among themselves over the issues, and appear willing to allow the issues to come to a vote rather than risk charges of political obstructionism in an election season." The AP (9/14, Flaherty), meanwhile, refers to "election-season divisions among Republicans on the high profile issue of security," and calls Warner's actions "a direct challenge to…Bush." Warner "said the administration proposal would lower the standard for the treatment of prisoners, potentially putting US troops at risk should other countries retaliate." The White House "said Warner's proposal would undermine the nation's ability to interrogate prisoners and arranged an extraordinary conference call with reporters in which the nation's top intelligence official criticized Warner's plan."

The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt, 88K) runs a similar report under the headline "GOP In Standoff On Gitmo Rights," in which it says "late yesterday, White House officials began calling Republicans on Capitol Hill to say that they have offered to negotiate about as far as they can. The White House is expected to issue some sort of official statement sometime today on where it stands." If the committee "alters the original bill today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is expected to bypass the committee and introduce the administration's proposed bill in the coming days and move it directly to the floor. There, amendments will be offered and public votes recorded."

USA Today (9/14, Kiely, Jackson, 2.27M) quotes Graham saying, "I have lost friends in this war. I do want to bring these people to justice. … But I can't say it enough. If we start acting like our enemy, we're going to lose." Meanwhile, "the House Armed Services Committee approved Bush's plan Wednesday and rejected a proposal similar to Warner's on a party-line vote. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has scheduled a House vote for next week." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino "expressed hope that 'we'll be able to reach resolution' with Bush's Senate critics."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Lueck, Rogers, 2.03M) titles its story "Senate-Panel Republicans Break With Bush Over A Tribunal Bill," and notes Bush "comes to Capitol Hill today to meet with Republicans on his agenda." Warner adds the Journal, "has begun to reach out to the State Department in an apparent effort to soften the opposition from CIA Director Michael Hayden. And Mr. Graham said Congress must view the legislation as a chance to start over and reassert ourselves as a rule-of-law nation in the eyes of the world.'" The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Neuman, Schmitt, 918K) also says Bush "plans a personal and rare visit to the Hill on Thursday to confer with House Republicans, who are feeling political pressure to distance themselves from an unpopular president and an unpopular war in Iraq."

Hunter Says House Democratic Bill Would Grant "Enormous Rights" To Terrorists. Rep. Duncan Hunter said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "I just finished the…passage of the terrorist court bill, which will allow us to try these terrorists, including the ones that designed this attack on 9/11. And the Democrats did offer a bill that gave more rights, more defendants' rights, to the alleged terrorists than my bill did. And they made a very passionate argument that we needed to give these additional rights to alleged terrorists. And they made an argument that the only way we could obtain a conviction, if it was the only evidence available, and that evidence came from an American agent who was undisclosed to the terrorists, that we would have to disclose that agent, and let the terrorist himself, face to face, know the identity of the American agent. Now, that's giving them enormous rights, and, I would say, to the detriment of American agents and American military personnel."

Schieffer Says Secret Prisons Akin To "Adopting The Methods Of Our Enemies." CBS Evening News (9/13, story 8, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The treatment of terror suspects is the topic of tonight's 'Free Speech.' The speaker is our own Bob Schieffer, chief Washington correspondent, and anchor of 'Face the Nation.'" Schieffer said, "I have no sympathy for those suspected 9/11 ringleaders. If the evidence proves them guilty, I hope they get the death penalty. But I'm glad they took them out of those secret CIA prisons. For me it's a matter of national security -- ours. Democracies have no business running secret prisons. That's what our enemies do. If we are in a battle for the hearts and minds of people around the world, as the Administration says we are, I won't feel very secure if the people around the world believe we are no different than our enemies. Of course, we must do all in our power to protect this country. During the Cold War, we built a mighty arsenal of weapons, and it kept the Soviet Union at bay for decades. But the weapons didn't win the war. We won when the people under Soviet domination could finally look across the Iron Curtain and see that open, democratic government made for a better life." Schieffer concluded, "Real security begins with remembering who we are. We gain nothing by adopting the methods of our enemies."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M) editorializes that there is "a legitimate debate to be had over waterboarding and other tactics," but "we hope the next '9/11' commission doesn't have to explain why the US stopped employing interrogation methods that were both lawful and successful."

The Washington Post (9/14, A20, 748K) says in an editorial that in "deciding between the two main proposals for handling and trying accused terrorists, the Senate confronts a fateful choice: Will it send President Bush, as he demands, legislation that would authorize the CIA to engage in interrogation tactics the world understands as torture, rewrite America's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, and authorize trials whose fairness many people at home and abroad will question? Or will the Senate approve a bill that ensures justice for foreign detainees and ends the CIA's secret detentions and harsh interrogations? The White House is pulling out all the stops to get the former. The question now is whether the group of Republicans who have courageously pushed a competing bill -- John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John W. Warner (Va.) -- will be able to team up with other moderate Republicans and Democrats to stop the excesses that have so damaged America's standing in the world." Having "finally been forced by the Supreme Court to take responsibility for writing law to govern the war on terrorism, Congress will now decide whether it simply means to sign off on the administration's past abuses, or reaffirm fundamental American values."

In his New York Times column (9/14), Bob Herbert says, "The character of the US has changed. We're in danger of being completely ruled by fear. Most Americans have not shared the burden of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Very few Americans are aware, as the Center for Constitutional Rights tells us, that of the hundreds of men held by the US in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, many 'have never been charged and will never be charged because there is no evidence justifying their detention.' Even fewer care. We could benefit from looking in a mirror, and absorbing the shock of not recognizing what we've become."

Senate Judiciary Panel Approves Eavesdropping Program. The Washington Post (9/14, A13, Weisman, 748K), under the headline "GOP Leaders Back Bush On Wiretapping, Tribunals," says "Congress's Republican leadership yesterday threw its weight behind two of President Bush's most controversial national security programs, warrantless wiretapping and extrajudicial military tribunals." However, "the party leaders are having trouble getting all their members on board, including the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. And by backing the president's legislative demands, the leadership risks being labeled by Democrats as a rubber stamp for an unpopular president. With prodding from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10 to 8 along party lines to approve a bill negotiated with the White House to allow -- but not require -- Bush to submit the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program to a secret court for constitutional review." USA Today (9/14, 2.27M) notes Republicans "defeated Democratic amendments to insert a one-year expiration date and require the NSA to report more often to Congress on the program."

Bloomberg (9/14) reports "the measure would authorize a secret court to rule on the legality of the National Security Agency's program to listen to the international calls between al-Qaeda operatives overseas and their suspected confederates in the U.S. without court warrants." Bush "agreed to the measure's wording in negotiations with Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the panel. By a series of 10-8 votes, the Republican-controlled committee defeated efforts by Democrats to change it."

Deputy Attorney General Says Restrictions On Surveillance Program Would Have Little Effect. CQ (9/13, Starks) reports, "A Justice Department official seemed to imply earlier this week, to the astonishment of some House Judiciary Committee members, that a bill aimed at reining in the Bush administration's warrantless wiretapping program would have little impact even if passed." Deputy Attorney General John A. Eisenberg "testified that New Mexico Republican Heather A. Wilson's bill (HR 5825) -- designed to update the law governing domestic surveillance while giving the president limited spying authority -- might 'reduce' the need for President Bush to use what he calls his Terrorism Surveillance Program (TSP)." But "when pressed by Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., on whether the measure would eliminate the need for the program, Eisenberg said, 'I think we just view TSP as separate from Wilson.'" His testimony, "combined with Bush's assertion of executive authority under the Constitution, has led some lawmakers to question whether the administration would follow a revised surveillance law."

Opening Arguments Made At Albany Terrorism Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/14, Virtanen) reports that in opening arguements at the trial of Albany mosque imam Yassin Aref and mosque member Mohammed Hossain, accused of material support of terrorism, "a defense attorney attacked the credibility of an FBI informant who posed as an arms dealer in a fictitious plot to kill a Pakistani diplomat." Hossain lawyer Kevin Luibrand said of the informant, "He's a convicted felon. He's a con man. … They got somebody that lied to the FBI completely and continuously about what was happening." Aref's attorney, Kent Sprotbery, said that "Aref was never shown any shoulder-fired missile, and testimony will show all three men thought the talk about attacking the diplomat was 'a joke.'" The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said the audiotapes and videotapes will show the informant impersonated an arms dealer in conversations with both Hossain and later Aref, that he told them the $50,000 came from the sale of the missile. … 'A sting is simply a crime of opportunity, where the opportunity was provided by the government,' Pericek said."

Under the headline "Prosecutors Weave Tale Of Zeal Gone Wrong," The Albany Times-Union (9/14, Lyons) reports, "The first day of testimony was at times disjointed and, in one instance, confusing as prosecutors called a Bangladeshi immigrant to the stand whose English was so poor, numerous court observers said they could not understand what he was saying." Meanwhile, Luibrand "assailed the FBI's informant as a 'convict' and 'con man' whom he contends misled FBI agents about the context of secretly recorded conversations the men had in Arabic and Urdu. 'He's called an informant,' Luibrand said. 'I have a few other words for him. ... Malik was giving a different message back to his (FBI) handlers than what was taking place in the room.'" The Times-Union adds that the first prosecution witness, "a Department of Defense official from Alabama, gave the panel a crash course on the destructive capabilities of a 5-foot long, Russian-made missile launcher that he hoisted atop his shoulder. … Aref was never shown the weapon, although he did see its metal triggering device at a later meeting."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intense FBI Search Continues For Al Qaeda Sleeper Shukrijumah. CNN yesterday ran two versions of Kelly Arena's report on the FBI search for Saudi-born Adnan el Shukrijumah, whom she described as "one of al Qaeda's most deadly sleeper agents and an urgent threat to the United States." On CNN's The Situation Room (9/13, Blitzer), Arena reported that el Shukrijumah "came to the United States when his family was just 2 years old. His father wanted what only America could offer his son. … But

Shukrijumah's American experience took a sharp turn in his mid 20s. Sources say he met an alleged al Qaeda operative who officials say helped turn him from a typical student into one of the most-wanted men in the world." FBI Director Robert Mueller: "Yes, he is dangerous. Yes, he had ties with persons who were al Qaeda. And we believe he shares the ideology. And if had the capability, would participate and attack himself." Arena: "The FBI says he has surveilled targets in Chicago, New York, Washington and Houston. And it's believed he came up with a plot to blow up apartment buildings." FBI Special Agent Stu McArthur: "He has great understanding and knowledge of how this country works and operates, and that, you know, underscores his dangerousness." The FBI believes that he is now somewhere in Pakistan. The US is passing out match books there with his picture promising a $5 million reward."

The version which aired on CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/13) included the comments from Mueller and McArthur, but Arena also interviewed FBI Special Agent Andrew Lenzen, lead agent on the case. Arena noted, "Shukrijumah studied at Broward Community College," and "he did really well, excelling in chemistry and computers. His father, an imam, tried to raise him right, to be a good Muslim," but after meeting alleged al Qaeda operative Ishmael Faeez, "Shukrijumah made his way to al Qaeda training camps, where it's believed he received extensive weapons training." Lenzen: "Adnan went to these camps and was not necessarily recruited but developed himself into an al Qaeda warrior. And part of that was that he started with these menial tasks, washing dishes, doing the chores of a low-level recruit to prove himself." Arena: "Lenzen says when Shukrijumah returned to south Florida, he had changed -- more calm, more self-assured. But before the 9/11 attacks, he left his family for good and didn't even return when his father died two years ago." Lenzen: "We can firmly say that al Qaeda is using his skill sets as -- his chemistry background and his computer expertise, his interest in making movies, to really fit well into the al Qaeda" agenda.

Miller Says Publicity Deprives Sleepers Of Needed Anonymity. Following the Arena piece, Zahn interviewed FBI Assistant Director John Miller and former CIA Counter-Terrorism Center Director Robert Grenier, asking Miller about Shukrijumah, "How much of a priority is it for the FBI to apprehend him?" Miller: "Well, it's a priority. As you saw in Kelli's report, it was announced by the FBI's director and the Attorney General some time ago that he was a priority," but "I want to add, Paula, that anonymity -- the ability to move in the shadows -- for an operator within a group like al Qaeda, is a key piece, and by adding him to these lists, by putting him on your show, by doing these stories, by having him on our Web site, we take away a lot of that am anonymity. We neutralize a lot of the abilities that would give us concern, the idea that he's comfortable in Western culture, that he's familiar with the United States, that he's got an ability to move around."

Later in the interview, Zahn said, "John, you were describing a little bit earlier on how this guy loses some of his anonymity by having his face plastered all over the Internet…which makes you wonder just how valuable you think average citizens are in this war, particularly in the search, perhaps, for home grown terrorists." Miller: "Well, very valuable. I mean, you take a case like this, an airline ticket clerk, an alert border official, a citizen on the street, you know, people think that the match books, which are put together by the U.S. Department of State as part of their rewards for justice program, is kind of a long shot or a little quaint, yet it was the match books and the advertising of the reward that led to the capture in Pakistan of Ramsey Usef, who was wanted in connection with the bombing of the first World Trade Center."

Zahn also said to Grenier about Shukrijumah, "We understand…that law enforcement believes that, in fact, 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed was actually giving him the instructions to keep the terror network alive in the United States. What does that say about his value to al Qaeda?" Grenier: "Well, obviously, this is someone who had that background in the United States, had the ability to move freely and is the sort of individual, perhaps among others, that al Qaeda would look to in order to carry out attacks in the future in the United States, particularly if their handlers and their trainers were to be captured or killed."

House Passes 9/11 Resolution 395-22 After Bitter Debate. The AP (9/14, Dalrymple) reports, "House Republicans and Democrats traded accusations of improper politicking Wednesday as they sparred over a resolution commemorating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks." Democrats "criticized the GOP-drafted resolution for praising controversial legislation, including the USA Patriot Act and a border security bill. Some faulted it for stating 'the nation is safer than it was on Sept. 11, 2001.'" House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi "called the resolution 'self-congratulatory.'" The bill's sponsor, GOP Rep. Peter King,

"called the criticism 'cheap demagoguery.'" Republicans "defended the inclusion of the GOP-crafted security laws and bills. Without them, said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., 'we would not be here today without having suffered another attack on our soil.'" The AP adds, "Despite the rhetorical battle, the resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks passed 395-22." The "intensifying quarrel between Republicans and Democrats" over national security "comes weeks before this fall's midterm elections, which will determine which party controls the House and Senate."

The Washington Times (9/14, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "While many Democrats characterized the Patriot Act as a violation of civil liberties, Republicans said it has broken up terrorist cells." Said Drier, "It is absolutely essential that those keeping us safe have every tool necessary to do so. … Our homeland has not been attacked again. That seems to be so often forgotten."

Democrats Blast Boehner Over Terrorism Comments. CNN's The Situation Room 99/13, Blitzer) reported, "Democrats are blasting the House Majority Leader John Boehner" over his claim that Democrats are "more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people." Sen. John Kerry "fired right back today," saying, "I'm not interested in asking Mr. Boehner for clarification or retraction or even an apology. His statement was very clear and I believe equally despicable. And his words are frankly beyond redemption."

Democratic Rep. John Murtha said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "I'm convinced they're desperate, for him to say something. He can't mean what he's saying. In this free country, if we disagree with the President when he's going in the wrong direction, and we want to change direction, you are going to have to speak out. We can't just go along with a policy which is a failed policy." Murtha added, "I think he owes all the members an apology who disagree."

Democrats Say They "Will Not Be Swift-Boated." The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Capitol Hill Democrats said yesterday they will not be 'swift-boated' by Republicans who accuse them of being soft on national security and coddling terrorists. 'Democrats stand ready to protect and defend the American people,' House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said. 'We will not be swift-boated on the issue of security, and that is what the Republicans are trying to do.'" Pelosi "was referring to the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which was highly critical of John Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004."

The Financial Times (9/14, Yeager, Luce) reports, "America's mid-term congressional elections, which take place on 7 November, are shaping up as one of the most bitter campaigns in recent US history. Although George W. Bush is not expected to play a prominent role on the campaign trail over the next seven weeks, the president has given a series of speeches in the past 10 days that have helped crystalise his party's att-empts to paint the Democrats as weak on national security." In an interview last Sunday, Dick Cheney "was more blunt in suggesting a connection between Democratic criticism of the Iraq war and being soft on terrorism. 'Suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw US forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion [and] validate the strategy of the terrorists,' he said." While "viewed by many as below-the-belt, such pugilism could be a small foretaste of what is to come."

Reid Calls Bush's 9/11 Address "Untoward." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid discussed President Bush's televised address on PBS NewsHour (9/13, Lehrer), saying, "If you look at his speech, all he did was take words that he had given all the previous month in his political speeches -- campaign speeches in Georgia, and other places in the country, exact same words. He had an opportunity, on that night, that solemn occasion, to bring America together, not point fingers -- and that's what he did -- not give a campaign speech. And I thought that it was untoward for him to do that."

Senate Republicans Reject Democratic Additions To Port Security Bill. The AP (9/14) reports, "Senate Republicans on Wednesday rejected a Democratic attempt to attach dozens of national security programs to legislation intended to protect seaports." The Democrats' proposal "had threatened the overall ports security bill, which would install monitors at the 22 largest ports. These devices would screen for materials used to make radiological bombs or nuclear weapons. The ports bill could come to a final vote on Thursday." The AP adds, "The plan by Democratic leader Harry Reid would have put Republicans in the awkward position of opposing security measures that many people in the United States believe are long overdue. Examples include improving safeguards on trains and buses and at chemical plants. … Democratic Sens. Bill Nelson of Florida, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Mark Pryor of Arkansas voted against Reid's proposal."

NYTimes Suggests Bush Team Putting "Corporate Profits" Ahead Of "Safety." The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) editorializes, "Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, seems determined to outdo his commander in chief in ratcheting up fears of Al Qaeda whenever he wants to score political points. This week, he raised the specter that if the government starts too many expensive antiterrorism programs it could further a plot by Osama bin Laden to 'drive us crazy, into bankruptcy' through overspending on homeland defense.'" The Times adds, "It was particularly ironic that Mr. Chertoff spun this theory while he was fighting off a measure, up for a vote today, that would help protect our ports against the threat that he himself deems most worrisome -- a nuclear explosion within our borders -- without government spending." The Times adds, "When it comes to homeland security, the Bush administration has repeatedly allowed corporate profits to trump safety. That seems to be the problem here, just as it has been when it came to the chemical industry's resistance to reforms that would help protect against toxic disasters if terrorists ever attacked their plants."

Terror Informant Sought Aid From Hillary Clinton. The AP (9/14, Hays) reports an "unusual exchange of letters between an undercover informant and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's office has apparently angered authorities and may have complicated the case of a man convicted of plotting to bomb a busy subway station." Osama Eldawoody, "a paid New York Police Department informant who was instrumental in exposing the 2004 subway scheme -- told The Associated Press that he wrote to Clinton last month, complaining that his law enforcement handlers misled him with false promises of a better life and asking her to intervene on his behalf." A written response "from Clinton, shared with the AP by Eldawoody, said she had 'requested a review of this matter and a written response' from federal prosecutors in Brooklyn. The letter also suggests Eldawoody seek help from Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, where he now lives." Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines "confirmed that her office had received the letter from Eldawoody, but said the senator was not personally involved in the written exchange and was unaware of the issue." Eldawoody "said in a telephone interview last week that he was summoned to a meeting with investigators and a federal prosecutor and was reprimanded for contacting Clinton and told not to do it again." The AP adds Eldawoody, 50, "was a key prosecution witness in the federal government's case against Shahawar Matin Siraj, who was convicted in May of plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in Manhattan."

Audit Finds California Homeland Security Funds Held Up In Red Tape. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Halper, 918K) reports a study released Tuesday by State Auditor Elaine M. Howle finds that "California's efforts to prepare for a terrorist attack or natural disaster are being undermined by a morass of red tape." Howles says in the report that "the administration of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has let tens of millions of dollars in federal emergency preparedness grants languish unspent and has not adequately tested the ability of California's medical facilities to handle mass casualties. … By the end of June, the state had spent less than half of the $954 million of federal homeland security grants it had been awarded since 2001, the report said."

Disruptive Airline Passenger To Be Arraigned Today In Virginia. The Washington Post (9/14, B1, Markon, Rondeaux, 748K) reports, "A professional jujitsu fighter from Brazil sat in a Loudoun County jail yesterday on a felony charge that he tried to open the cabin door of a Dulles-bound airliner as it cruised at 30,000 feet over Tennessee. Carlos Alberto de Oliveira, 43, missed his appearance in court yesterday morning because he fought with sheriff's deputies who came to escort him, Loudoun authorities said. He is expected to be arraigned today on a state charge of interfering with an aircraft's operations." The Post notes, "Although de Oliveira's motivations were unclear, federal officials have ruled out terrorism and concluded after interviewing him that he did not intend any harm. 'He didn't threaten anyone, he didn't hurt anyone. He wasn't intending to open the door, he didn't kick it,' said Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office. 'He just pulled a stupid stunt.'"

Cost Of Registered Traveler Could Kill Program. USA Today (9/14, Frank, 2.27M) reports a proposed cost of "up to $200" a year to participate in the "long-delayed" Registered Traveler program "could kill the program, advocates and lawmakers said Wednesday." The TSA "said last year that it expected to charge about $30 for a terrorism check. Now it wants to charge another $70 to pay for TSA screeners at Registered Traveler checkpoints, TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said. It also may charge an additional $20 for a criminal background check. Those costs are in addition to yearly fees of up to $80 that fliers would pay to companies operating the program. … The agency revealed the $100 fee on its website Monday with no publicity."

Democrats Seek Probe Of Former EPA Director On 9/11 Health Issues. The AP (9/14, De La Cruz) reports, "Democrats from New York and New Jersey asked on Wednesday for an investigation that could lead to criminal charges against former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christie Whitman for breathing problems suffered by thousands after the Sept. 11 attacks." The AP continues, "Whitman told The Associated Press that she and the EPA 'agreed then and I reiterate now that the air on the WTC site was not clean – the consequence of millions of tons of burned debris from the most horrific attack in our nation's history. … We were emphatic that workers needed to wear respirators, a message I repeated frequently.'" The AP adds, "At hearings last week in New York, Whitman was the most frequent target of lawmakers who charged that ground zero workers were not protected as they worked to clear the pile of toxic debris. … Whitman, a former Republican governor of New Jersey, declared in the days after Sept. 11 that the air in lower Manhattan was safe for workers and residents. But she has said she and the EPA always differentiated between the air quality in lower Manhattan and at ground zero." The AP notes, "Former Sept. 11 Commission chairman Thomas Kean, also a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said it was troubling that the Democratic congressmen 'would misuse the heroic service of thousands for their political gain in an election season.' … The congressmen – New York Reps. Jerrold Nadler and Anthony Weiner and New Jersey Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. – said the health of their constituents, and not politics, was their concern. … In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the trio accused Whitman of 'endangering the lives of thousands of people.' … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency had not yet received the letter."

FBI Assistant Director Rebuts Calls For US MI5. In a New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) op-ed, FBI Assistant Director John Miller writes that with the 9/11 anniversary and the disrupted airline bombing plot, "we are seeing another round of calls to break up the F.B.I. or to create a domestic intelligence agency separate from the F.B.I. with no police powers, similar to Britain's MI5. But these critics…seem to be unaware of two critical things. One is how far the F.B.I. has come in transforming itself into an intelligence-driven organization in the last five years; the other is how many attacks we have prevented in that span. Using intelligence and technology — and our authority to make arrests — the F.B.I. has stopped five terrorist plots in progress in roughly the last year alone." Miller adds, "As we break down the structure of Al Qaeda, we see the very shape of the terrorist threat changing and adapting. Our approach has to continually evolve to keep up. Starting over from scratch will only set us back and make America less safe."

Kerry Says Bush Administration The Real Source Of Harm For CIA. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (9/14), Sen. John Kerry says, "Your Sept. 12 editorial 'Jack Bauer Insurance' was a disservice not to me or to fictional characters like Jack Bauer, but to the very real CIA agents whose commitment to the truth didn't fit the administration's neoconservative agenda on Iraq, and to agents endangered by reckless administration policies. It's been reported that CIA officers refused to be trained in the administration's controversial interrogation techniques, and in at least one instance these techniques yielded questionable information aimed at pleasing the interrogators. The Supreme Court, not Democrats, ruled administration detainee policies out of bounds, and it was the outrage of Republican senators that forced the administration to apply the Geneva Convention to enemy prisoners in order to best protect captured Americans." Former CIA case officer Jim Marcinkowski "argued the Valerie Plame leak hurt 'the credibility of our case officers when they try to convince an overseas contact that their safety is of primary importance.' Former CIA agent Larry Johnson, a registered Republican, said it 'speaks volumes' that President Bush held no one accountable for the leak of an agent's identity." CIA officers "don't need Jack Bauer insurance -- they need insurance against the recklessness of this administration."

WAR NEWS:

Death Squads Blamed For 65 Bodies "Dumped Across Baghdad." Media reporting on Iraq focuses on the discovery of what ABC World News (9/13, story 4, 2:40, Gibson) called "65 men, most of them bound, tortured and shot," found "dumped across Baghdad. Officials believe they were the victims of sectarian death squads, roaming the capital." While that incident is the basis of most coverage, some reports suggest it is representative of the general situation in the country. In its lead story, CBS Evening News (9/13, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) said the "violence in Iraq just keeps getting worse." CBS (Logan) added, "American and Iraqi officials agree death squads now pose a greater threat to Iraq than the ongoing insurgency." At the Pentagon, CBS (Martin) added, "Sectarian violence, Iraqis killing Iraqis, has become what the Pentagon calls the greatest threat; in breaking the cycle of violence, the most pressing role. … There's still no time table for Iraq, but the months between now and the end of the year are shaping up as crunch time."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) called it "an especially gruesome day in Iraq," reporting that in addition to the bodies found "despite the massive security crackdown underway right now," at least "39 other people were killed today in other attacks and dozens more were wounded. The US military announced the deaths of two more American soldiers just today." McClatchy (9/14, Brunswick, Ahmed) calls the discovery of the bodies "a setback to the U.S. military's efforts to reduce sectarian violence in Iraq's capital city." The "apparent resurgence in execution-style murders, which are often associated with sectarian violence and death squads, came as U.S. and Iraqi patrols have been sweeping Baghdad neighborhoods in search of insurgents and sectarian militiamen."

The Washington Post (9/14, A16, Paley, Ibrahim, 748K) reports "nearly 100 people were killed or found dead in the Iraqi capital over the past 24 hours, authorities said Wednesday, continuing a wave of sectarian violence that has defied American efforts to thwart the carnage." The Los Angeles Times (9/14, McDonnell, Barnes, 918K) reports that "on a day in which nearly 100 bodies attested to Iraq's unbridled violence, Democrats stepped up their response to President Bush's policies." In its front page headline, the New York Times (9/14, Oppel, 1.21M) simply says, "On Another Grim Day, Bodies Lie Everywhere In Baghdad."

Sunni Leader Demands Government Action To Disarm Militias. An AP (9/13, Quinn) story carried by more than 80 newspapers and websites leads by reporting Adnan al-Dulaimi, whose Iraqi Accordance Front is Iraq's largest Sunni political party, "demanded Wednesday that the beleaguered Shiite-led government take steps to disarm militias" after the bodies were discovered. Dulaimi said, "We hope the government carries out what it pledged and disbands militias and considers them terrorist organizations."

Baghdad Emergency First Responders Profiled. ABC World News (9/13, story 5, 2:50, Gibson) took a "rare inside look…at what might be called 'Baghdad 911': Iraq's first responders. When violence erupts in the capital, as bodies are found as they were today, the first call goes there. The number rings often. And recently, they have been very busy."

Khamenei Says US Withdrawal Would End Iraq Instability. The AP (9/13, Dareini), in a report carried by more than 80 newspapers and websites, says Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told visiting Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki that the "way to end instability in Iraq is for U.S. forces to withdraw." Maliki is in Iran "looking to a close ally of his Shiite-led government for help in calming the violence tearing apart Iraq and in developing Iraq's troubled oil industry," the AP says.

Annan Says Mideast Leaders See Iraq War As "A Real Disaster." The Washington Times (9/14, Pisik, 88K) details press conference remarks by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan that "Washington's options in Iraq are constrained by competing pressures from countries in the region for the U.S. to stay or to leave quickly. 'The U.S. has found itself in a position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave. And if it has to leave, the timing has to be optimum and it has to be arranged in such a way that it does not lead to even greater disruption or violence.'" Annan added that "most regional leaders felt the U.S. occupation of Iraq had harmed their countries. 'Honestly, most of the leaders I spoke to felt invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them. They feel it has destabilized the region.'"

Murtha Resolution Seeks Rumsfeld Resignation. The Hill (9/14, Tiron) reports Rep. John Murtha, "echoing moves in the Senate," is seeking the "immediate resignation" of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. In his resolution, Murtha "lists a litany of reasons for Rumsfeld's immediate resignation, ranging from the secretary's insistence that there were weapons of mass in destruction in Iraq to his failure to anticipate the number of troops needed to secure Iraq and to address the flagging readiness of U.S ground troops." Meanwhile, Rep. David Obey said Wednesday, "The Defense Secretary should return to the private sector."

Carter Says Cheney Deliberately Misled American People On Iraq. Ex-President Jimmy Carter was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (9/13) about Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion that criticism of the Iraq war emboldens US enemies and makes allies doubt American resolve. Carter said, "The Vice President unfortunately has been consistently very careless with the truth. He still maintains some preposterous comments and attitudes toward the origins of the Iraqi war, the circumstances in Iraq now and he's had a policy in my opinion of deliberately trying to mislead the American people by making untrue statements and there's no reason to give any credence to his ridiculous claims that you've just described."

Reid Says US Needs "To Change Direction" In Iraq. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said on PBS NewsHour (9/13, Lehrer), "We need to change direction in Iraq. We need to make sure that people understand that we can't be there forever. We're not for moving out right away, but we believe there should be a redeployment that would start by the end of this year.""

Korb, Ogden Say Sending More Troops To Iraq No Simple Task. In a Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K) op-ed, Lawrence J. Korb and Peter Ogden of the Center for American Progress respond to the September 12 op-ed "Reinforce Baghdad" by William Kristol and Rich Lowry, which called for a substantial increase in US troop numbers in Iraq. Korb and Ogden write, "Aside from the strategic dubiousness of their proposal…there is a practical obstacle to it that they overlook: Sending more troops to Iraq would, at the moment, threaten to break our nation's all-volunteer Army and undermine our national security. This is not a risk our country can afford to take. … The only way for Kristol and Lowry to put their new plan into action anytime soon without resorting to a draft -- and thereby dismantling the all-volunteer Army, which, as the authors themselves would certainly admit, could be strategically disastrous -- is by demanding even more from our soldiers by accelerating their training and rotation schedules. While there is no question that the soldiers would respond to more frequent calls to duty, it is doubtful that they would be supplied with proper equipment and training for their mission in the near term. Moreover, the long-term toll on the cost and quality of our troops would be threatened by the added strain."

NATO Nations Fail To Agree On More Troops For Afghanistan. In a straightforward report, the AP (9/13, Garwood) says NATO nations "failed to agree on calls by military commanders for 2,500 extra troops to help crush the growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan, where at least 50 people were killed Wednesday in widespread violence." The Washington Times (9/14, Kralev, 88K) runs a more critical story under the headline "NATO Allies Ignore Call For Troops," leading by saying NATO allies "failed to answer Washington's call to commit more troops to the escalating battle with Taliban and al Qaeda fighters in Afghanistan yesterday, prompting the Bush administration to rethink its diplomatic strategy ahead of two meetings of alliance ministers later this month."

Poland Is "Best Hope" For Fresh NATO Troops. The Financial Times (9/14, Dombey, Fidler, Cienski) reports Poland "emerged on Wednesday as Nato's best hope of more troops for Afghanistan." The Polish Defense ministry said Poland, "which has announced plans to withdraw its 900 soldiers from Iraq, was in talks with its Nato allies about where and when they would be deployed in Afghanistan. Poland, which has about 100 troops in Afghanistan, has already announced it will send about 900 extra soldiers to the country from 2007."

Army Did Not Take Out Taliban Members Spotted At Funeral. An NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 3, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M) report on Afghanistan is sympathetic to soldiers on the ground and seems critical of commanders and rules of engagement. NBC reported, "We have a story that that has do with a single photograph. It is a surveillance photo taken in Afghanistan" showing "a gathering of Taliban fighters. But some say it shows more than that. Some say it shows what was a perfect opportunity to take out the enemy but the military was unable to take the shot. The question is why." NBC (Sanders) added, "Army intelligence officers say the photo shows 190 members of the Taliban at a funeral two months ago. The US Army claims among those in formation, high ranking members of the Taliban leadership. An unmanned armed Predator was spying on the group. Intelligence officers monitoring the scene in real time wanted to fire. They asked permission but the request went to intelligence analysts, senior commanders, and lawyers. The intelligence officers were told no. They were not allowed to fire. Why? US rules of engagement do not permit waging war in a cemetery. … Meantime, the Taliban fight by their own rules. On Monday at a funeral for an a government official, a Taliban bomber blew himself up killing six policemen."

In a follow-up, NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 4, 1:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said, "Actually, there is a little bit of confusion here tonight. A senior Pentagon official tells us that the rules of engagement did not prevent the commanders on the ground in Afghanistan from launching air strikes against that grouping of Taliban. Now, these rules are set in place to avoid serious accidents such as killing of innocents or destruction of sensitive religious sites but there are exceptions. If the value of the target outweighs the potential collateral damage, death of civilians or cultural backlash, then commanders are able to take the shot. … Officials tonight think that the commanders in Afghanistan blew the call and they should have taken the shot."

Pentagon Says Military Will Meet Recruiting Goals. The Washington Times (9/14, Scarborough, 88K) reports the US military "will meet wartime recruiting goals for the fiscal year that ends in two weeks," according to the Pentagon. The Times says that "despite Washington's heated political debate on the worthiness of the Iraq war, frequent overseas war deployments and daily casualties, officials say a sufficient number of young men and women are signing up."

Gay Rights Groups Revive Push For Reversal Of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." The New York Times (9/14, Alvarez, 1.21M) reports that as the "Pentagon's search for soldiers grows more urgent, gay rights groups are making the biggest push in nearly a decade" to reverse the 1993 "compromise policy…dubbed 'don't ask, don't tell,' that bars openly gay people from serving in the military." But the "move to change the policy faces stiff resistance from the Pentagon and Republicans in Congress, who, in a time of war during a tough election year, have no longing for another contentious debate about gay troops." A House bill to "do away with the policy" has "picked up 119 supporters, but only five of them Republicans."

DOJ:

Gonzales Seen As Legal Architect Of Anti-Terror Strategy. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (9/14), Jose De La Isla writes, "President Bush has finally announced that 14 terrorist suspects will go on trial. He has acknowledged the detainees have been in CIA hands and are now in military custody. Congress still has to authorize court procedures for the trials. This is a pivotal moment. It is a 'paradigm change,' a time when one conceptual way of understanding could give way to another." De La Isla continues, "Alberto Gonzales, as Bush's legal counselor in the White House before becoming U.S. attorney general, will continue as a central character. He is without peer in putting the policies together. … Not since Robert F. Kennedy was working for his brother JFK have the White House and Justice Department driven such fundamental change. The enigmatic, secretive Gonzales will have a lasting effect on future presidencies." De La Isla adds, "Before going to the White House, Gonzales had been Gov. George W. Bush's legal advisor, Texas' secretary of state, and then chief justice on the state Supreme Court. … He was from the beginning a close, trusted member of the Bush team. … What Karl Rove has been to Bush's political planning, Gonzales has been to legal strategy." De La Isla continues, "Before 9/11, Gonzales had assembled a group of lawyers, mainly members of the Federalist Society, in the White House's Office of Legal Counsel. The conservative organization holds that the Constitution has a fixed and knowable meaning and they oppose interpretations that cast it as having an evolving significance. … He and his group were leaders on legal policy issues, even over the Justice Department, national security advisor Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell at the State Department, mostly because Gonzales had the president's ear. … From the White House, Timothy Flanigan, Bradford Berenson and Brett Kavanaugh, among others, sought to fast-track, streamline and broaden presidential authority." De La Isla notes, "The attacks of 9/11 only accelerated that approach, called 'forward leaning,' to anticipate, detect, detain and prosecute suspects and those who maintained ties to or supported suspected terrorist activities. … Much of what happened next is widely known. … The fast-tracking, streamlining, and broadening of presidential powers rolled over Congress, which granted broad authority in its resolution of Sept. 14 and the Patriot Act. Otherwise, Congress was not a full partner in granting and overseeing war powers. Now it has to decide whether to go along with the Bush administration's proposal for trying terrorists. … Through it all, Gonzales was there, in the middle of the legal justifications for the hallmarks of this administration. He had a hand in or he could have intervened before ideas reached the president on paper. But to the legal team that worked for him, the assumption all along was Alberto Gonzales represented the direction the president wanted."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lockyer Says HP Charges Possible Within A Week. The AP (9/14, Robertson) reports, "Criminal charges could come within a week in the boardroom spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co., the state Attorney General's Office said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Spokesman Tom Dresslar did not say who would be charged or what the charges would be. He also emphasized that it may take longer for the detailed investigation to produce charges. … 'We're not going to confine ourselves to any particular timetable,' Dresslar said. 'We'll go when we're ready to go, and not a minute before that.'" The AP adds, "On Tuesday, Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he already had enough evidence to charge HP insiders and the private investigators who impersonated board members and journalists in order to access logs of their personal phone calls. … 'We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside,' Lockyer told PBS' 'NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.' … He has said HP's internal probe of media leaks violated two California laws governing identity theft and illegal access to computer records. … The FBI and the U.S. attorney for Northern California are also investigating HP for illegal computer intrusion and wiretapping. The company also faces inquiries by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission and the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee."

Lockyer Takes Center Stage In HP Drama. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Carlton, Emshwiller) reports, "Now that Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board has taken steps to address its investigation of boardroom leaks, attention is firmly fixed on Bill Lockyer, the California attorney general who has made high-profile pledges to bring any lawbreakers to justice." The Journal continues, "In an interview yesterday, Mr. Lockyer added that he is looking beyond a Boston-area investigation firm linked to the H-P probe to a 'complicated chain' of parties in multiple states that may have taken part in a practice called 'pretexting,' in which private phone records were obtained under false pretenses. He said he has spoken about the case with Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly, whose office is cooperating." The Journal adds, "Mr. Lockyer's remarks indicate that his investigation has expanded well beyond the borders of California. They also raise the profile of a man who many people outside the state have never heard of, a veteran brawler who has shown little hesitation in going after legal scofflaws and political foes."

USA Today (9/14, Kessler) reports, "The Department of Justice, FBI, House Energy and Commerce Committee, and Securities and Exchange Commission also have launched inquiries. … But outspoken Lockyer may be HP's biggest threat. The life-long politician is often 'greatly underestimated,' says Los Angeles defense attorney Mark Geragos, who is both Lockyer's friend and rival." USA continues, "Lockyer has held state office since 1973 without ever losing an election. He earned his law degree while simultaneously serving as a state senator. As attorney general, he has taken on energy giants and the Bush administration. He once left his own wedding reception to appear on television about the Laci Peterson murder trial. … But the HP case will be a challenge, legal experts say. In an attempt to stop leaks to the press, HP hired a detective firm, which hired a subcontractor. Employees of the subcontractor pretended to be HP board members and journalists to get their phone records."

Small Boston Firm Is Key Link In Probe. The New York Times (9/14, Richtel, Darlin) reports, "California prosecutors looking into the Hewlett-Packard spying case are focusing in part on a small private investigation firm in suburban Boston, operating out of a yellow house with black shutters in a quiet neighborhood." The Times continues, "How such a tiny firm ended up handling work for H.P., one of the largest technology companies in the world, as it tried to find out who had leaked company secrets is not clear. But other private investigators said on Wednesday that the situation was not surprising, because corporations in need of such services often end up relying on a chain of subcontractors." The Times adds, "Prosecutors will have to follow that chain as they pursue those responsible for gaining access to the phone records of journalists and company board members. … It is common practice for a company's head of security, its general counsel or its outside law firm to hire a security consulting firm, which often hires smaller firms, like the one prosecutors say was involved in this case, Security Outsourcing Solutions in Needham, Mass. … Those firms then hire freelance investigators to do work like surveillance or the acquisition of phone records. … The small firms provide skills that larger firms may not have, but they also offer another benefit. Using middlemen can insulate the company that has ordered the investigation from any shadowy activities, private investigators said."

The Washington Post (9/14, D03, Nakashima) reports, "According to the Web site for Security Outsourcing Solutions, it provides support services to in-house security departments and evaluates and addresses corporate security risks. … It caters to small- and medium-size companies and those that do not have full-time security departments. The Web site says the company has a 'global network of over 40 affiliated professional investigative firms.' … The firm, founded in 1998, has 10 employees and reports annual sales of $990,000, according to Dun & Bradstreet Inc."

HP Hires Morgan Lewis For Help In Probe. The California Recorder (9/14, Scheck) reports, "It only looks like Larry Sonsini is doing all of Hewlett-Packard's legal work. … In fact, the troubled tech company has hired Morgan, Lewis & Bockius as it tries to fend off various criminal investigations into whether its board of directors broke the law by having an investigator lie to gain access to board member phone records." The Recorder continues, "On Monday, Morgan Lewis lawyers sat down with San Francisco federal prosecutors in hopes of forestalling federal criminal charges. … The Monday meeting involved a 'proffer' -- a normal step these days in white-collar investigations, in which a company under scrutiny offers up information to the government with certain conditions, as a means of showing good-faith cooperation with investigators. … John Hemann, a Morgan Lewis partner who was at the meeting -- and who was until last year a white-collar prosecutor with the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office -- didn't want to talk about HP on Tuesday. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Krotoski, the chief of the office's criminal division, is the lead prosecutor handling the investigation. He referred questions to a spokesman, Luke Macaulay, who confirmed the investigation but would not discuss its details." The Recorder notes, "The focus of the federal query remains unclear, but the fast-multiplying probes into the matter have Silicon Valley lawyers abuzz with the possibility that attorneys, either at HP or at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, could be ensnared."

Silicon Valley's Image Tarnished By Probes. The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Johnson) reports, "Silicon Valley has long been the stuff of dreams, a place where gawky entrepreneurs create billion-dollar companies in their garages, their innovations sometimes bending the rules but forever changing the way we listen to music or chat with friends. … But lately, it seems, the valley has shifted from a shiny beacon of capitalism's promise into a shadowy target for investigators." The Post continues, "Last week Securities and Exchange Commission officials told Congress that they were investigating 100 companies for possibly rigging their compensation systems to guarantee lucrative payments to executives and favored employees. That figure includes many technology firms whose volatile stock prices sweetened the incentive to engage in improprieties. … Even Hewlett-Packard Co., the standard bearer for ethics among Silicon Valley's home-grown technology community, is hustling to move forward after the resignation Monday of its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, amid investigations by prosecutors and federal lawmakers over whether directors' phone records were illegally accessed. Prompted by concerns that a board member leaked information to the press, the HP debacle is shedding light on the valley's insular culture, where secrets are prized and key players have multiple and sometimes conflicting obligations." The Post adds, "No industry has been immune to executive greed or governance lapses in recent years. The era's most disastrous collapses, of Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., occurred far from Silicon Valley. But the same mind-set that inspired so many technology entrepreneurs probably contributed to a breakdown in sound business practices, regulators said."

WSJournal Criticizes Lockyer's Comments On HP. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M) says that while HP's "leaker chase" was "was one of the dumber corporate decisions of recent times," it "hardly justifies California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's decision to go on national TV and publicly allege that crimes were committed before any charges have been filed. … Even assuming crimes were committed, it is irresponsible for any prosecutor to make such bald criminal assertions in public before he makes them in court." The Journal adds, "Even rich corporate defendants deserve due process, however, and someone at the California bar should call Mr. Lockyer on his prosecutorial misconduct."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/14), Michael S. Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, and author of 'Bill and Dave: How Hewlett and Packard Built the World's Greatest Company,' to be published in Spring 2007, writes, "When the story broke about the crisis in the boardroom at Hewlett-Packard last week, the almost universal reaction here in Silicon Valley was: What would Bill and Dave have done?" Malone continues, "The spirit of Bill Hewlett and Dave Packard still haunts high tech, especially the Valley. A quarter-century after the two men stepped down from the day-to-day management of the company they founded, their business philosophy still stands as the ultimate example of enlightened management -- and as a perpetual rebuke to executives who fall short of their lofty standards. … Nowhere is this more true than at Hewlett-Packard itself. It's one thing to run some semiconductor company on paranoia, or an enterprise software firm on fear. You can always rationalize your abusive management as necessary to succeed in a uniquely competitive market. But violate the precepts of the HP Way -- management by objective, pushing decision-making down through the organization, deep trust in your employees -- at HP and you have to convince the world that your results will outperform what was perhaps the most successful corporate stewardship in U.S. business history." Malone argues that Hewlett and Packard "always operated on trust and openness, but also with a strong hand. They would never have allowed the board to sink into civil war. We can also assume that they would have skipped the skullduggery and presented the leak problem to the assembled board at the beginning, and requested a full buy-in on any investigation. That alone would likely have plugged the leak. Given that HP under their leadership was never allowed to speak ill of a competitor to the media, we can also guess that Bill and Dave never, ever would have approved any investigation against reporters. And as men who had grown a company from a garage to a billion-dollar multinational corporation, they were wise enough to know that you can't buy the cloak without getting the dagger. … Finally, Hewlett and Packard firmly believed that you don't fire loyal employees for being beyond their competence; rather, you move them to where they can make the best contribution. In demoting Ms. Dunn, but still keeping her on the board, Mr. Hurd did the right thing. He did what Bill and Dave would have done. … Look next for deep and sincere apologies to everyone involved. That's the HP Way. Mark Hurd is learning fast."

DOJ To Review Corporate Cooperation Guidelines. The National Law Journal (9/14, Coyle) reports, "During a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Tuesday, a top U.S. Department of Justice official acknowledged that the so-called Thompson Memo on the attorney-client privilege in corporate investigations has ignited complaints across the legal and business landscapes, but he vigorously defended the current policy as a sound one. … 'I've got the [Senate Judiciary] chairman and ranking chairman upset; former department attorneys general and other officials complaining. Everyone is complaining,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. 'But I believe the perception of how this works is different from the reality. … I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice that is being described by groups.'" The Journal continues, "Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and ranking minority leader Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both former prosecutors, questioned McNulty and a panel of critics of the Thompson Memo on how that memorandum -- the department's internal policy guideline on charging corporations -- affects the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in corporate investigations. … The Thompson Memo tells a prosecutor to consider nine factors in determining whether to charge a corporation for criminal wrongdoing. One of those factors is whether the corporation has cooperated in the investigation. In assessing cooperation, the memo says, one consideration is whether the corporation waived attorney-client and work-product protections. … A coalition of business and legal organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Bar Association, Association of Corporate Counsel and National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, contends that the memo has created a 'culture of waiver' in which federal prosecutors now routinely demand waiver of attorney-client and work-product protections even where there are less intrusive means of getting information. … 'It's just one part of one factor,' insisted McNulty. 'It's not an investigative issue; it's a charging issue. If [the corporation] has cooperated, which they almost always do, that's when the issue -- do you have an internal investigation report? -- comes up. The text of the memo itself says this is one factor to be considered. We're giving [prosecutors] the option to consider it.' … But Specter countered, 'As I read this policy, I think it is coercive and may even rise to the level of being a bludgeon. I would ask you to reconsider the policy.'"

Former SEC Head Breedon To Run Adelphia Victims Compensation Fund. The AP distributes an article from Dow Jones Newswires (9/14, Bray) that reports, "Former Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Richard C. Breeden will administer the compensation process for victims of a massive accounting scandal at Adelphia Communications Corp., prosecutors said Wednesday." Dow Jones continues, "The U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan said Breeden, chairman of Richard C. Breeden & Co., has been retained to serve as a special master overseeing the compensation process. … Last year, Adelphia agreed to pay $715 million in cash and stock to settle Justice Department and SEC charges stemming from an accounting scandal that plunged it into bankruptcy. Prosecutors have called it one of the most extensive financial frauds on record." Dow Jones adds, "In 2004, Adelphia founder John Rigas and his son Timothy Rigas, the company's one-time chief financial officer, were convicted of pocketing more than $2 billion from Adelphia for their own personal use and misleading investors about the company's finances and performance. … Last year, John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison, while Timothy Rigas was sentenced to 20 years. Both men, who remain free on bail, have appealed their sentences. … In March, Michael Rigas, another son and former Adelphia executive, was sentenced to 10 months of home confinement after admitting last November that he filed a Form 13D with the SEC that falsely stated he had conducted an inquiry into the source of funds used for a purchase of Adelphia shares in late 1999. The certification was kept in Adelphia's records."

Gonzales Awards Exceptional Service Award To Enron Task Force. Law Week Colorado (9/13) reports, "More than 230 Justice Department employees – along with 42 other individuals, many of whom are federal employees and law enforcement officers – were honored today at the Department's 54th Annual Awards Ceremony at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty joined the Attorney General in presenting the Department's highest award, the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, to the outstanding members of the investigative and trial team of the Enron Task Force, who were recognized for their exceptional service to the American public and the Department in the investigation and successful prosecution of the individuals who were most responsible for the Enron fraud."

OFHEO Likely To Sue Former Fannie Mae Officials. The AP (9/14) reports, "The two executives who led Fannie Mae to an $11 billion accounting scandal can expect federal regulators to file lawsuits against them, the head of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said Wednesday. … 'We will more than likely be filing litigation against them,' OFHEO director James Lockhart said during a speech at the American Enterprise Institute." The AP continues, "When later asked by reporters if legal action was likely against Fannie Mae's former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and the mortgage finance giant's former chairman and chief executive Franklin Raines -- who was White House budget director under President Clinton -- Lockhart did not name names but did say 'they are the top two.'" The AP adds, "Last month Fannie Mae announced -- and the Justice Department confirmed -- that the criminal investigation against it had ended after two years. Fannie Mae, whose accounting scandal came to light in September 2004, has been ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission to restate its earnings back to 2001 -- a correction expected to reach around $11 billion. … Fannie Mae reached a civil settlement in May with the SEC and the OFHEO, agreeing to pay a record $400 million fine after OFHEO found serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation by the company. … Earlier this week, Freddie Mac -- Fannie Mae's smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market -- said it would not face criminal charges in connection with its own multibillion-dollar accounting scandal. … The Justice Department began investigating the accounting of Freddie Mac, which is the second-largest financer of home loans in the country, after it disclosed in June 2003 that it had misstated earnings by some $5 billion -- mostly underreported -- for 2000-2002."

The Washington Post (9/14, D01, O'Hara) reports, "Lockhart's agency has power to lodge only civil or administrative complaints. The Securities and Exchange Commission is also weighing civil action against former Fannie Mae executives. The Justice Department last month said it had closed its criminal investigation of the company's accounting scandal, though it is looking at whether Raines and Howard committed perjury in congressional testimony about Fannie's accounting practices." The Post adds, "One lawyer with knowledge of the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to publicly speculate on OFHEO's intentions, said the agency could file a lawsuit before the end of the year. One thing OFHEO may be waiting on: the completion of a mandatory investigation by Fannie's independent directors to determine whether the company itself should sue Raines, Howard or others. The results of that investigation are due at the end of next month. … Such strong statements from Lockhart are not new. In May, after his agency and the announced the $400 million fine against Fannie Mae, Lockhart took aim at the $52.8 million in bonuses Raines received during the six years the company used improper accounting. … In addition, since neither Raines nor Howard were technically fired by the company when the accounting improprieties came to light in 2004, both men took home millions of dollars in severance payments, and Raines received retirement pay of $114,000 a month for the rest of his life."

Grasso Seeks Judge's Recusal In Compensation Case. The New York Law Journal (9/14, Bar) reports, "The battle over former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's multi-million dollar compensation package continues to heat up." The Journal continues, "Grasso's attorneys have filed a motion asking Justice Charles Edward Ramos, the presiding judge in the case, to reassign the matter to a different judge. … 'Throughout this lengthy case, the Court has steadfastly expressed its desire that this significant case be handled in a way that engenders public confidence in the justice system,' attorneys for Grasso said in papers filed with the court last week. 'At this time, reassignment of the case would best serve that important goal.'" The Journal adds, "Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has challenged Grasso's total compensation under New York's not-for-profit laws. … Gerson A. Zweifach of Williams & Connolly who represents Grasso, laid out three grounds for recusal in the motion. The first stems from ex parte settlement talks with Ramos, which Grasso entered into based on the court's "advance agreement not to serve as trial judge should Mr. Grasso object." … After the judge decided to conduct a bench trial to address the separate issue of whether Grasso's compensation of more than $139 million was reasonable, Grasso sent a letter to Ramos expressing concerns over his continued involvement with the case. … 'Having obtained Mr. Grasso's and his counsel's consent to participate in an ex parte conference based on this commitment, it would be improper, to say the least, for the Court now to try the case over Mr. Grasso's objection.' … The second grounds for recusal, Zweifach said, were that Ramos, during the course of the settlement discussions, expressed views on 'factual and legal issues that lie at the heart of any upcoming trial.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Touts Work Of Katrina Fraud Task Force. The AP (9/14, Foster) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales credited a task force he established a year ago with deterring fraud in the Hurricane Katrina relief effort, citing as evidence money returned to the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency." The AP continues, "Gonzales addressed members of the Hurricane Katrina Task Force Wednesday, the first anniversary of its creation, during an appearance in New Orleans, where the hurricane flooded 80 percent of the city on Aug. 29, 2005. … 'People need to know that they will not get away with these crimes,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "The report released at the meeting said that by Oct. 17, 2005, the task force had charged 36 people in 17 cases with hurricane-related fraud. By Sept. 6, 2006, Gonzales said that number had grown to more than 400 people charged in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation. … Most task force prosecutions in the past year involved fraud in obtaining individual assistance benefits from FEMA and the Red Cross, the report said. … Between them, the agencies had more than $18.2 million returned by recipients individual aid, the report said, calling it a 'sign that our prosecutions are deterring fraud.'"

WGNO, ABC 26, New Orleans (9/14, Murphy) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales spent Wednesday in New Orleans getting a one-year report from his National Katrina Fraud Task force. … He predicts fraud cases will rise as more and more federal recovery dollars reach the Gulf Region. … 'Billions of dollars are headed to the Gulf Coast region for the rebuilding effort,' said Gonzales. 'We know that fraud, sadly follows dollars.'" WGNO continues, "Gonzales a group of prosecutors and law enforcers meeting at the Downtown Sheraton, so far his Katrina Fraud Task force is responsible for 400 arrests nationwide, half of them in Louisiana and Mississippi. … 'It is disturbing to see not only the volume of fraud, but the lengths to which people will go to take advantage of others sufferings,' said Gonzales."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/14, Finch) reports, "Despite the task force's success in making Katrina-related fraud cases for everything from public corruption to identity theft, it faces an enormous job ahead: keeping tabs on the billions of dollars of government money now in the pipeline to help rebuild the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast region. 'When the criminals find an easy route for money, they tend to return for more, giving law enforcement an opportunity to stop it,' Gonzales said. He devoted his first remarks at the podium to New Orleans' struggle to recover from the hurricane at the same time it is contending with a rising tide of crime. 'This great city cannot return to its former glory if it's being held hostage by criminals,' he said, adding that the federal government is doing all it can to help the city's struggling criminal justice system."

CNN.com (9/14, Frieden) reports, "More than 400 people -- including government and charity workers -- have been charged so far with illegally benefiting from Hurricane Katrina and the ensuing flooding, according to a Justice Department report released Wednesday. … However, the Katrina Fraud Task Force hasn't even begun to skim the waters, and the number could climb into the thousands, the report stated on the first anniversary of the task force. … 'Disaster relief agencies have reported to law enforcement that they have identified thousands of questionable or possibly fraudulent payments to purported hurricane victims,' the report said." CNN adds, "To date, the multi-agency command center in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, has received more than 6,800 complaints or tips for investigators to pursue. … The prosecutions of negligible fraud schemes has had a deterrent effect, as ineligible recipients of aid have voluntarily returned $18.2 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the American Red Cross, the report says. … Most of the cases have involved people trying to obtain assistance from FEMA or the Red Cross, though cases of identity theft, procurement fraud and public corruption are emerging, the report states."

Judge Drops Two Counts Against Gotti, While Defense Questions FBI Transcript. The New York Times (9/14, Williams, 1.21M) reports, "A federal district court judge dropped two counts against John A. Gotti yesterday involving two of his businesses that prosecutors claimed had been set up and operated with illicit funds. The charges had been added by the government for Mr. Gotti's third racketeering trial, but Judge Shira A. Scheindlin said prosecutors had not offered sufficient proof to support the charges." The Times adds, "Also yesterday, in what could prove to be a critical development, Mr. Gotti's lawyers questioned whether Mr. Gotti could be heard saying on a secretly recorded F.B.I. tape that he was angry about being demoted from the top echelon of the Gambino crime family to a captain. … While the words on the tape are difficult to make out, the F.B.I. transcription of the recording reads: 'I'm a captain? What happened? And when I get out, I want to see this kid. He can send me all the love letters he wants, I don't have to answer to him.' But Steven Dobies, who prosecutors say is an associate of the Gambino crime family, testified that he was present during the conversation and never heard the word 'captain' used."

Newsday (9/14, DeStefano) notes, "Despite the dismissal…Gotti still faces serious racketeering conspiracy and related charges, including allegations he was involved in extortion, loan-sharking and the 1992 beating of…Curtis Sliwa." Newsday adds, "Under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Dobies insisted that he never passed messages of a criminal nature for Gotti. Dobies also said that Gotti stated a number of times in 2002 and 2003 that he wanted nothing to do with his former mob associates, wanted out of the mob life and wanted to get away from New York. Questioned about Gotti's anger that his uncle Peter and others had allegedly stolen his father's money, Dobies said that Gotti believed it was money that was due his mother and sisters." The New York Post (9/14, Cornell, 608K) also reports on the ruling under the headline "Judge Whacks Two Charges Against Gotti." The AP (9/14, Neumeister) also reports this story.

Final New York Gambino Crackdown Defendant Pleads Guilty. White Plains Journal News (9/13, O'Connor) reported, "The last defendant in the massive roundup of the reputed leaders of the Gambino crime family has joined the ranks of his convicted compatriots." Louis "Little Louie" Natrella pleaded guilty on Tuesday "to conspiring to defraud the United States, conspiring to operate an illegal numbers business, illegal gambling and operating an illegal numbers business. … 'We are very pleased with the efforts of the investigative team,' said David Velazquez, the senior supervisory resident agent in charge of the FBI's White Plains office, 'and the resulting clean sweep of 32 convictions for 32 defendants.'" The Journal News noted, "Natrella was accused of operating a thriving Gambino numbers operation in the Bronx that was handed down to him by longtime Gambino associate Leonard Minuto Sr. from Dobbs Ferry."

Heron Says Mafia "Wounded But Not Dead." U.S. News and World Report (9/12, 2.03M) reported on its Web site, "'Anybody who thinks that the Mafia is breathing its last breath is just wrong,' says Matt Heron. Heron oughta know-- he's just finished running the FBI's Organized Crime Section in New York and is moving down to FBI headquarters in Washington this month to oversee its anti-mob operations nationwide." The many successful prosecutions "make it tempting to ignore the mob in this age of terrorism. But the cases also suggest just how active the Mafia remains. 'We've hit them very hard, but they keep adapting and regenerating,' says Tom Metz, acting chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Section. There's also a new generation of smarter, more educated mobsters. … Call it the New Mafia -- their members tend to avoid thuggish acts like extortion and murder in favor of white-collar crimes, like Internet and stock market frauds." US News adds, "There's too much money to be made. 'It's an organization that's wounded but not dead,' says Heron, who's worked Mafia cases for 20 years. 'It will never be dead.'"

Las Vegas Bribery Case Bagman Agrees To Plead Guilty. The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/14, Thornton, 337K) reports, "Lance Malone, a strip club mogul's bagman who was convicted in a San Diego corruption scandal last year, has agreed to plead guilty in the parallel Las Vegas case on the eve of his trial. Malone pleaded guilty in exchange for a sentence of about 50 months in prison that would run concurrently with a sentence in the San Diego case, said a source close to the defense." The Union-Tribune notes, "Malone is accused of bribing Las Vegas politicians with cash, lap dances and ski-school tuition in exchange for votes that would benefit strip clubs owned by his boss, Michael Galardi. If a judge approves the agreement, it would avert the trial in Las Vegas, which is set to begin Monday." The Las Vegas Review-Journal (9/14, Packer) also reports on the plea agreement.

FBI Investigating Kansas City Councilwoman. The Kansas City Star (9/13, 278K) reported, "An attorney representing Saundra McFadden-Weaver acknowledged Tuesday that there was an ongoing FBI investigation involving the Kansas City councilwoman. Attorney Ron Partee confirmed the FBI investigation the same day the city's ethics commission launched its own investigation into her involvement in $400,000 in mortgages for a Lee's Summit home." The Star notes, "McFadden-Weaver asked for the ethics investigation after The Kansas City Star reported in August that she obtained the loans, apparently with no money down. Loan documents stated she would occupy the home outside the 3rd District, which she represents."

FBI, New Jersey Police Arrest 22 Alleged High-Level Crips Members. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/14, Schuppe) reports, "Nearly two-dozen reputed members of the Crips gang have been arrested on federal gun and drug charges in what U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie promised would be the start of a lengthy multi-agency campaign against street gangs and other violent criminals in Essex County. … The 22 reputed Crips members -- including the leader of a chapter called 98 Main Street Mafia and ranking members of three other factions -- were arrested by FBI agents and local police in roundups that started Tuesday and continued yesterday morning in East Orange, Irvington and Newark." FBI Newark SAC Leslie G. Wiser said, "This is an important step in our goal to cripple the Crips." The Star-Ledger notes, "The arrests marked a first significant step in a joint effort by federal and local authorities to reduce gun violence in Essex County by focusing on gangs and guns." Essex County Sheriff Armando Fontoura said, "There's a frustration here of revolving door justice…but when you come into the U.S. Attorney's Office with the FBI, there's plenty of room for you, and there will be no revolving door, and you will no longer be preying on the people of Essex County."

The AP (9/14) reports FBI Newark spokesman Steven Siegel said, "These are upper-echelon guys, not just street dealers." Siegel added that "the arrests were unrelated to raids carried out in Britain and New Jersey Wednesday morning that broke up an arms trafficking operation supplying guns to criminals in London. More than 100 federal and local agents, including an FBI SWAT team, participated in the early morning street gang arrests."

Missouri Crips Leader Convicted Of Murder, Drug Trafficking. KMBC-TV Kansas City, MO (9/8) reported, "A federal jury convicted the former leader of the 51st Street Crips gang…of three homicides, drug trafficking and firearms violations. Steve L. 'Moody' Wright, 23, of Kansas City, was found guilty on 15 counts contained in a 2004 federal indictment. Federal authorities said that Wright and other members of the street gang were repeatedly involved in illegal drug trafficking and had guns that they used to protect their drug supplies and drug profits. 'Wright's modus operandi was to rob other drug dealers, often shooting to kill, steal their supply of drugs, then sell them for profit,' U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said a news release." The Kansas City Star (9/9, Rizzo, 278K) also reported on Wright's conviction.

British Library Urges US Judge To Give Map Dealer Longer Sentence. The New York Times (9/14, Cowan, 1.21M) reports rare map dealer Edward Forbes Smiley III pleaded guilty in June "to having stolen 97 rare maps from some of the world's leading universities and libraries, a staggering haul estimated at about $3 million." Among the "items taken was the centuries-old map by Peter Apian that was ripped from a book Mr. Smiley found at the British national library. Because of that $100,000 map, and three more missing maps that the British Library believes Mr. Smiley may have snatched, the library is arguing that he deserves more than the 57 to 71 months in prison that prosecutors and Mr. Smiley's lawyers backed at the time of the guilty plea. In a legal brief dated Wednesday, the library's lawyer, Robert E. Goldman, urged Judge Janet Bond Arterton of Federal District Court to impose a harsher sentence — of at least 78 to 97 months — when she revisits the case on Sept. 27."

The AP (9/14) adds, "Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted. 'Smiley's actions ripped at the heart of our public institutions which stored, protected and made available to the public over centuries maps which provided a bridge between past and future generations,' the library wrote. One of the stolen maps had survived civil war, royal intrigue, economic depression and the Nazi bombing of London. 'They had been cared for and preserved for centuries until Smiley ripped them from their volumes and slid them into his coat,' the library wrote."

Moroccan Court Sentences Zotob Defendants To Prison. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, B3, Bryan-Low, 2.03M) reports, "Authorities in Morocco sentenced two individuals for their role in unleashing an Internet worm dubbed Zotob that infected computer networks at hundreds of companies last year." The court "on Tuesday sentenced Farid Essebar, a 19-year-old student and a Moroccan national born in Russia, to two years in prison. Another student, Achraf Bahloul, 21, received a one-year prison sentence." The Journal notes, "The case, which U.S. and Moroccan authorities say they believe is connected to a credit-card theft group in Turkey, illustrates how geographically dispersed cybercriminals have become." The AP (9/14) also reports on the sentencings.

California DNA Program Hobbled By Funding Shortfall. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Weinstein) reports, "Two years after California set out to create a vast DNA database to help unravel tens of thousands unsolved crimes, the program is being severely hampered by a lack of resources, officials across the state say." The Times continues, "The state crime lab has a backlog of more than a quarter-million DNA samples it is unable to process because of a funding shortfall and a lack of manpower, directors acknowledge. At its current rate of progress, the lab would have to spend 2 1/2 years to clear the backlog -- if it received no more samples, which is hardly likely, since it is currently taking in about 20,000 samples a month, officials said." The Times adds, "State officials, Los Angeles police officers and the director of the Santa Monica Rape Treatment Center say the backlog means that crimes are going unsolved and that criminals who could be nabbed may still be walking the streets. … The problems stem from overly optimistic funding projections when California voters in November 2004 resoundingly passed Proposition 69, designed to make the state the nation's leader in the use of DNA technology as a crime-solving tool. … Prop. 69 requires all convicted felons, certain misdemeanor offenders and those arrested for rape or murder to give up DNA samples. Prison officials swab offenders' mouths with an object called a buccal which looks like a tongue depressor. The samples are subjected to genetic testing, and the results are uploaded into the FBI laboratory's Combined DNA Index System, known as CODIS. The database can be run against evidence from crime scenes for DNA matches that will help identify new suspects."

Virginia Officials Mistakenly Free Murder Suspect. The Washington Post (9/14, B1, Vargas) reports, "Prince William County officials accidentally released a man charged with murder and didn't notice the mistake until five days later, authorities said yesterday." The Post continues,

"Authorities said that they have no idea where Christopher T. Broady is and that he is dangerous. … 'He is on trial for murder so that should give you an indication of the seriousness of this, of how hard we are trying to get him back,' Manassas Detective Christine Perry said. 'This is a priority. . . . It is number one.'" The Post adds, "Broady, 19, is charged with shooting a D.C. man in the head in an apparent drug dispute. He walked out of jail Friday, and the mistake was not noticed until Tuesday. … 'He could be anywhere. He could be in Arizona, Mexico, South America,' Prince William Commonwealth's Attorney Paul B. Ebert (D) said. … Jail officials and prosecutors said Broady was released in a period of confusion after murder charges against him had been dropped in Prince William Circuit Court but were pending in General District Court. … Broady is charged with killing Bernard S. Matthews, 22, on Feb. 1. Matthews was shot and left lying near Bruckner Road in the Georgetown South community of Prince William. The slaying made headlines because another man robbed Matthews before police could take him to the hospital. He died the next day. … A week later, authorities found Broady in Danville and charged him with murder in Matthews's slaying and possession of a firearm in the commission of a felony. He told his girlfriend's father that the shooting was over drugs, according to court testimony by the father, James Holmes."

Fourth Animal Rights Activist Sentenced To Prison For Threat Campaign. The AP (9/14) reports, "A fourth animal rights activist who helped incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals was sentenced Wednesday to prison. Joshua Harper, a West Coast coordinator for Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, was sentenced to three years in prison and was ordered to help pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people he helped terrorize. … Two other members of the group still await sentencing: Andrew Stepanian, SHAC's New York coordinator, and Darius Fullmer, an organizer who researched the group's targets. They were scheduled to be sentenced Tuesday." The AP notes, "The defendants, all in their late 20s or early 30s, were not accused of directly making threats or carrying out vandalism." The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) and Philadelphia Inquirer (9/14, 399K) each ran truncated versions of the AP story.

Reid's Call For Polygamy Task Force Sparks Dispute. The Salt Lake Tribune (9/14, Burr) reports, "At least one Utah congressman says the federal government should be more involved in prosecuting polygamy crimes, while others say the matter is largely a concern of state and local law enforcement. … 'Crimes against children cannot be tolerated,' Rep. Jim Matheson said in a statement Wednesday. 'I would support additional federal assistance to help prosecute these crimes.'" The Tribune continues, "The state's lone Democrat in Congress was responding to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's call a day earlier for a federal task force to investigate polygamist activity in the West. … The Justice Department said Wednesday it is reviewing a letter from Reid to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to appoint a team to probe, and prosecute, if necessary, accusations of 'systemic child abuse' in 'this modern day polygamy movement.' … 'For too long, this outrageous activity has been masked in the guise of religious freedom,' wrote Nevada's Reid, who is LDS. 'But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated. Individuals who force minors into adult relationships and marriage must be brought to justice.'"

The Deseret Morning News (9/14, Winslow) reports, "Polygamous groups are upset over a Nevada senator's call for a Justice Department probe into their lives and activities. … 'It is disconcerting to have a senator take a real strong position on that,' said one Utah polygamist, who asked the Deseret Morning News not to use his name. He said all of his wives are consenting adults. 'It appears to be a reaction to (Warren) Jeffs and the FLDS culture.'" The News continues, "Members of the polygamous community of Centennial Park, Ariz., called Reid's request a 'modern-day witch hunt.' … 'Polygamy is not a federal offense but is to be regulated under the prerogative of state's rights,' said Joyce Steed of the Centennial Park Action Committee. 'Therefore, one could question what his justification is for asking the federal government to target their efforts on an unpopular minority. We can be sure polygamy does not represent a personal moral issue for the senator, coming out of the state that has legalized prostitution.'" The News notes, "The FBI has been investigating Jeffs and had put him on its Ten Most Wanted list. Jeffs was arrested last month during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas. He is currently being held in Hurricane's Purgatory Jail without bail pending a Sept. 27 court appearance. … The U.S. Attorney's Office has filed an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against him, but would not say if it was conducting its own investigations."

Court To Consider Reinstating Conspiracy Charge Against DeLay. Texas' highest criminal appeals court has agreed to consider reinstating a conspiracy charge against former Rep. Tom DeLay. According to the AP (9/14, Castro), the court's move "could delay his trial until next year." A state district judge "threw out one of two conspiracy charges in December and let the money laundering charge stand. Prosecutors asked the appeals court to reinstate the dropped conspiracy charge, a move that has postponed trial proceedings on the other charges."

New York Brothers Arrested In Medicaid Billing Conspiracy. The New York Times (9/14, Pérez-Peña) reports, "Two brothers, a doctor in Brooklyn and an owner of pharmacies in Brooklyn and Queens, led a conspiracy that defrauded Medicaid of millions of dollars by billing the program for H.I.V. drugs and other medicines that were never given to patients, federal prosecutors say." The United States attorney's office "announced the arrest yesterday of the brothers, Dr. Muhammad Ejaz Ahmad and Muhammad Nawaz Ahmad, and a third man, Mohammad Tanveer, a pharmacy employee, on charges of conspiracy to defraud the government, punishable by up to five years in prison. The complaint against them points to a larger conspiracy, involving 'others known and unknown.'" The United States Attorney's Office "would not put an overall dollar amount on the cost of the fraud against Medicaid, the joint federal and state health plan for the poor. But the complaint states that for just three antiviral drugs — among many medicines used to treat H.I.V. infection and its side effects — the three pharmacies billed Medicaid for $2.5 million for drugs that they never received from their distributors."

CIVIL LAW:

Plame Sues Armitage Over Leak. The AP (9/14, Apuzzo) reports, "One-time covert CIA officer Valerie Plame sued the former No. 2 official at the State Department on Wednesday for violating her privacy rights." The AP continues, "The suit does not accuse Richard Armitage, who was deputy secretary of state in the Bush administration, of participating in an administration conspiracy to blow her cover. … Plame added Armitage's name to a civil suit in U.S. District Court against Vice President Dick Cheney, his former chief of staff I. Lewis Libby and White House adviser Karl Rove." The AP adds, "Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, say the White House leaked Plame's identity as retribution for Wilson's criticisms of prewar intelligence on Iraq. … Armitage admitted last week that he told two reporters in 2003 that Plame worked for the CIA, but he said the disclosure was inadvertent. Armitage said he knew of no plan to leak Plame's identity; some people said the admission disproved the conspiracy theory. … By adding Armitage's name to the suit, Plame's lawyers set up a different scenario. They contend a White House conspiracy existed, but that Armitage's leak was independent of it."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/13, Blitzer) reported, "Outed CIA operative Valerie Plame and her husband Joe Wilson, have added another name to the civil suit. Lawyers representing the Wilsons say they'll now sue…Armitage." The Wilsons' lawsuit "already includes Vice President Dick Cheney, his former chief of staff Louis Scooter Libby and presidential adviser Karl Rove." The Wilsons "say the White House leaked Plame's name after former Ambassador Wilson criticized the pre-war intelligence on Iraq. Even though he's been added to the suit, lawyers say Armitage was not involved in the alleged White House conspiracy."

Novak Says Armitage Distorted His Role In Plame Leak. The Washington Post (9/14, A12, Smith, 748K) reports, "Columnist Robert D. Novak, who first revealed Valerie Plame's employment by the CIA and touched off a lengthy federal leak investigation, is accusing his primary source of misrepresenting their conversation to make the source's role in the disclosure seem more casual than it was." In "an unusual column that appears today," Novak "says his initial source, former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage, was more sure of Plame's ties to the CIA than the source has indicated." Novak "adds that Armitage linked her directly to her husband's CIA-sponsored trip to Niger and suggested the disclosure would be a good item for Novak's column." This "differs from Armitage's assertions last week that his disclosure was made in an offhand manner and that he did not know why Plame's husband was sent to Niger." Armitage, "in an interview yesterday, said he stood by his account and disputed Novak's."

In his column (9/14, A21), Novak writes, "First, Armitage did not, as he now indicates, merely pass on something he had heard and that he 'thought' might be so. Rather, he identified to me the CIA division where Mrs. Wilson worked and said flatly that she recommended the mission to Niger by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. Second, Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column." Novak adds, "An accurate depiction of what Armitage actually said deepens the irony of his being my source. He was a foremost internal skeptic of the administration's war policy, and I had long opposed military intervention in Iraq. Zealous foes of George W. Bush transformed me, improbably, into the president's lapdog." But "they cannot fit Armitage into the left-wing fantasy of a well-crafted White House conspiracy to destroy Joe and Valerie Wilson. The news that he, and not Karl Rove, was the leaker was devastating for the left." Novak also writes that Armitage's "silence for…2 1/2 years caused intense pain for his colleagues in government and enabled partisan Democrats in Congress to falsely accuse [Karl] Rove of being my primary source. When Armitage now says he was mute because of special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's request, that does not explain his silent three months between his claimed first realization that he was the source and Fitzgerald's appointment on Dec. 30, 2003. Armitage's tardy self-disclosure is tainted because it is deceptive."

Widow Of Anthrax Victim Sues US. The Palm Beach Post (FL) (9/14, Kleinberg) reports, "Maureen Stevens says the federal government probably knows who killed her husband. … She believes they're not telling because that might reveal things the government doesn't want revealed." The Post continues, "Nearly five years after Bob Stevens' death, the first in the anthrax attacks that terrified a nation, 'I want to know what happened,' his widow, who's sued the government, said Wednesday from her lawyer's office. [I want to go into court and find out what happened. What information's obviously there. The truth is there.'" The Post adds, "Bob Stevens of Lantana, a photo editor for Boca Raton-based tabloid The Sun, died in October 2001, after he apparently opened mail laced with the deadly substance. … The government said in February of 2002 that it had a "short list" of 18 to 20 people who had the knowledge, equipment, access, and motive to obtain and 'weaponize' anthrax. Richard Schuler, Stevens' attorney, said Wednesday it might be fewer than a dozen. … Stevens filed suit in December 2003, alleging security lapses at the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases in Fort Detrick, Md., led to her husband's death. A federal judge refused to dismiss the case and it has been in front of a federal appeals court for nearly a year. The government has argued proceeding with the suit would jeopardize the ongoing search for the killer. … In Washington, Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said he could not comment because the suit is still active."

Judge Questions Smokers' Data In Tobacco Class-Action Hearing. The New York Law Journal (9/14, Perrotta) reports, "A federal judge Wednesday expressed skepticism over a proposed class action lawsuit that would seek as much as $200 billion in damages against the tobacco industry for its allegedly deceptive marketing of light cigarettes." The Journal continues, "In a daylong hearing, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein wondered how the plaintiffs could define a viable class -- and accurately assess damages -- when the tens of millions of people who have smoked light cigarettes might have chosen to do so for any number of reasons." The Journal adds, "While the plaintiffs in part rely on a study that shows 90 percent of light-cigarette smokers were attracted by perceived health benefits that experts now claim do not exist, Weinstein said consumers could have relied on those perceived benefits to varying degrees, or even known that those health benefits were illusory. … 'How many people deep down knew they were getting something dangerous, but were willing to pay for the illusion it wasn't?' Weinstein said. … He added: 'You can't get away from the contention of the defendants that every smoker is somewhat different.' … Michael D. Hausfeld of Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington, D.C., a firm for the plaintiffs, said the tobacco industry's marketing had the goal of shifting its buyers to light cigarettes, beginning in 1971, because of growing health concerns about smoking. If they had not, he said, smokers would have 'quit in droves' -- a comment that was greeted with chuckles from the audience."

The New York Times (9/14, Warner, Moynihan) reports, "In the case, known as Schwab after the lead plaintiff, Barbara Schwab, lawyers asserted that cigarette makers had deceived smokers into thinking that light cigarettes, representing 45 percent of the market, were safer or less addicting." The Times adds, "Lawyers are seeking a national class action of tens of millions of smokers and are proposing that tobacco companies pay damages of $20 billion to $200 billion. The case was filed under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act, which entitles plaintiffs to triple damages. .. . Judge Weinstein is expected to decide within several weeks whether to grant class-action status." The Times notes, "The case, filed in 2004, is part of the latest legal assault against tobacco companies. After successfully warding off litigation by people claiming to have been injured by smoking, plaintiffs' lawyers have turned their attention to attacking cigarette companies for defrauding consumers by selling light cigarettes. … While many of these so-called light cases have been unsuccessful, the Schwab case follows an opinion last month by a federal judge in the District of Columbia, who found that cigarette companies engaged in decades of fraud and racketeering, including misleading smokers and concealing information about the health risks of light cigarettes."

DOJ Settles Grants Fraud Claims With Workforce Central Florida. The Orlando Business Journal (9/14) reports, "Workforce Central Florida and the Workforce Central Florida Foundation Inc. have paid nearly $3.5 million to settle claims by the U.S. Department of Justice that they defrauded the government by misusing federal grant funds to improve their privately owned offices and One-Stop Center in Lake Mary. … However, no individuals involved in the case have been either charged with a crime or dismissed from their job because it was considered an unintentional violation of federal rules concerning allowable charges, one described by Workforce officials as an 'accounting dispute.'" The Journal continues, "Still, it is believed to be the largest settlement ever levied against one of Florida's 24 nonprofit workforce agencies, which are locally chartered organizations designed to provide services such as job placement and training. The organizations are overseen by the state Agency for Workforce Innovation. … 'We analyzed every aspect of this transaction and voted at the end (in public session) to do it this way,' WCF board member and past Chairman Atlee Mercer says. 'Later, in hindsight, the government decided we should have done it differently. We don't agree. We thought we followed the letter of the law.'" The Journal adds, "The settlement has been paid by the foundation through a refinancing of the building that houses Workforce Central Florida, which handles One-Stop centers for Orange, Lake, Osceola, Seminole and Sumter counties. It will not have any impact on the services WCF currently offers, its officials emphasize."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Lawmakers Seek DOJ Probe Of Border Agents' Convictions. The San Bernardino (CA) Sun (9/14, Carter) reports, "Sentencing should be delayed for two Border Patrol agents facing 20 years apiece in prison for shooting a drug smuggler and violating his civil rights, 22 congressmen told the Department of Justice on Wednesday." The Sun continues, "In a letter, the congressmen asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to postpone sentencing and review the case against Border Patrol agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. … 'Due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding the prosecution of agents Ramos and Compean, the House Judiciary Committee has already recognized the need for a thorough review of this case by calling for congressional hearings and an investigation of the Department of Homeland Security, Office of the Inspector General, U.S. Customs and Border Patrol and the U.S. Attorney's Office,' the letter stated." The Sun adds, "In a separate letter to the Justice Department, Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas, echoed his colleagues' concerns. … 'If the facts I have laid out are accurate, then this prosecution puts the rights of illegal alien drug smugglers ahead of our homeland security and undermines the critical mission of better enforcing current immigration laws,' Gohmert wrote. … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department had received the letters and is planning a response to the request. She said any comment specifically about the agents' case had to come from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Texas that prosecuted the agents." The Sun notes, "Ramos and Compean are facing prison for their roles in the nonfatal shooting of Mexican national Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who ran away from the agents after entering the United States from Mexico with a van filled with nearly 800 pounds of marijuana. Ramos shot at the smuggler, who he believed pointed a gun at him during a foot chase along the Rio Grande. … The agents were convicted earlier this year by an El Paso jury. … Aldrete-Davila is suing the Border Patrol for $5 million for civil-rights violations. … U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton defended the successful prosecution of the agents by Assistant U.S. Attorney Deborah Kanof. … 'These agents shot an unarmed suspect as he was running away,' Sutton said in a news release Wednesday. 'If they honestly believed the shootings were justified, then they had no reason to lie about it and destroy the evidence.'"

Cuban Exile Group To Demonstrate During Summit. The AP (9/14) reports, "Cuban exile protesters plan to hold a symbolic, pro-democracy demonstration on a boat in international waters off the communist nation this weekend during a Nonaligned Movement summit, an exile leader said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Ramon Saul Sanchez of the Miami-based exile group Democracy Movement said the 'maritime demonstration[is scheduled to take place Saturday. The weeklong summit began Monday. .. . Current plans call for about 20 demonstrators to leave a Key West marina onboard the 39-foot Democracia after midnight Friday and arrive in international waters off Cuba early Saturday, Sanchez said. … They are demanding free elections and the release of all political prisoners among other things, Sanchez said. The group also hopes to fly a blimp from the ship with the word 'Democracia' on it and mirrors that will reflect light and be seen on the island. … Sanchez said he met with representatives of the community relations board of the U.S. Justice Department Wednesday night to discuss plans for the demonstration. The department had no immediate comment."

New Voting Equipment Expected To Lead To More Snafus In November. USA Today (9/14, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "Eight weeks before elections that will decide control of Congress, a rush by state and local governments to prepare new voting machines and train poll workers is raising the possibility of trouble reminiscent of the 2000 presidential election standoff." The problems "range from delayed delivery of new equipment to an insufficient supply of trained technicians to fix anticipated problems, voting experts say." Glitches have "occurred in Arkansas, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and West Virginia. Maryland became the latest on Tuesday, when technical problems, human errors and staff shortages led officials to keep some polls open an extra hour." The midterms "shape up as the most technologically perilous since 2000, election officials say, because 30% of the nation's voting jurisdictions will be using new equipment. They include large parts of Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Virginia, scenes of key Senate races."

WPost Criticizes Maryland Elections. The Washington Post (9/14, A20, 748K) editorializes, "Clearly, there is something wrong with the way elections are run in Maryland, and there are plenty of people to share the blame. Let's start at the top with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who bears ultimate responsibility since it is largely his nominees on local boards who run elections county by county." The Post adds, "It is encouraging that a spokesman said Mr. Ehrlich, in a departure from the stance he took Tuesday, will work with both parties as well as the state board to ensure a better job is done in November. After all, with his name on the ballot, he too has a stake in the outcome."

California Judge Slashes Bias Judgment Against FedEx. The California Recorder (9/14, Hirsch) reports, "Calling an initial $61 million verdict 'excessive,' last week Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stephen Dombrink whittled down a jury award against national shipping company Federal Express and one of its managers to a modest $12.4 million." The Recorder continues, "In his written decision, Dombrink stated concern that the evidence failed to support the initial verdict in an employment discrimination case. … 'The harassment was mostly just offensive name-calling,' Dombrink noted in his Sept. 5 ruling." The Recorder adds, "In June, the jury handed the $61 million award to two Lebanese-American FedEx drivers who accused a manager of racial discrimination and harassment. The verdict was thought to be the largest single civil rights judgment under California's Fair Employment and Housing Act and the fourth-largest verdict of any kind in Alameda County history. … Plaintiffs attorney Christopher Dolan said last week that he was still reviewing the decision and had not yet decided whether to seek a new trial. Though clearly disappointed by the outcome, Dolan said Dombrink's handling of the issue was 'deliberate and thoughtful. I think Judge Dombrink has exercised what he thought to be in the best interest of justice.' … Whatever happens on appeal, Dolan said he hopes the initial award continues to send a message to the business community that Arab-Americans will not tolerate harassment in the workplace."

Race-Based "Survivor" Said To Mirror Societal Attitudes. In an op-ed for USA Today (9/14), George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley writes, "Segregation is seeping back into public schools, though we justify it away. Perhaps our discomfort is in its reflection of truths in our society." Turley continues, "Millions of Americans tonight will watch different races fight for supremacy over a patch of land. No, this is not the latest installment of an Adolf Eichmann production. It is this season's CBS Survivor: Cook Islands. … With a ratings fall from a high of 29.8 million in 2001 to 16.6 million last year, the show's producers are clearly looking for something to captivate more viewers. To do so, they decided to try a TV version of divide and conquer: Fuel the racial identification of viewers, pit them against other races and reap the benefits of racial pride — or racial animus." Turley adds, "The problem is that this is a reality program that is far too real for our sensibilities. Despite decades of affirmative action, we remain a highly race-conscious society with highly segregated neighborhoods, schools, prisons and — yes — entertainment. More important, the 6-year-old show reflects a growing return to segregationist policies across the country. … Survivor's producers insist that the use of racially segregated teams is designed to boost minority participation and possible success in the show. … That rationale is being used in public schools. Arguing that segregation helps minorities perform, states have introduced schools segregated by race, gender and even sexual orientation. … Survivor is embracing a 'separate but equal' policy that was the scourge of the civil rights movement, ultimately rejected by the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education. It is now the solution to everything from low school scores to low self-esteem — and apparently low ratings. … The fact is that Cook Islands is repellant not because it looks too little, but too much, like our society. It is a reality that many are likely to watch, but few want to recognize."

ANTITRUST:

Barnett Takes Hands-Off Approach To Apple. Market Watch (9/14) reports, "The Justice Department's antitrust chief on Wednesday made a case for taking a hands-off approach to Apple Inc.'s iTunes music service and iPod music device, which are dominant in the online music business." Market Watch continues, "He also offered an implicit criticism of European governments that want the iPod player and iTunes music to be compatible with rival products. In June, French lawmakers approved government-backed legislation aimed at forcing Apple to make its online music and its iPod 'interoperable' with other products. Regulators in Norway and Sweden have threatened to impose fines if interoperability isn't made possible. … 'Apple provides a useful illustration of how an attack on intellectual-property rights can threaten dynamic innovation,' Thomas O. Barnett, who heads the Justice Department's antitrust division, said in the text of a speech in which he also noted that he's not investigating Apple's activities." Market Watch adds, "The music industry has in recent years been hit hard by the illegal downloading of music from the Internet, but the success of Apple's iTunes has boosted the sale of legal downloads and led to forecasts from the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry, a trade body, that recorded-music sales will grow in 2006. The concern across Europe is that Apple's products have too much dominance. … 'While it is true that Apple's digital-rights-management software ensures that the first recording of a song downloaded from iTunes can only play on an Apple device, consumers can re-record an iTunes song in an MP3 format and play it on other devices; in sum, it is hardly clear that they are locked in,' Barnett said. … His remarks came as European regulators traveled to the U.S. to address audiences here, providing U.S. politicians with an opportunity to push back. Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., who co-chairs an intellectual property caucus, in prepared remarks cited 'grave concern' about European regulatory tactics, and he complained that forcing Apple to 'hand over' its intellectual property would damp future innovation. … Barnett rejected complaints that Apple harmed consumers by selling expensive iPods that lock them in to buying the same costly devices in the future."

United, American Airlines Disclose Air Cargo Price-Fixing Settlements. The AP (9/14) reports, "United Airlines and American Airlines disclosed settlements Wednesday in a class-action lawsuit stemming from an investigation into alleged price collusion among carriers in the air cargo industry." The AP continues, "Unlike Lufthansa AG, which said Monday it would pay $85 million to settle pending lawsuits in the case, both U.S. carriers said they are not required to make any payments. … The settlements could close the books on their obligations in the case barring further findings. Officials at both American and United, the largest two U.S. airlines, said that if the Justice Department later brings charges against them as a result of its investigation, the settlements would be off." The AP adds, "More than a dozen airlines have been the subject of an investigation initiated by U.S. and European Union officials into suspected price-fixing in the air cargo industry on surcharges for fuel, security and insurance. … Investigators were quoted earlier this year as saying the surcharges apparently originated among European carriers, with U.S. companies then setting their own charges in line with competitors. For carriers to be hit with criminal charges, prosecutors would have to show they were actively conspiring, not just following others' price increases."

House Judiciary Committee Bill Removes Texas Airfield Antitrust Immunity. The Dallas Morning News (9/14, Reddy, Ramshaw) reports, "Following a setback in a House committee, North Texas lawmakers were plotting Wednesday evening to reinstate language to protect their Wright amendment legislation from potentially crippling court challenges." The News continues, "The House Judiciary Committee dealt the latest challenge to the effort to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, removing a phrase that would have immunized the agreement from antitrust claims. … Supporters of the deal remained hopeful they could recover through legislative maneuvers in coming weeks. But given a short legislative calendar and sustained Senate opposition, the outcome remains uncertain."

The AP (9/14, Gamboa) reports, "The agreement was forged by Love-based Southwest Airlines, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Dallas Fort Worth International Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth. American, based in Fort Worth, has a major hub at DFW. … The bill endorsed Wednesday no longer includes wording that stated the agreement complies with anti-competition laws and gave the Department of Transportation sole authority to decide claims against the arrangement." The AP adds, "Those provisions were opposed by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. He said the claims should be decided by the courts. … 'The antitrust laws are there for a purpose,' Sensenbrenner said. 'They are working, and there should not be legislative determination about what is or is not anticompetitive. The standard antitrust standards that have been applied to commercial arrangements for over 100 years should be applied to this one as well.'" The AP adds, "An unsigned memo from the Justice Department's antitrust division and made public last month said the bill would violate antitrust laws, although the department has not taken an official position. … The agreement calls for shrinking the number of gates at Love Field from 32 to 20, which some argue could block other airlines from competing with incumbents American, Southwest and Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc. Only 19 of the 32 gates are currently being used."

Bloomberg (9/14, Schlangenstein) reports, "The agreement may be ineffective without the immunity, said Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala. 'We will litigate this thing for the next 10 to 15 years,' he told colleagues on the panel. 'It will be tied up in court.'" Bloomberg adds, "The House committee's proposal 'doesn't appear to be a deal breaker,' Ed Stewart, a Southwest spokesman, said in an interview. 'The important thing is that this is another step toward what we were wanting in the first place, giving customers more choice.' … Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American, declined to comment on whether the version approved by the House committee would sink the agreement. The airline is based in Fort Worth, Texas. … 'There are more steps to go before we know what's ultimately going to happen,' Wagner said. Differences in versions approved by the House Judiciary Committee and the House transportation panel will have to be ironed out, he said."

The Dallas Business Journal (9/14) reports, "Last month a group of antitrust professors from law schools in Texas and elsewhere said in a letter to congressional leaders that the Dallas-Fort Worth deal to end Wright Amendment flight restrictions will result in higher fares and reduced service for Dallas-Fort Worth fliers. … Tuesday, D/FW Airport put out a letter written by antitrust law experts that refuted the professors' statements by saying an outright repeal of the Wright Amendment has never happened and would face too many challenges."

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (9/14, Recio) reports that "Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., joined by the ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., proposed an amendment that removes the antitrust immunity in the bill and inserts additional language reinforcing that nothing in the law governing Dallas Love Field 'shall modify, impair, or supersede the operation of the antitrust laws.' … Conyers, joining the chairman in an unusual show of bipartisanship, said, 'I'm not here to say the agreement is pro-competitive or anti-competitive.' … Rather, he said, he was also supporting the antitrust laws as the protector of consumers. 'For more than a century, the antitrust laws have been the cornerstone of preserving our free-market economy.'"

FTC Clears Hedge Fund For McDonald's Stake. The AP (9/14) reports, "An activist hedge fund has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission for a previously announced plan to buy nearly $794 million of McDonald's Corp. stock." The AP continues, "In a Sept. 1 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Oak Brook, Ill., fast-food chain said New York-based Pershing Square Capital Management LP had informed the company of plans to acquire more than $793.8 million of McDonald's stock, through three investment funds." The AP adds, "The FTC said Wednesday that it granted early termination on Tuesday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. .. .The purchase would amount to less than a 2 percent stake but would still make Pershing one of McDonald's top institutional shareholders."

EU Fines 14 Firms For Road Bitumen Price-Fixing. Market Watch (9/14) reports, "The European Commission Wednesday fined 14 companies EUR266.717 million for fixing prices of bitumen, a tar used in road construction." Market Watch continues, "Regulators found that eight suppliers and six purchasers participated in a cartel in the Netherlands from 1994 to 2002. … The commission granted BP PLC full immunity for cooperating in the investigation. In contrast, it doubled Royal Dutch Shell NV's fine to EUR108 million as a repeat offender. … 'We should not have attended these meetings and we regret our involvement in this case,' President-Director Rein Willems of Shell Nederland BV said in a statement." Market Watch adds, "The cartel fines represent the seventh largest ever levied by EU regulators and underline their determination to fight cartels. Companies are liable to up to 10% of their worldwide turnover if they participate, but they can appeal all decisions to the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg. … In 2001, the commission imposed fines of EUR790 million on a vitamin cartel. Last year, it imposed fines of EUR388 million on a hydrogen peroxide cartel and EUR344 million on an acrylic glass cartel. … 'The result of the cartel was the price of bitumen was higher than it otherwise would have been,' said E.U. antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd. Although bitumen is a 'small market' Todd said the fine is very high comparatively, because 'very large companies were involved, the cartel lasted for a time and that it was a very serious infringement.' In addition, some companies were 'repeat offenders' and some 'obstructed our investigation.' … He said similar probes were ongoing in both the Belgian and Spanish bitumen markets."

ImClone In Patent Dispute Over Erbitux. USA Today (9/14, Schmit) reports, "More bad news could be looming for ImClone Systems, the biotech maker at the heart of the Martha Stewart stock scandal." USA continues, "A federal judge is expected to rule, possibly within weeks, on a bitter patent dispute affecting ImClone's sole product, cancer drug Erbitux. … One Wall Street biotech analyst, Citigroup's Yaron Werber, has predicted defendants ImClone and Aventis Pharmaceuticals will lose the dispute. That could cost ImClone tens of millions of dollars a year, delivering an 8% to 24% hit to net income." USA adds, "The patent dispute — argued over a 10-day trial that ended in July in an often-packed Manhattan courtroom — pits former colleagues, friends and two giants of science against each other: Michael Sela, 82, a co-developer of multiple sclerosis drug Copaxone, and Joseph Schlessinger, 61, who testified he had been nominated for a Nobel Prize and that, for the last decade, he's been among the top 20 most-cited scientists in the world. … The patent dispute goes back 20 years and centers on who invented the idea of using a certain antibody, such as Erbitux, in combination with a chemotherapy drug to slow the growth of cancer tumors: Schlessinger and his colleagues or Sela and his colleagues. … Aventis owns the patent, which lists Schlessinger as its first named inventor. ImClone licensed the exclusive rights to the patent in 1994 even before it was approved. … The plaintiff, Israel's Yeda Research and Development, alleges that three scientists, including Sela, from Israel's famed Weizmann Institute of Science are the true inventors. Yeda, which commercializes inventions of Weizmann scientists, alleges Schlessinger — during a chance conversation with one of Sela's colleagues — volunteered to supply them with an ingredient to do the experiments."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

IG Says Interior Officials Tolerating Ethical Failures. The New York Times (9/14, Andrews, 1.21M) reports, "The Interior Department's chief official responsible for investigating abuses and overseeing operations accused the top officials at the agency on Wednesday of tolerating widespread ethical failures, from cronyism to cover-ups of incompetence. 'Simply stated, short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior,' charged Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, at a hearing of the House Government Reform subcommittee on energy." He also said, "I have observed one instance after another when the good work of my office has been disregarded by the department. … Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials -- taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism and bias -- have been routinely dismissed with a promise "not to do it again."" The "blistering attack was part of Mr. Devaney's report on what he called the Interior Department's 'bureaucratic bungling' of oil and gas leases signed in the late 1990's, mistakes that are now expected to cost the government billions of dollars but were covered up for six years."

California Settlement Would Begin River Restoration In 2009. The Fresno Bee (9/14, Doyle, Grossi) reports, "More water should start flowing down the San Joaquin River by around 2009 under a long-awaited settlement scheduled to be filed in Sacramento today." The Bee continues, "By around 2013, salmon should be reintroduced to the river, which once teemed with them. Hundreds of millions of dollars would be spent on channel improvements and more, and a new 'San Joaquin River restoration' administrator would oversee the complicated work." The Bee adds, "The river restoration details, and myriad others that will change life in the San Joaquin Valley, have been worked out by farmers and environmentalists during months of negotiations. They are to be presented to a federal judge this morning in hopes of settling an 18-year-old lawsuit. … 'To be able to come up with an agreement that parties on both sides can agree to is a monumental step to a healthy river,' said Grant Davis, executive director of the San Francisco-based Bay Institute, one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. 'Failure would not only harm the river, it would harm the San Joaquin Valley.'" The Bee notes, "Davis declined to offer details of the settlement, which was described by others who had been briefed about the pending deal. The Justice Department only signed off on the agreement Monday night, participants said, and details were changing up until the last moment. … But even as environmental groups and their negotiating partners embrace the new deal, it's attracting flak on Capitol Hill and among some water users. Part of the agreement includes an apparent deadline for Congress to approve San Joaquin River restoration legislation: Dec. 31."

The New York Times (9/14, Mckinley) reports, "Under the plan, announced in Sacramento, billions of gallons of water would eventually be released from Friant Dam, just north of Fresno, spilling into the historic river channels. The new flow, environmentalists and fishermen hope, will create a healthy environment for Chinook salmon, which once spawned — and thrived — in the San Joaquin. … In exchange for losing 15 percent to 20 percent of their yearly water, depending on rainfall, farmers and other long-term water users would be assured of a supply." The Times adds, "Fed by downstream tributaries, the San Joaquin, the second-longest river in California, flows as it meets the Sacramento River east of San Francisco, forming an enormous delta that provides water to 22 million Californians. Since the 1940's, the upper reaches of the river, from Friant Dam to its convergence with the Merced River, have been siphoned off to water a million acres of crops through a vast irrigation project that has helped turn the Central Valley into one of the most prosperous agricultural regions. … The proposed restoration would carry a hefty price, with estimates from $250 million to $800 million, a cost that the federal government and state would probably share."

Greenhouse Gases Blamed For Decline In Winter Arctic Ice. The Washington Post (9/14, A3, Kaufman) reports, "The amount of ice being formed in the Arctic winter has declined sharply in the past two years, a finding that NASA climate researchers say significantly increases their confidence that greenhouse gases created by autos and industry are warming the Arctic and the globe." The Post continues, "For years, scientists have reported a steady decrease in summertime Arctic ice, but they had never before found a similar reduction in the amount of ice being created during the frigid and dark Arctic winter. This lack of effect on the Arctic winter was one flaw in the scientific models of global warming, which predicted a steady decrease in ice formation. .. .But a new paper by Josefino Comiso, a senior research scientist at NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, found precisely the reduction in wintertime ice over the past two years that the model had predicted. The past two winters each produced 6 percent less ice than the average amount measured for almost three decades." The Post adds, "Comiso yesterday called the new data from satellite imaging of ice formation and temperatures 'the strongest evidence of global warming in the Arctic so far.' … The drop in wintertime ice tracks a similar drop in sea ice detected in the warmer months. According to Mark Serreze, senior research analyst with the National Snow and Ice Data Center, the amount of ice in the Arctic at the end of the 2005 summer was the smallest seen in 27 years of satellite imaging, and probably the smallest in 100 years. He said this year's summer ice cover started out even smaller but is not another record."

House Rejects Bill To Curb Indian Gaming. USA Today (9/14, Radelat) reports, "Indian tribes hoping to establish casinos away from tribal lands dodged a potential setback Wednesday when the House rejected a bill barring off-reservation gambling." USA continues, "California Rep. Richard Pombo, head of the House Committee on Resources, said 'reservation shopping' by tribes has 'perverted' the intent of the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, which opened the door for tribes to establish casinos. … But Pombo, who introduced the bill, was unable to secure the two-thirds vote needed for it to pass, under special House rules barring amendments. The vote was 247-171 for the bill, with 278 votes needed for approval." USA adds, "As Indian gaming revenues have grown — they reached nearly $22.7 billion in 2005 — so has opposition in Congress to the industry's expansion. … Only four tribes have off-reservation casinos. But at least 44 others, many landless and newly recognized by the federal government, like the Jena Band of Choctaw Indians, have applications pending at the Interior Department. .. . Pombo's bill would have prohibited the Jena Band and other tribes from establishing casinos off tribal land or land not contiguous to their reservations. It also would have required tribes to compensate local communities for a new casino's impact on roads, water and sewer systems and other services, including law enforcement. … The National Indian Gaming Association, which represents more than 180 tribes, strongly opposed the bill, saying it would violate tribal sovereignty."

US Busts Western Drug Ring. The AP (9/14, Frazier) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday it has shattered a drug operation that started among high school buddies in Roseburg, Ore., 30 years ago and grew over the years to become an international operation that took in more than $20 million." The AP continues, "Eleven of the 12 people named in a federal indictment are in custody after arrests Wednesday in Oregon, Washington, Colorado and Idaho. Most are from Oregon. .. .U.S. Attorney Tom Moss of Boise, Idaho, said the arrests followed a classic strategy of 'follow the money.'" The AP adds, "The 194-page indictment, handed up in Boise in June but kept sealed until Wednesday's arrests, said the operation began by growing and selling marijuana. But, the indictment said, the operation expanded to smuggling of drugs from Mexico and South America, growing large quantities of marijuana indoors and on public lands, and manufacturing methamphetamines. … The government seeks forfeiture of more than $24 million in assets including boats, planes, business interests and real estate in five states. … U.S. attorney spokeswoman Jean McNeil said more arrests could follow, and those in custody likely would be sent to Idaho after court appearances where they were arrested."

New Hampshire Drug Sweep Nets 54 Arrests. The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (9/14, Grossmith) reports, "An eight-month undercover drug investigation in the state's largest city has resulted in 54 drug dealers being arrested and the confiscation of more than 10 pounds of drugs with a street value of $450,000, authorities said yesterday." The Leader continues, "The arrests began on April 1, but since Monday, police have arrested 28 people on charges they sold crack, cocaine or heroin to undercover officers or possessed drugs. … Manchester Police Chief John Jaskolka, at a news conference yesterday afternoon, said he 'fully expects more arrests as the operation continues over the next few days and weeks.'" The Leader adds, "Manchester Mayor Frank Guinta commended all the agencies involved -- Manchester police, state police, Hillsborough County Sheriff's Department, the U.S. Marshal's Office, ATF, state Probation and Parole Department, and the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force. … He said the arrests show there is a 'renewed commitment to eradicate the criminal element in our city.' … The undercover drug investigation so far as involved the execution of 13 search warrants and the seizure or purchase of 7.9 pounds of cocaine, 2.4 pounds of crack cocaine, and 2.5 ounces of heroin by agents. Police also removed nine firearms -- eight handguns and one shotgun -- from city streets and seized $130,979 in cash. … The probe was funded with a federal grant under the Operation Streetsweeper program and involved seven different state, local, county and federal agencies. … U.S. Attorney Thomas Colantuono said nine of those arrested will be prosecuted on federal charges in U.S. District Court in Concord."

Cocaine Trafficker Sentenced. The Brunswick Times Record (9/14) reports that Phillip Whitworth of New Haven, Conn., "was sentenced Tuesday in U.S. District Court to more than 15 years in prison in connection with his role in trafficking crack cocaine." He "was arrested in March 2006 in the Topsham Fair Mall area after attempting to sell the drugs to an undercover informant working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency" as part of a "joint investigation between the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and the Topsham Police Department began in Topsham and lasted 13 months." U.S. Attorney Paula D. Silsby "praised the DEA and the Topsham Police Department for their work in the investigation," and Detective Mark Gilliam of the Topsham Police Department "also praised the DEA for the agency's help with the investigation."

DEA Says Taliban Is Responsible For Afghanistan's Large Opium Poppy Harvest. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (9/13, 10 p.m.) reported, "The DEA says the Taliban is to blame for Afghanistan's explosion in opium poppy." One of Afghanistan's "big problems" is "the booming drug trade. The opium harvest, this year, the poppy harvest, up from 49% over last year, more than 90% of the world's heroin supply from Afghanistan. … It causes so many different problems and helps the taliban, of course, because they receive money from the drug trade." The report continued, "Afghan officials eradicate opium production. A wasted mission. The official had no power, no forces to wage a drug war here. A couple of fields out of thousands were damaged. … From what we have seen in this Afghanistan's biggest poppy producing province, destruction is far from a reality. … Today's counter narcotics minister knows how bad the trade is now and says he can't stop it. Police are part of the problem." Later, the show reports that in St. Louis "officers say they do catch someone selling heroin virtually every night of the week. One recent bust netted $20 million worth of China white. … How does the heroin get from Afghanistan to St. Louis? Captain Jackson says it first goes to Nigeria and then to street gangs in Chicago. From there, it makes its way here. China white isn't an inner city back alley shoot it up type of drug. This heroin is so pure it can be smoked or snorted. This has only increased the drug's appeal among the affluent. … DEA special agent Jack Riley says besides the drugs, his agents have seized millions of dollars in cash."

DEA, Spain Announce Increase In Cooperation to Stop Drug Trafficking. The AFP (9/14) reports, "Spain and the United States announced they were increasing cooperation to stop drug trafficking, following talks between Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba and visiting US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) administrator Karen Tandy. Both announced the strengthening of 'common instruments to combat the laundering of money proceeding from drug trafficking'." In April, "Spain will…under the co-chairmanship of Tandy, host the 25th International Drug Enforcement Conference (IDEC) in Madrid."

Acapulco In Midst Of Drug Violence. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Llana) reports, "Acapulco, once known as the 'Pearl of the Pacific,' has seen its reputation - and its mayor, Félix Salgado - battered by the worst drug violence in the town's history" as "the drug war between two cartels has spread from the northern ganglands along the US-Mexican border toward the south." It is "believed to be the fallout between the Sinaloa cartel, which had dominated Acapulco, and the Gulf cartel, which has been moving into its territory," and "the recent, and growing, viciousness of the acts that has been most unsettling. Acapulco has seen grenade attacks and decapitations haunt its front pages." Also, the "unprecedented violence" is due to "growing domestic consumption and the battle for key entry points into the US."

Witness In Washington Slaying Pleads Not Guilty To Federal Gun Charge. The AP (9/14, Johnson) reports, "A Bellevue (WA) gun collector who was arrested as a material witness in the 2001 assassination of a federal prosecutor pleaded not guilty Wednesday to an unrelated charge of machine-gun possession." The AP continues, "Albert K. Kwan was arrested Friday on one count of possessing an M-14 machine gun in January 2005. His attorneys said they found the charge curious, because Kwan owns more than 100 machine guns legally, and the one that resulted in his indictment required serious modification by federal agents before it could be fired automatically." The AP adds, "Kwan was arrested in early 2005 and held for 23 days as a material witness in the October 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Crane Wales, an 18-year federal prosecutor and president of a Washington gun-control organization. Wales was shot through a window as he worked in the basement of his home on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill. The FBI has designated his assassination a 'major case' and is offering $1 million for information that helps solve it." The AP notes, "Kwan, who has not been identified as a suspect, was held because federal investigators believed he had purchased two replacement barrels for a Makarov pistol, and ballistics evidence indicated the bullets that killed Wales had traveled through such a barrel. The investigators wanted to know if Kwan had the barrels or if he had provided them to someone else. … Assistant U.S. Attorney William Redkey argued Wednesday that Kwan should be detained because he posed a danger to the community and was not forthcoming with the court regarding his assets. He also failed to disclose a passport that had been issued to him in Hong Kong."

UK Gun Crackdown Includes New Jersey Raids. WABC-TV, New York City (9/13) reports, "British police seized hundreds of firearms, including automatic weapons and shotguns, in a dawn raid involving gun-smuggling between New Jersey and London." WABC-TV continues, "Eyewitness News has learned a 55-year-old man, who answered the door wearing his boxer shorts, was arrested at a home in Dartford, England Hundreds of guns, including shotguns, semiautomatic guns and automatic weapons, were found at his house. .. .Officials say an accomplice of that man was taken into custody in New Jersey this morning, questioned and released. The raids were a joint operation between U.S. and U.K. authorities." WABC-TV adds, "The ATF, the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms agency was the lead agency on the U.S. Side of the case, called 'Operation Trident' and which British officials say has been in operation for six years. … 'For eight months, the ATF has worked with the UK in this case, and we are conducting follow up work in the United States today,' said Richard Marianos, an ATF official. … Marianos stressed that British authorities are the lead agencies in the case and they will make any extensive comments. There have been no US arrests in the case so far."

Michigan Fugitive Captured In Tennessee. The AP (9/14, Press) reports, "A convicted murderer who escaped from a Michigan psychiatric facility in 1976 was arrested Wednesday in Nashville, where he assumed a new identity and got married." The AP continues, "Thomas Ball, 76, was arrested at his Nashville home Wednesday morning by U.S. marshals, WSMV-TV reported. .. .Ball was convicted in 1964 of second-degree murder and was sent to what is now called the Southern Michigan Correction Facility in Jackson, Mich." The AP adds, "He escaped from the Center for Forensic Psychiatry in Ypsilanti, Mich., after being transferred there for treatment in 1976. … Ball was living under the name of Thomas Fry and had remarried during him time in Tennessee, although his wife died in the past year. … Justice Department officials said they believe Ball came to Tennessee shortly after his escape."

IMMIGRATION:

Son Of Former Liberian President To Plead Guilty To Passport Charge. The AP (9/14, Anderson) reports, "Charles McArthur Emmanuel, the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor, told a federal judge Wednesday that he will plead guilty to charges of lying about his father's true identity on a passport used to enter the United States." The AP continues, "Emmanuel, who is also known as 'Chuckie' Taylor, said 'Yes sir, judge' when asked by U.S. District Judge Donald Graham whether he was ready to change his plea to guilty. A second hearing was scheduled for Friday for Emmanuel to formally enter the plea." The AP adds, "Emmanuel, who headed an elite paramilitary unit for his father in Liberia, was arrested March 30 at Miami International Airport shortly after arriving on a flight from Trinidad. His arrest came the day after his father was apprehended in Africa on United Nations charges of alleged atrocities during neighboring Sierra Leone's civil war. … On his application for a U.S. passport, Emmanuel identified his father as 'Steven Daniel Smith' rather than Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. The passport fraud charge carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison. … Emmanuel's court-appointed attorney, Miguel Caridad, declined comment after Wednesday's hearing. Karen Rochlin, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, also declined comment."

House GOP Will Call Vote On Measure Requiring 700-Mile Border Fence. The New York Times (9/14, Swarns, 1.21M) reports, "House Republicans announced Wednesday that they would move swiftly to pass legislation requiring the Bush administration to build 700 miles of fencing along the Mexican border to help stem the flow of illegal immigrants and drugs into the United States." The legislation, which "is expected to go to the House floor for a vote on Thursday," would "require construction of two layers of reinforced fencing along stretches of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas that are considered among the most porous parts of the border." It would also "require officials of the Department of Homeland Security to establish 'operational control' over all American land and sea borders by using Border Patrol agents, fencing, satellites, cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles." The bill "is the first in a series of border security measures House Republicans have promised to pass before the midterm elections in November." Democrats "promptly criticized the plan as political grandstanding intended to energize conservative voters before the elections." Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, "has publicly raised doubt about the effectiveness of border fencing, particularly in remote desert areas." McClatchy (9/14, Montgomery) notes that asked if the White House supports the proposed fence, Tony Snow responded, "What the administration wants is comprehensive reform."

The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt, 88K) quotes Snow saying, "We are urging the House of Representatives and the United States Senate to work together to come up with comprehensive reform." Asked if Bush "held out hope for an immigration bill," Snow said, "You know, we've got a very limited amount of time. You draw your own conclusions."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, A1, Gaouette, 918K), under the headline "On Eve of a Vote, GOP on Both Sides of Fence," reports, "Some conservative Republicans have long supported the get-tough approach. One of them, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), responded to the new House measure by calling on Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to embrace the House approach and declare the Senate bill dead". Democrats "noted that House Republicans were introducing their bill at a time when the GOP, vulnerable in several election campaigns, needed an issue to rally voters." Sen. Harry Reid said, "It's so transparent."

House Democrats' Omission Of Immigration From Agenda Angers Hispanic Members. The Hill (9/14, Bolton) reports House Democratic leaders "passed around to colleagues Tuesday a plan they would focus on if their party wins control of the lower chamber on Election Day, but although the document was drafted to achieve consensus, it has already angered Democratic Hispanic leaders." The document lacks "any mention of immigration. While Republican candidates around the country are trying to make immigration one of the biggest issues of this fall's elections, Democrats appear to be tiptoeing around it." Some Democrats "fear that the issue will hurt them in conservative-leaning districts such as in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky that they must win in order to capture majority control this November." At a closed-door meeting "of the Democratic Steering & Policy Committee on Tuesday, New York Rep. José Serrano, the panel's vice chairman, challenged Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) over the lack of any mention of immigration reform in the caucus's new 25-page agenda document for 2007. The confrontation created a tense moment in the room, said one participant." Other Democrats "agree with Serrano that their party should make known its position on an issue important to Hispanic voters, whom many political strategists believe will be a crucial voting bloc in the future because of their surging numbers."

Immigration Advocates To Focus On Citizenship, Voter Registration Drives. After disappointing turnout at immigration rights marches over Labor Day weekend, advocates for illegal immigrants say they decided to focus on voter registration drives and citizenship drives for immigrants who qualify. The Washington Post (9/14, A3, 748K) reports, "Antonio González, president of the Los Angeles-based Southwest Voter Registration Project, said 50 voter registration drives will be launched in California, Texas, New Mexico and Colorado, states with large Latino populations. In addition, 100 voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives will kick off in October, he said. … But opponents of illegal immigration said voter and citizenship registration drives will not reignite a movement that has stalled."

TAX:

Brokers, Accountants Use Internet To Provide Access To Offshore Tax Shelters.

USA Today (9/14, Mccoy) reports, "A network of brokers, accountants, attorneys and other providers is increasingly promoting offshore trusts and accounts as a way to avoid lawsuits, creditors and, in some cases, federal and local taxes in the USA. Riding the rapid expansion of the Internet, some parts of the mini-industry are making tax-avoidance techniques — once mainly offered to high-net-worth individuals in private conferences — available online to average Americans. … 'This growing access to people who aren't wealthy and are willing to pay a $3,000 fee … to someone to help hide their assets offshore is getting to be a huge problem,' says Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., ranking minority member of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which in August released the latest in a series of reports on potential offshore abuses. 'Honest taxpayers get socked with the bill' as tax avoiders transfer assets offshore, Levin said. .. . That cost is high." USA adds, "Although no precise estimates are possible, as much as $1.6 trillion in North American wealth is likely held in offshore accounts, according to a 2005 report by the Tax Justice Network, an international group opposed to tax avoidance. … Americans with assets offshore probably avoid about $50 billion in taxes annually, according to an estimate by Reuven Avi-Yonah, head of the International Tax Master of Law Program at the University of Michigan Law School. … Hundreds of companies and promoters now use the Internet to guide Americans and others who transfer assets to offshore banks or trusts, according to the Senate subcommittee report. Money moves from domestic accounts to offshore tax havens such as Belize or the Bahamas, at times without any meetings between promoter and client."

IRS Claims Tyco Owes $50 Million In Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Levitz) reports, "Tyco International Ltd. still hasn't paid millions of dollars in federal income taxes from an allegedly false tax return filed by its chief tax adviser in 1999, the Internal Revenue Service said." The Journal continues, "The potential $50 million tax bill potentially looming over the giant manufacturing-and-services conglomerate came to light this week as Tyco's former vice president in charge of taxation, Raymond Scott Stevenson, was charged with filing a false tax return that failed to report more than $170 million in capital gains on Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return. Mr. Stevenson pleaded not guilty to a felony fraud charge before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla." The Journal adds, "According to the IRS, the capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill. Those taxes have not yet been paid by Tyco, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the agency's criminal division. … Ms. Michaud said that after Mr. Stevenson's expected criminal trial, the government may attempt to collect the taxes. Ms. Michaud declined to say whether the company is contesting the tax bill." The Journal notes, "Tyco, which is registered in Bermuda and operated from West Windsor, N.J., is in the midst of executing a plan to split the sprawling conglomerate into three stand-alone companies by the first quarter of 2007. … According to the U.S. Attorney Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, who was Tyco's vice president in charge of taxation until 2003, directed a 'series of transactions' designed to reduce Tyco's state liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in federal capital gains under federal tax code. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson left off the $170 million, said Ms. Michaud, adding that the investigation is continuing."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Administration Seeks Alternatives To Keep Bolton At UN. With President Bush's nomination of John Bolton to be ambassador to the UN in trouble in the Senate, the Bush Administration is looking into other ways to keep Bolton in the job after his temporary appointment expires in January. The Washington Post (9/14, A12, Bake, Linzer, 748K) reports that as recently as two weeks ago, the Administration "was confident it could finally push through Bolton's long-stalled nomination. But last week's surprise move by Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) to delay a vote convinced Republicans on Capitol Hill that the nomination may be doomed, prompting a search for alternatives." The Post adds, "Administration officials said they have not given up. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Chafee yesterday to kick off a lobbying campaign that will continue today when he returns to Washington after his hard-fought Republican primary victory in Rhode Island on Tuesday." The Post also reports, "Another failed nomination would be a stinging defeat for Bush, who defied Senate opposition last year and installed Bolton at the United Nations on an interim basis with a recess appointment."

GOP Leaders, Appropriators Remain At Odds Over Earmark Reform. Roll Call (9/14, Davis) reports with Republican leaders "and House appropriators deadlocked over the scope of earmark reform, the leadership is on course for a showdown with the spending panel as the resolution is scheduled for a potentially close floor vote today." Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield "said that another meeting of the panel on Wednesday again failed to result in an agreement on how reforms are applied to spending, tax and authorizing bills." In particular, appropriators "do not believe that the current proposal fairly applies the leadership-backed reforms to bills generated from the Ways and Means Committee as it does to appropriations bills. 'Our members are fairly unanimous,' Scofield said."

The New York Times (9/14, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports, "Nine months after Congressional leaders vowed to respond to several bribery scandals with comprehensive reforms, their pledges have come to next to nothing." House leaders "prepared to take up a rule requiring individual lawmakers to sign their names to some of the pet projects they tuck into major tax and spending bills. As an internal House rule, the requirement would be in effect only until the end of the session, just a few weeks away." While reform advocates "denounced the proposal as nearly toothless, its bite was still too sharp for many in Congress. By Wednesday night the resolution appeared to be bogged down in a three-way squabble among Republicans, Democrats and the powerful members of the House Appropriations Committee."

The Hill (9/14, Schor, O'Connor) reports House Republican appropriators "remained unwilling yesterday to publicly endorse their leadership's resolution requiring disclosure of earmark sponsors, setting up a possible rebellion by committee members that could bring down the resolution." Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) "huddled with his panel yesterday afternoon but emerged with no firm panel-wide plan to oppose the earmark-reform resolution. Many GOP appropriators believe the resolution singles out their committee's product while applying a narrow definition of tax and authorizing earmarks." Lewis said, "We are attempting to communicate with leadership that this committee feels very strongly that earmark reform is a priority, but it should apply to everybody."

Database To List Government Expenditures. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Chaddock, 58K) reports, "Coming soon to a laptop near you: how government is spending your federal tax dollars - contracts, grants, and special projects sought by lawmakers. From wartime contracts for Halliburton to earmarks for the Punxsutawney Weather Discovery Center (think 'famous groundhog') in Pennsylvania, all will be listed on a searchable database." The proposal is the "least controversial of all the reforms Congress has considered since last year's bribery and corruption scandals, and its passage will provide an effective new tool for anyone wanting to look over lawmakers' shoulders soon after they clear spending bills."

House Republicans Blocking "Interoperability" Funds. The Washington Post (9/14, A12, Hsu, 748K) reports, "House Republicans are blocking an attempt to spend $3.1 billion to help the nation's police and fire agencies communicate in emergencies as Congress debates a proposed overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. As both parties intensified the election-season rhetoric over national security, Democrats accused GOP leaders of shortchanging the well-documented need to improve communication among first responders. Republicans acknowledged that they do not want to spend billions prematurely, saying more planning and coordination are needed." Meanwhile, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "rebuffed calls for dedicated federal grants to upgrade equipment, coordinate plans, train emergency workers and adapt common technology standards," stating that the interoperability problem is not "a technology issue. This is an issue of having community leaders come to an agreement."

Obama, Coburn Push For Crackdown On FEMA No-Bid Contracts. The Hill (9/14, Schor) reports, "Having scored a high-profile victory on their bill to set up an online federal spending database, the unlikely freshman duo of Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) are hoping their fourth bid to crack down on no-bid contracting at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) will finally make it to the president's desk. … 'The closer you get to the election, the more members of Congress will want to demonstrate to the public that they are fiscally responsible,'" said Coburn spokesman John Hart. The senators "wrote to FEMA director David Paulison last month after viewing reports that the four main no-bid contracts awarded for emergency housing of residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina had bloated from $400 million to $3.4 billion. Paulison had echoed the senators' qualms about no-bid abuse during private meetings in December and May, but the four contracts — given to Bechtel Corp., Fluor, the Shaw Group and CH2M Hill — were not reopened for bidding despite the agency's initial promises to that effect."

Lawmakers Accuse NIH Of Being Soft On Ethics Violators. The Washington Post (9/14, A19, Weiss, 748K) reports that "angry" lawmakers criticized federal health officials yesterday for what they called a "pattern of being 'soft' on government scientists found to have violated ethics rules. … 'I do recognize that NIH has taken needed steps to improve its ethics program,' said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, which for years has been dogging NIH over alleged ethics violations. 'But more action is needed.'"

The Post adds, "Agency officials denied that they have been less than rigorous in meting out punishment." NIH "banned all outside consulting with drug and biotech companies more than a year ago, when it became clear that a few dozen had not reported their arrangements as required. NIH Deputy Director Raynard Kington said that at the conclusion of its investigation, NIH began administrative actions against 34 scientists and referred 10 others to the Office of Inspector General for possible prosecution."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Willman, 918K) reports, "NIH officials also assured the panel that they had recommended the termination of two other senior scientists who accepted drug company money without obtaining required advance approval. 'When violations were found, NIH implemented sanctions ranging from oral admonishments to letters of reprimand to suspensions,' Kington told the subcommittee. 'In all cases where individual scientists failed to take [personal] leave to conduct outside activities, they were directed to pay back that leave to the government.'"

Democrats Fail In Effort to Oust Tomlinson. The New York Times (9/14, Labaton, 1.21M) reports, "Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, the embattled chairman of the federal board that oversees most government broadcasts to foreign countries, narrowly survived an effort to oust him on Wednesday." After "a recent report by the inspector general at the State Department that Mr. Tomlinson had used his office to run a horse-racing operation and that he had improperly put a friend on the payroll, the three Democratic members of the seven-member Broadcasting Board of Governors offered two resolutions." One resolution "called for his resignation as chairman during a continuing inquiry; the other sought to curtail his authority sharply." The Justice Department "has declined to pursue a criminal investigation but is conducting a related civil inquiry. Both resolutions "failed 3 to 3 on party-line votes. Mr. Tomlinson did not participate in the votes, people involved in the closed-door session said." Tomlinson "has denied doing anything improper and had said the investigation 'was inspired by partisan divisions inside the Broadcasting Board of Governors.'"

The Washington Times (9/14, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Republicans said Democratic board member Jeffrey Hirschberg, who called for the votes, is engaging in a partisan attack, citing his financial ties to liberal figures such as former President Bill Clinton." Since 1999, Hirschberg "has given nearly $100,000 to Democratic candidates and organizations, including the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, according to public campaign-finance records." Hirschberg's brother, Judd Blair Hirschberg, "who was convicted of mail fraud in 1991, was one of 59 persons pardoned by Mr. Clinton in December 2000, shortly before he left office."

Clyburn, Emanuel Vie For Possible Majority Whip Opening. The Hill (9/14, Hearn, Bolton) reports that with political pundits "predicting that Democrats will recapture the House this fall, Democratic lawmakers are debating who would become the majority whip: Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), moving up one step from caucus chairman, or Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the campaign wizard who would have orchestrated the victory." Although only Clyburn "has declared his interest in the position, the escalating rivalry between the two was on display this week when news broke that the Democratic National Committee (DNC) would funnel $60,000 into each of 40 House districts, breaking a stalemate between the DNC and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee." Several Democratic officials "credited Clyburn with brokering the deal. He invited DNC chief Howard Dean to his hideaway office in the Capitol July 21 in the hopes of convincing him to dip into the DNC's coffers and fund turnout efforts for House Democrats." But Emanuel allies "dispute Clyburn's influence, arguing that the agreement was engineered solely between staff."

Shadegg May Be Eyeing Another Leadership Bid. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) reported, "After losing his race for House majority leader earlier this year, Arizona Republican Rep. John Shadegg today showed his colleagues that he may be planning another run for the Republican leadership. At a closed-door meeting today of all House Republicans, Shadegg announced he had raised $625,000 for the House Republicans' campaign arm. The sum far surpassed amount he and other Republican lawmakers were asked to raise for the National Republican Congressional Committee. More importantly, it sparked talk that Shadegg may be interested in another campaign for the House leadership."

Democrats Will Unveil Legislation To Reduce Abortions. The Chicago Tribune (9/14, Dorning, 623K) reports, "Reaching out to more moderate, church-going voters with misgivings about abortion, House Democrats plan to unveil legislation on Thursday that sets a public policy goal of reducing abortions in America." The proposal, "to be announced at a news conference attended by House Democrats' national campaign chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), would not restrict access to abortion." Instead, "it promotes such preventive measures as funding for contraceptives and expanded sex education geared toward avoiding pregnancy as well as support for adoption and services to new mothers, according to several people familiar with the legislation." The legislation "targets voters who have concerns about abortion but who are not absolutely opposed to the procedure. Its introduction follows extended discussion in Democratic political circles about improving the party's image with traditionalist voters and public efforts by prominent Democrats to fashion an approach to abortion with broader appeal."

SSA Seeks Fiscal 2007 Funding Increase. The Washington Post (9/14, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Social Security Administration would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices 10 days next year if Congress does not increase its funding in fiscal 2007, the agency has told Congress." In a letter to the Senate Appropriations Committee, Social Security Commissioner Jo Anne Barnhart wrote, "Fewer resources mean fewer people to serve the public in all areas of SSA's operations," adding, "Because these budget reductions will affect all employees, they will result in major service disruptions across all workloads." The Post adds, "The agency's budget may not be resolved until after the November elections, congressional aides said."

Baucus Casts His 10,000th Senate Vote. Roll Call (9/14, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Sen. Max Baucus "cast his 10,000th Senate vote on Wednesday, becoming one of just 27 in the history of the Senate who have cast 10,000 or more votes."

Brooks Discusses Bush's Abilities As A Leader. In his New York Times column (9/14), David Brooks says, "A leader's first job is to project authority, and George Bush certainly does that. In a 90-minute interview with a few columnists in the Oval Office on Tuesday, Bush swallowed up the room, crouching forward to energetically make a point or spreading his arms wide to illustrate the scope of his ideas — always projecting confidence and intensity. … I interview politicians for a living, and every time I brush against Bush I'm reminded that this guy is different. There's none of that hunger for approval that is common to the breed. This is the most inner-directed man on the globe." The "other striking feature of his conversation is that he possesses an unusual perception of time. Washington, and modern life in general, encourages people to think in the short term. But Bush, who stands aloof, thinks in long durations." Bush was "passionate on the need for patience and steadfastness. He talked about 'inviolate' principles written upon his heart: 'People want you to change. It's tactics that shift, but the strategic vision has not, and will not, shift.'" But when Bush "is strategizing goals, he is assertiveness on stilts. When he is contemplating means, he defers to authority. And the sad truth is, there has been a gap between Bush's visions and the means his administration has devoted to realize them. And when tactics do not adjust to fit the strategy, then the strategy eventually gets diminished to fit the tactics. Or worse."

Samuelson Calls For Medicare Overhaul. Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K) that Medicare is the "monster" in America's future. Samuelson writes, "Federal spending on the elderly is plausibly projected to double from 2000 to 2030 as a share of national income. About three-quarters of that increase will be health spending -- mostly Medicare but also Medicaid (70 percent of Medicaid spending goes to the old and disabled). The projected increase in health spending exceeds all of today's discretionary domestic spending on schools, the FBI, the environment and much more." Samuelson adds, "We should overhaul Medicare, but just how is unclear. … Samuelson concludes, "Most studies of Medicare have had a narrow and technical focus, evading the truly central issue. It isn't 'What's good for Medicare beneficiaries?' Rather, it's 'What's good for America?'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Lucchetti, 2.03M) reports, "The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 45.23 points, or 0.39%, to a four-month high of 11543.32. It was the average's 10th-highest close and only the 13th time it ended the day above 11500. The Dow sits 180 points from its all-time peak on Jan. 14, 2000, the record close of 11722.98."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "gained 0.38%, or 4.96 points, to 1318.07, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite index rose 0.53%, or 11.85, to 2227.67."

Analyst Says Oil Prices Could Fall To $15 A Barrel. McClatchy (9/13, Hall) reports, "The recent sharp drop in the global price of crude oil could mark the start of a massive sell-off that returns gasoline prices to lows not seen since the late 1990s. … 'All the hurricane flags are flying' in oil markets, said Philip K. Verleger, a noted energy consultant who was a lone voice several years ago in warning that oil prices would soar. Now, he tells McClatchy Newspapers, they appear to be poised for a dramatic plunge." McClatchy notes, "Crude oil prices have fallen about $14, or roughly 17 percent, from their July 14 peak of $78.40." If "oil traders fear that this downward price spiral will get worse and run for the exits by selling off their futures contracts, said Verleger, it's not unthinkable that oil prices could return to $15 or less a barrel, at least temporarily. That could mean gasoline prices as low as $1.15 per gallon."

ABC World News (9/13, story 7, Gibson) reported "gas prices have dropped off the list of issues that most concern voters. And it's not hard to tell why. Prices have plunged to an average of $2.62 a gallon from unleaded regular from $3.04 less than a month ago." ABC (Stark) reported, "After a summer of paying $3 a gallon and more, consumers are now watching with relief, as gas prices go lower and lower." ABC added "an analyst who correctly forecast the stunning rise in prices is now predicting more price cuts to come." Jason Schenker, Energy analyst, Wachovia: "We think that, by the end of the month, we're looking at gasoline prices at the pump around $2.25 to $2.50 a gallon. During the winter months, we could see the price go down towards $2.00 a gallon nationally."

Oil Industry Aims To Debunk "Peak Oil" Theory. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A2, Bahree, Ball, 2.03M) reports, "Leading players in the petroleum industry, including Saudi Arabia and Exxon Mobil Corp., are aggressively arguing that plenty of crude oil remains for world consumption, in an effort to counter critics who contend crude output is about to plateau. That argument, known as peak-oil theory, has provided intellectual backing for the boom in crude prices and sowed doubts among some policy makers about crude's long-term reliability as an energy source." The chief executive of Saudi Aramco "argued during a speech in Vienna that the world has more than a century's worth of crude left at current production rates. His talk followed similar remarks by a senior Exxon executive this week." The Journal says, "In a sign that oil-supply concerns are gaining currency, the Department of Energy has asked the National Petroleum Council, an oil-and-gas-industry research group, to investigate peak-oil claims."

Polls Suggest Improving Picture For Republicans. The Washington Times (9/14, Dinan, 88K) reports President Bush's "series of speeches on the war on terror has boosted the issue's profile and helped recapture Republicans' lead when voters are surveyed on whom they trust to handle terrorism." On the issue of terrorism, Republicans "now lead Democrats by 48 percent to 41 percent among registered voters in a new ABC News poll, a flip from a seven-point Democrat advantage in the same poll last month, and 16 percent now choose terrorism as their top voting issue -- a gain of five percentage points." An NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll "released yesterday put Mr. Bush's job-approval rating at 42 percent -- an increase of five percentage points since June, though still below a comfortable level for a president heading into a midterm election." Both polls "still showed Democrats with a sizable advantage when people are asked which party they want to control Congress -- nine percentage points in the NBC-Journal survey and eight points in the ABC poll."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Cummings, 2.03M), in a story about Sen. Chafee's primary win, also says the midterm election "trends may be turning slightly more favorable for Republicans."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Harwood, 2.03M) reports Bush's "efforts to explain and win support for his policies on Iraq and terrorism appear to be paying some initial dividends as midterm congressional campaigns heat up." But Bush's approval increase "remains 'a modest uptick' in 'a very difficult national environment' for the president's party in midterm elections, cautions Republican pollster Bill McInturff. The president's approval rating remains weak at 42%, though it is improved from 38% in June. A 54% majority of voters continues to say the U.S. is headed in the wrong direction." Still, the poll results "suggest Mr. Bush retains some ability to shape the context of the election to his party's benefit."

On NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 6, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), Washington bureau chief and moderator of Meet the Press, Tim Russert, said, "When you look inside the poll, the number of people who are concerned about gasoline prices has declined dramatically and that seems to be giving the President a boost." Williams: "Other reasons for this [42%] number, Tim?" Russert: "The Iraq war, let's look at this. The President's approval is up 3% [at 38%]. That is a gain of three points since our last poll in July where it was 35%. A series of speeches, the commemorative events of September 11th seemed to have helped the President in a modest way." On the generic ballot, "the Democrats still have a nine-point spread [48%-39%], but we are still eight weeks away."

Stephanopoulos Says Poll Shows Republicans "Coming Back." On ABC World News (9/13, story 6, 2:15, Gibson), George Stephanopoulos was asked whether ABC polling shows "Republicans coming back." Stephanopoulos said, "It does. The President's been graining his approval rating. Republicans have been gaining on Democrats. And it shows that the President's campaign on terrorism is working. Remember last week? Terrorism was number five on people's list of concerns. Now, it's moved up to three. And probably the best news for the White House -- gas prices just dropped out of the top five." ABC (Gibson) noted, "Gas prices are off the list. There were on it last week." Stephanopoulos: "Can it continue through November?" Gibson: "That's the key question."

Rothenberg Says 2006 Will Be An "Anti-Bush Election." Stuart Rothenberg, in a Roll Call column (9/14) titled "An Anti-Incumbent Election? This Year? Of Course Not," writes, "Over the past year or so, I've heard more than a few people talking about 2006 as an anti-incumbent election. Well, those people are wrong. We are not going to have an anti-incumbent election in November. We are going to have an anti-Bush election. … While it is true that voters are not particularly impressed with Congress in general or either of the two major parties, the midterm elections have developed into a referendum on the president. Republicans may well succeed in minimizing the damage in November by localizing elections and re-electing incumbents, but there is no indication that voters will send a message of dissatisfaction with all incumbents in the fall." That "means that all but a handful of Democratic House incumbents can rest easy."

Primary Analyses Focus On Chafee Victory, Upset Wins By Anti-War Democrats. The AP (9/14, Espo) reports, "All politics is national in the 2006 midterm elections, with both parties willing to put aside deeply held views over war, taxes and more in the surpassing struggle for control of the House and Senate. Which explains why a conservative Republican Party rejoiced Wednesday at the primary victory of Rhode Island's incorrigibly independent GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee, and struggled with the defeat of the more moderate of two leading contenders for a House seat in Arizona." Or "why Democrats, whose leaders call daily for a timetable for a troop withdrawal from Iraq, were less than thrilled to find vigorously anti-war contenders winning nominations for House seats in New Hampshire and New York."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Feldmann, 58K) reports on Chafee's win, and says, "In the end, the most-watched race of the Sept. 12 primaries became the dog that didn't bark. … A loss by Senator Chafee would have been nearly without precedent in modern times -- the second senator to lose in the primaries, following Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman's defeat in Connecticut last month. Headlines would have screamed about voters clamoring for change, and about ideological purges in both parties." The outcome "suggests that the national Republican Party did indeed need to pull out all the stops, as it did, to ensure that the conservative was not the nominee and a near-certain loser in November."

The New York Times (9/14, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "In New Hampshire, Jim Craig, a moderate Democrat who had been backed by his party in the primary to take on Representative Jeb Bradley in the Manchester area, lost to the antiwar candidate Carol Shea-Porter. 'Obviously, that is embarrassing for Democrats,' said Representative Charles Bass, the Republican who represents New Hampshire's other House district, predicting that Mr. Bradley would now be re-elected." The Democratic Party's "choice in the 19th Congressional District of New York, represented by Sue W. Kelly, a Republican, also lost on Tuesday. Ms. Kelly will now face the singer-songwriter John Hall, who has attracted celebrity backing from the music community."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Antiwar Democrats…made themselves heard again. They won in New Hampshire, lifting Carol Shea-Porter, who called for withdrawal from Iraq, over Jim Craig, who heavily outspent her and was backed by the party establishment. They lost in Maryland, but not before putting a scare into Representative Al Wynn, who voted for the war and has voted with the GOP on campaign finance issues and some tax cuts. He won 50%-46%." Both "were electoral surprises likely to push the Congressional Democrats further left on the war. Whether that will help them in November is another story, since Ned Lamont's victory last month over Connecticut Senator Joe Lieberman seems to be helping the GOP retain its three vulnerable House seats in that state. You know it's a volatile political year when the GOP is counting on victories by a pro-war Democrat and an antiwar Republican (Mr. Chafee) to keep control of Congress."

David Broder, in the Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K), writes that "the lesson from Tuesday's round of primaries in nine states and the District of Columbia was simple and reassuring. Credentials count. Experience counts. And so does the willingness to engage some serious issues. For the most part, the candidates nominated for Congress and governor come from the mainstream establishments of their parties."

National GOP Strategy Seen As Risking Depressed Turnout In November. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "The Republican Party leadership won the primary battle in Rhode Island, getting their preferred candidate, incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee, past a conservative challenger. But at what cost?" National support for the incumbent "angered" challenger Steve Laffey's "supporters and could deter them from voting in November when Mr. Chafee squares off with Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former attorney general whose campaign is flush with cash." The Journal adds, "Just as trends may be turning slightly more favorable for Republicans, Tuesday's back-to-back clashes between the Republican Party machine and its base in Rhode Island as well as in Arizona could diminish turnout among conservative voters in November. Turnout by that voting bloc carried the president in 2000 and 2004." The Journal adds, "In Arizona, the battle was for the seat of retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe. Conservatives supported state Rep. Randy Graf, whose get-tough immigration platform fit with a House bill passed earlier this year. Pro-Graf forces were startled when, in the final weeks of the campaign, Speaker Dennis Hastert and other House leaders poured cash into the race of moderate Steve Huffman, who embraced a Senate immigration bill that would have created a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the US."

An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (9/14, 918K) the GOP's split over immigration "is threatening to cost Republicans at least one seat in the House of Representatives." Graf "may be further to the right than the national GOP, but on issues such as taxes, same-sex marriage and abortion, he's right in line with the Bush administration. Nevertheless, the National Republican Congressional Committee was so worried about his ability to win this marginally Republican district in November that it threw more than $250,000 worth of advertising behind one of Graf's primary opponents, Steve Huffman."

Successful GOTV Effort For Chafee Seen As Good Sign For GOP. The Washington Post (9/14, A23, VandeHei, Cillizza, 748K), meanwhile, says "the turnout campaign that Republican operatives used to help pull…Chafee to victory in the Rhode Island primary was a potent demonstration of how money and manpower can transform a race even in an unfavorable political environment -- and a preview of the strategy that national party officials say they plan to replicate in the most competitive House and Senate races over the next 55 days." The Post adds, "In the past two national elections, in 2002 and 2004, Republicans outperformed Democrats in bringing their backers to the polls, but many Democrats and independent analysts have suggested that the competition may be different this year, in part because of slumping morale among GOP activists. But Chafee's performance -- combined with reports of late-starting organization and internal bickering on the Democratic side -- suggest that the Republican advantage on turnout may remain intact even as many other trends are favoring the opposition."

Ickes Looks To Organize 527 Group To Boost Congressional Democrats. The New York Times (9/14, Broder, 1.21M) reports, "Sensing both political danger and opportunity," Democratic operative Harold Ickes "and a group of major party donors have banded together to deliver a barrage of late advertising and on-the-ground action to secure Democratic victories in November." Ickes and "a group of allies are soliciting money for a new organization called the September Fund. They hope to raise and spend as much as $25 million to influence not only crucial Congressional races but also other campaigns and ballot initiatives at the federal and state level." Ickes was "among the chief organizers of several groups that raised more than $200 million from wealthy liberals and labor unions in 2004 to try to defeat President Bush." After months "in which Democrats have fretted about how much support they would get from those sources this time around, Mr. Ickes is turning to many of the same donors in hopes that a surge of spending in the fall campaign's final weeks will cement Democratic gains against a president and a Republican-led Congress whose approval ratings are sagging." Ickes "has already contacted George Soros, the billionaire financier who gave Democratic committees more than $25 million in 2004. Among others on the fund's list of potential donors are Steve Bing, a Hollywood producer; Linda Pritzker, a member of the family that owns Hyatt hotels; Herb and Marion Sandler, owners of a California savings and loan; and Ted Waitt, founder of the computer company Gateway. All gave multimillion-dollar gifts to the funds Mr. Ickes directed in 2004."

Allen Camp Blasts Webb For 1979 Article On Women In Combat. The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports in a front page story that the Virginia's Senate race "turned nasty Wednesday as Republican Sen. George Allen launched a character attack on his Democratic opponent's past views toward women in combat, signaling the start of a two-month barrage of negative campaigning in what has become a close race." Allen "organized a news conference with five female U.S. Naval Academy graduates who said an article written 27 years ago by Allen's opponent, James Webb, prompted harassment by male midshipmen at the academy." In the Washingtonian magazine article, "Women Can't Fight," Webb "wrote of the brutal conditions during the Vietnam War and argued against letting women into combat. Allen's campaign zeroed in on passages in which Webb described one of the academy's coed dorms as 'a horny woman's dream' and said that he had never met a woman he 'would trust to provide . . . combat leadership.'" Webb, "a Naval Academy graduate who was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan, issued a statement saying he was sorry 'to the extent that my writing subjected women at the Academy or the active Armed Forces to undue hardship.' But his campaign also responded aggressively, accusing Allen of opposing the admission of women to the Virginia Military Institute and of once having accepted membership into an exclusive club while he was governor."

The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot/AP (9/14, Lewis) reports five female US Naval Academy graduates said Webb "fostered an air of hostility and harassment for them with a magazine article he wrote in 1979. The women, who attended the academy in the late 1970s and early '80s, said the column in Washingtonian magazine emboldened male midshipmen to humiliate them continuously, and some even wore 'Jim Webb Fan Club' T-shirts." Meanwhile, an "independent political action committee of Iraq war veterans announced the first television attack ad of the race, accusing Allen of voting in the Senate not to fund lifesaving modern body armor for combat troops. VoteVets.org is not endorsing Webb, just opposing Allen."

Carter Says Lieberman Should Not Be Reelected. Former President Jimmy Carter said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/13), "I think Joe Lieberman is a good man. He's been strongly in favor of the Iraqi war from the very beginning. He was one of the originators of public statements that misled the American people into believing that the Iraqi war was justified. He's been an undeviating supporter of the war from the very beginning and still is. He's joined in with the Republican spokespersons by saying that Democrats who disagree are really supporting terrorism. So for all these reasons I've lost my confidence in Joe Lieberman and don't wish to see him re-elected."

Cardin, Steele Doff Gloves As General Election Campaign Begins. The Baltimore Sun (9/14, Brown, 262K) reports Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "launched their general election campaigns for Maryland's open seat in the U.S. Senate, a contest that already is drawing national attention -- and money." Cardin "came out firing Wednesday, linking Steele with President Bush while invoking what he described as government failures in Iraq and the Gulf Coast." Steele, "speaking later in the day, rejected attempts to link him to the president." Said Steele, "If Congressman Cardin wants to run against George Bush, then he should have run for president." The Sun adds the "tone of the exchange differed markedly from that of the primary races, when Cardin and Mfume had presided over an amicable contest for the Democratic nomination, and Steele faced no serious opposition for the Republican nomination."

The Washington Times (9/14, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports the "general election showdown" will "hinge on racial issues and draw attention from across the country." Cardin is "actively cultivating support among black voters, who make up as much as 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland." Still, "Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the most closely watched campaigns in the country and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties."

Roll Call (9/14, Kurtz, Yehle) reports Steele's "strategy for victory is hardly subtle. Even before the primary, Steele began airing a statewide ad aimed at black voters — an ad that his campaign spokesman said is scheduled to run indefinitely." Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, a Baltimore native, said, "I think Michael Steele has a real ability to win over voters who don't usually vote Republican." Roll Call adds Cardin "starts out as the favorite over Steele. So in a state that is so strongly Democratic, Steele's only path to victory may be doubling — or even tripling — the 10 percent to 12 percent of the black vote that Maryland Republicans generally attract in statewide elections."

Minnesota Democrat Likely To Become First Muslim Elected To Congress. USA Today (9/14, Stone, 2.27M) reports the Minnesota Democrat "who is likely to become the first Muslim elected to Congress says he wants to 'promote the idea that America needs friends around the world, not more enemies.'" Keith Ellison, "an African-American state legislator from Minneapolis, won Tuesday's Democratic primary to replace Rep. Martin Olav Sabo." Ellison "beat three other Democrats, including Sabo's former chief of staff and ex-party chairman, Mike Erlandson." Although Ellison "will face Republican business consultant Alan Fine in November, his election is all but guaranteed, says University of Minnesota political scientist Larry Jacobs." Ellison's victory "marks a turning point for American Muslims, according to community leaders such as Ali Khan of the American Muslim Council." Ellison has "called for an immediate troop withdrawal from Iraq, universal health care and the impeachment of President Bush."

William Schneider said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "It's likely this year will see the first Muslim elected to Congress. He's Keith Ellison who just won the Democratic nomination in Minnesota's Fifth Congressional District. … Ellison regards himself as a staunch progressive in the tradition of Paul Wellstone, his personal hero. Republicans are calling attention to divisive positions Ellison took in the past and his association with Louis Farrakhan's Nation of Islam. … Republicans have little hope of defeating Ellison in a district that voted 71 percent for Democrat John Kerry in the last presidential election. They are trying to use Ellison's past associations to taint Minnesota Democrats as too extreme."

Ellison said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "I haven't put the emphasis on my own personal identity. The emphasis for me is on the people, how to mobilize the people, how to persuade them to vote in their own best interests, how to talk about peace as being the guiding principal of our nation, how to argue that we have to fix this broken health care system that we have. I mean, these are the things that we need to talk about, how we all come together around serious problems that are not being addressed by the Bush administration."

Gingrich Says He'll Decide On 2008 Presidential Race In December 2007. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (9/13) if he is going to run for president in 2008. Gingrich said, "I will decide that in December 2007."

Ann Richards Dies. The Houston Chronicle (9/14, Ratcliffe, Kilday, 535K) reports Ann Richards, "who shed the role of homemaker to rise through Texas politics to become the state's 45th governor and a national celebrity," died yesterday "after a six-month battle with cancer. She was 73. Richards was diagnosed with esophageal cancer in March." Richards "was the quintessential Texas woman, with a sassy homespun charm, sharp wit and tough pioneer spirit. With bright silver hair, a weathered face and an affinity for cobalt blue suits and pearls, Richards was instantly recognizable to national television audiences." Polls "showed Richards was the most personally popular governor in 30 years. But a liberal image kept her job approval rating beneath 50 percent, and she lost her 1994 re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush, the future president."

The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M), Washington Post (9/14, B8, 748K) and Washington Times (9/14, 88K), among other newspapers, run an AP story on Richards' death, reporting the "silver-haired, silver-tongued Richards said she entered politics to help others -- especially women and minorities who were often ignored by Texas' male-dominated establishment." Richards "sealed her partisan reputation with a blast at George H. Bush, a fellow Texan who was vice president at the time: 'Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth.'" The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Kennedy, Silverstein, 918K), in a similar story, also notes the late governor's quip about Bush.

Economists Call For Overhaul Of Unemployment Insurance System. The New York Times (9/14, Eckholm, 1.21M) reports the nation's unemployment insurance system, "which has hardly changed since its inception in 1935, should be revamped to aid more workers displaced by a transforming economy, economists said this week as they released overhaul proposals." Because of "tight state eligibility requirements and because a growing number of workers do not have long-term, full-time jobs, unemployment insurance is paid to just over a third of those who are laid off, government data show, and coverage is less likely among the lower-income workers who most need it." Dr. Lori Kletzer and Howard Rosen of the Institute for International Economics in Washington "are the authors of one of two proposals for revamping the system that were released on Tuesday by the Brookings Institution in Washington." Because of "globalization and changes in the economic structure, more workers are forced to change industries and a significant minority take jobs paying less than before, indicating a trend 'from temporary layoff to permanent displacement,' according to the paper by Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen."

States Allow Tax Deductions For Out Of State 529 Contributions. A growing number of states are allowing residents to take state tax deductions for contributions they make to other states' 529 college savings plans. USA Today (9/14, Chu, 2.27M) reports, "Pennsylvania, Maine and Kansas have approved such tax breaks, and a handful of other states are considering similar measures. … The states' move toward tax parity for all 529 contributions is likely to make it simpler and more appealing for residents to save for their children's college educations. A new law that makes permanent the 529s' federal tax benefits has also helped spark more interest in these plans."

Group Seeks To Increase Number Of Visitors To US Each Year. The Washington Post (9/14, A19, Sarasohn, 748K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "A coalition of high-powered business executives has formed the Discover America Partnership, a multimillion-dollar advocacy campaign designed to boost the number of visitors -- by 10 million a year -- to the United States. Their aim is to help improve America's image abroad and bolster national security by introducing more people from other countries to us." Geoff Freeman, executive director of Discover America, "said the campaign intends to educate lawmakers and other policymakers about the need to attract foreign visitors, and it will work to smooth out visa and airport policies that may discourage travel. But he said the group 'by no means' wants to lessen security standards."

Wal-Mart CEO Seeks To Improve Company's Image. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 7, 4:00, Mason, 7.66M) interviewed Wal-Mart CEO Lee Scott. Asked what responsibility his company has to pay a living wage, Scott said, "I don't know what specifically a living wage is. Average wage is over $10 an hour." Mason: "In the past year, after a study showed nearly half the children of Wal-Mart workers were uninsured or on Medicaid, the company expanded its health care plan, and last month, raised wages 6% at many stores. Implicit isn't that, it, a suggestion you weren't paying enough and your benefits weren't good enough?" Scott: "I guess if you wanted to make that case. I'd prefer to look at it as we have been raising wages and improving benefits for years." Mason: "But the CEO concedes criticism has influenced one sweeping change -- the greening of Wal-Mart. … Scott has committed to cutting Wal-Mart's energy use by 30%, a first step using display cases with light-emitting diodes that give off much less heat. So it's cheaper for you to cool this. … But Wal-Mart's skeptics still doubt the company's commitment. They're suggesting you're just trying to green-wash your image. You're laughing." Scott: "I am. The one thing I have really found at Wal-Mart is trying to be overly sophisticated and manipulative is not our strength." Mason: "But the company that made its name cutting costs is smart enough to know that improving its image could also improve its bottom line."

Will Says Liberals' Campaign Against Wal-Mart Is "Condescension." George Will writes in the Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K), "The big-hearted progressives on Chicago's City Council, evidently unconcerned that the city gets zero sales tax revenue from a half-billion dollars that Chicago residents spend in the 42 suburban Wal-Marts, have passed a bill that, by dictating wages and benefits, would keep Wal-Marts from locating in the city. Richard Daley, a bread-and-butter Democrat, used his first veto in 17 years as mayor to swat it away." Will adds, "Liberals think their campaign against Wal-Mart is a way of introducing the subject of class into America's political argument, and they are more correct than they understand. Their campaign is liberalism as condescension. It is a philosophic repugnance toward markets, because consumer sovereignty results in the masses making messes."

NYTimes Says More Money Is Needed To Fight Tuberculosis. The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) editorializes, "Tuberculosis is outrunning us. …

DOJ_NMG_0062702

Airborne and deadly, extensively drug-resistant TB is a nightmare disease. It has been found worldwide, including in the United States." The Times adds, "A group called the Global Alliance for TB Drug Development has six compounds in the pipeline, but a treatment for extremely resistant TB is not likely before 2012. Money for clinical trials would speed things. … The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation are big donors, but much more is needed. Stinginess created this problem. Generosity is needed to fix it."

Bush, Roh To Downplay Differences Over North Korea In Meeting Today. President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun will meet at the White House today. According to McClatchy (9/14, Douglas), when they meet, the two leaders "will try to downplay the strains between their countries over how to deal with the North Korean nuclear standoff." The Bush Administration "is pushing a hard line in trying to get the strident North Korean government to return to six-party talks designed to halt its nuclear program. South Korea, which has sought to engage North Korea since 1998, is seeking a softer diplomatic approach toward its reclusive communist neighbor." McClatchy adds, "To complicate Thursday's meeting further, it comes amid reports that North Korea is preparing for an underground nuclear test, which some US intelligence officials think may come before the end of the year."

The New York Times (9/14, Sanger, 1.21M) reports that the two leaders "have rarely been further apart on the central issue that long ago turned their relationship so frosty. Mr. Bush is determined to squeeze North Korea with every financial sanction possible until it gives up its nuclear capacity and other illicit activities, or, some believe, until it collapses. Mr. Roh insists the only course is to coax the country out of its isolation." The Times adds that Roh "will receive treatment that contrasts sharply with the warm embrace extended in June to Japan's prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi. Mr. Koizumi got long meetings, a glittering dinner and a trip to Graceland; Mr. Roh, leader of the other major United States ally in Asia, is getting an hour in the Oval Office and a quick lunch."

Roh Says South Korea Will Continue To Support War On Terrorism. The AP (9/14, Klug) reports that Roh said yesterday his country's alliance with US is changing, but Seoul will "continue to support the US-led fight against terrorism. The South Korea-US 'alliance will in part change according to the times,' Roh said through an interpreter. 'But the very fundamental basis of this alliance will not change.'"

South Korea Backs UN Condemnation Of North. The Washington Times (9/14, Sands, 88K) reports , "South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon yesterday said Seoul strongly supports the United Nations' condemnation of North Korea for its recent missile tests, and denied that South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun was trying to play down the missile tests when he described them recently as tests carried out by the communist North for political, not military effect." Ban said the US-South Korean alliance "remained fundamentally healthy and that public opinion in South Korea toward the United States had improved in recent years."

Opposition Leader Says North Still Threatens South's Security. Jin Ha Hwang, chairman of the International Relations Committee of the Grand National Party, South Korea's largest opposition party, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M), "North Korea is no longer a threat to South Korea. The wartime operational control (OP-CON) of 680,000 Korean troops will be transferred back to South Korea by 2009, and the U.S.-Republic of Korea Combined Forces Command (CFC) will be consequently dismantled. At least that is what the presidents of the U.S. and South Korea think will happen in the next three years. But they would be making a grave mistake. … Even as politics may have changed on the Korean peninsula, the security situation, in terms of the need for deterrence, has not changed one bit. North Korea's asymmetric threats still pose a grave danger to South Korea's security, as well as to countless US economic and political interests." Hwang adds, "The US-ROK Combined Forces Command is a mechanism designed to deter war, and also to fight and win a war should deterrence fail. It is a military structure that has functioned admirably for the benefit of both South Korea and the United States. Should we let it go because of domestic political interests? Who has the last laugh then?"

Solana-Larjani Talks Break Down. The AP (9/14, Jahn) reports EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larjani "abruptly postponed talks on easing tensions over the refusal of the Tehran regime to suspend uranium enrichment." Solana's office "did not say what prompted the decision to downgrade Thursday's meeting in Paris to the level of aides… But the decision of the two principals to stay away from what would have been their third meeting in a week suggested snags had developed from their direct contacts over the weekend." The AP says the "absence" of the two figures "was bound to dampen high expectations for the meeting. Their two sessions in Vienna had been described by both men as making progress toward solving the impasse over Tehran's defiance." The AP continues, "Different interpretations of what was achieved at the weekend talks were reflected earlier in the day. In moderate language, Britain, France and Germany only alluded to the threat of [UNSC] sanctions…and called on the Tehran regime to negotiate the dispute with the international community. The United States, in contrast, said it was time for the council 'to back international diplomacy with sanctions.'" Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his country's nuclear standoff with the West can be solved through dialogue, and called for unspecified 'new conditions' in negotiations."

Rice Says Western Powers Will Meet At General Assembly To Discuss Sanctions. AFP (9/14) reports Secretary Rice said "foreign ministers from the six major powers involved in the nuclear standoff with Iran will meet soon in New York to discuss imposing sanctions." She "will travel to New York next week for talks on the sidelines of the [UN General Assembly meetings next week] and she said this would be the opportunity to press ahead with the sanctions if Iran continues to reject demands it freeze its suspected nuclear weapons program." Speaking after meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Rice "said the way forward for Iran was clear, it can either suspend its uranium enrichment as a prelude to broader negotiations on improving economic and diplomatic ties with the international community, or face new" sanctions resolutions.

IAEA Pans US House Report On Iranian Nuclear Capabilities. The Washington Post (9/14, A17, Linzer, 748K) says IAEA inspectors "angrily complained to the Bush administration and to a Republican congressman yesterday about a recent House committee report on Iran's capabilities, calling parts of the document 'outrageous and dishonest' and offering evidence to refute its central claims." Their letter claims that "the report contained some 'erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated statements.' The letter, signed by a senior director at the [IAEA], was addressed to Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, which issued the report. A copy was hand-delivered to" Ambassador Greg Schulte. The Post continues, "The IAEA openly clashed with the Bush administration on pre-war assessments of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Relations all but collapsed when the agency revealed that the White House had based some allegations about an Iraqi nuclear program on forged documents." The Post says the letter is "the first time the IAEA has publicly disputed U.S. allegations about its Iran investigation. The agency noted five major errors in the committee's 29-page report, which said Iran's nuclear capabilities are more advanced than either the IAEA or U.S. intelligence has shown."

Poor Domestic Refining Capabilities Make Iran Dependent Of Gasoline Imports. USA Today (9/14, Lynch, 2.27M) reports low domestic gasoline prices suggest "an abundance that couldn't be further removed from the grinding reality of Iran's oil industry. From wellhead to gas pump, Iran's fabulously endowed petroleum industry confronts debilitating political and technological headwinds." US sanctions have "starved" Iranian companies of newer technologies, and "pervasive political uncertainty" has discouraged foreign investment, creating a "shortage of domestic refining capacity" that forces Iran to import forty percent of its gasoline. USA Today says "that dependence" leaves Iran "vulnerable" to nuclear-related sanctions, but notes that any reciprocal slowdown in petroleum exports from Iran "could be a catastrophe for the global economy." While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has dismissed the danger," USA Today says "others aren't so sanguine," believing Tehran would risk a confrontation to stem outside interference. In additional, "domestic political jockeying has further complicated Iran's oil field management," with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Parliament having disagreed on who should manage Iran's oil industry. USA Today adds, however, "it's not all bad news. Thanks to high oil prices, government coffers are bulging: Oil export revenue for the 12 months ending in March is expected to total $49.7 billion vs. $19.4 billion four years ago," which the IMF estimates will allow Tehran to pay its $5.8 billion gasoline import bill and maintain "subsidies" on food and fertilizer.

Rice, Livni Skeptical Of Palestinian Unity Government. The Washington Post (9/14, A17, Kessler, 748K) reports Secretary Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni "reacted skeptically yesterday to a proposed unity Palestinian government that would include Hamas, saying the militant group must first renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist before restrictions on international aid can be lifted." The Hamas-led Palestinian Authority "has teetered near collapse since foreign governments largely cut off aid after" Hamas' January election victory. President Mahmoud Abbas "this week reached a deal with Hamas to form a government that would empower him to negotiate with Israel -- in effect sidestepping Hamas' pledge to destroy the Jewish state. The Palestinian cabinet resigned yesterday to clear the way for a new unity government." While some world leaders "greeted the announcement as a possible breakthrough," Rice and Livni "reiterated that the new government must meet conditions that were set by the United States and its allies after the Hamas victory. 'The outcome of the process is not clear,' Rice said. 'It goes without saying that it's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist. It goes without saying that it's hard to have a process for peace if you do not renounce violence.'" Livni "said that Israel is still committed to helping create a Palestinian state on territory occupied by Israel. 'Stagnation is not the Israeli government policy,' she said. But she added that it is up to the Palestinians 'to meet these requirements fully and completely, and we believe that these requirements are not negotiable.'"

The New York Times (9/14, Myre, 1.21M) notes, "Palestinian cabinet members submitted their resignations Wednesday night to allow for the creation of a national unity government that is expected to include a broad range of factions." The Hamas-Fatah government "may not be in place for weeks, and it is not clear whether Western countries will be prepared to restore assistance that was halted when the militant Islamic movement Hamas came to power earlier this year." Abbas "says he plans to dismiss the government formally in the coming days, though he intends to ask Mr. Haniya to form the new government." He also said "that he would send a delegation to the United Nations General Assembly next week in an effort to restart a dialogue with Israel."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Corkery, 2.03M) adds Hamas and Fatah "appear headed for a shotgun wedding that has the potential to breathe life back into a peace process. But tensions being played out in towns and neighborhoods continue to smolder." The Journal says the way in which "conflicts" such as the teachers' strike "are resolved could determine whether the new unity government succeeds or fails, with major implications for Israel and the West." The Journal calls the new government "the first glimmer of progress in the Palestinian situation in months."

The AP (9/14, Gearan) notes US and Israeli "diplomats warned on Wednesday that Palestinian leaders cannot assume their proposed unity government will gain international acceptance unless they renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist." Rice and Livni "responded cautiously to Palestinian efforts to resolve an eight-month political standoff that has frozen foreign aid vital to the Palestinians." Rice is quoted saying Abbas "is someone with whom we can work and with whom we are working," and reiterating, "It's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist." Livni "offered assurances that Israel wants to make headway on the stalled plan to make peace with an eventual independent Palestinian state, despite the disarray in the Palestinian territories since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January."

Economic "Collapse" In Gaza Increasing Poverty, Malnutrition. The New York Times (9/14, Erlanger, 1.21M) details individual Palestinians' efforts to survive "the economic collapse of Gaza" since January. The Palestinian Authority "has paid most of its 73,000 employees here, nearly 40 percent of Gaza's work force, only 1.5 months' salary, resulting in a severe economic depression and growing signs of malnutrition, especially among the poorest children." That "situation has worsened since Palestinian gunmen, including those from Hamas, killed two Israeli soldiers and captured a third on June 25." Many "Gazans now get only 7 to 12 hours a day of electricity, at unpredictable hours, with running water largely dependent on electric pumps," because of an Israeli airstrike on a key power station. UN Undersecretary for Humanitarian Affairs Jan Egeland "said that Gaza was 'a ticking time bomb.'" One UN group "warned Tuesday that the economy could shrink next year to the level of 15 years ago, and unemployment could rise to over 50 percent. The World Bank expects gross domestic product to decline by 27 percent this year."

Israeli Military Seeks Lessons Learned From Hezbollah's "Strategic Victory." USA Today (9/14, For, 2.27M) reports, "Israel's military has ordered a series of investigations to examine why its armed forces were unable to crush Hezbollah militants during a month of fighting in Lebanon." Hezbollah "proved a resilient foe for Israel's vaunted military," and Israeli leaders were "surprised by [their] capabilities." One analyst says the movement "achieved a strategic victory by appearing to stand up to Israel," and its leader Hassan Nasrallah "emerged as a hero in the Arab world." Now, the Israeli military "is studying the conduct of its air force, navy and ground forces to learn from possible mistakes," especially Hezbollah's "success" against Israel's "armored forces" including the Merkava tank. USA Today says Hezbollah was "equipped with Kornet and Metis anti-tank missiles supplied by Iran and Syria. The weapons don't produce a large dust ball — or 'signature' — when fired, making it hard for tank crews to see who is firing at them." More broadly, some analysts believe Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's "decision to send the ground troops into Lebanon came too late into the war." Also, an intelligence expert said "the orders the forces received from their commanders in Israel were confusing, and were sometimes changed on an hourly basis. In some cases, brigades on the ground in Lebanon were told to begin advancing and then as they did they received orders telling them to stop."

Fourth Damascus Embassy Attacker Dies From Wounds. The New York Times (9/14, Smith, 1.21M) reports, "The sole survivor of the four-man team that attacked the American embassy here Tuesday died of his wounds without being questioned." Syrian media said his "death left Syrian authorities with only the physical evidence to piece together the origins and motivations of the attack. The country said all four men were Syrian citizens. It gave no other details and both the Syrian government and the United States embassy [in Damascus] declined to comment on the investigation." Syrian claims that the assailant died before speaking to authorities "appeared to contradict comments from the State Department late Tuesday, which said that the man was cooperating with Syrian authorities." The Times says Damascus "was quick to emphasize its security forces' role in foiling the assault before the attackers could break into the embassy compound. The country appeared eager to use the incident as an opening for improving Syria's already poor relations with the United States." The AP (9/14, Mroue) adds, "The bold attack on the U.S. Embassy has thrown new light on what President Bashar Assad calls the growing threat in Syria from Islamic extremists. But some critics say the regime is exaggerating the problem for its own political gain."

Rebel Commanders May Abandon Darfur Pact. The Washington Post (9/14, A14, Timberg, 748K) reports commanders "from the only rebel group that signed a peace accord in May for Sudan's Darfur region are prepared to resume fighting if African Union peacekeeping troops leave as scheduled at month's end and are not replaced by a United Nations force, according to more than a dozen senior rebel officials interviewed Wednesday. Rebel commanders predicted that such a resumption of combat would spell the end of Darfur's tattered peace agreement and quickly escalate fighting to an intensity not seen since the early days of the conflict in 2003 and 2004."

LATimes Urges Schwarzenegger To Sign Pension Divestment Bill. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, 918K) editorializes, "The goons who run Sudan have proved deaf to appeals from the Western world that they stop slaughtering tribespeople in Darfur. … The best response, short of intervention, is to hit them harder in a place that will really hurt: their wallets. The state of California is poised to do just that. On Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk is a bill patterned on a divestment program approved this year by the University of California. It directs the boards of the two large state retirement funds to identify companies in their investment portfolios that do significant business with the government of Sudan or sell it the weapons used to cut a bloody swath through Darfur. The boards then must notify these companies that they have 90 days to end their involvement with Sudan. If they don't, or fail to respond, the pension funds must divest. … That might be enough to make Khartoum, and the Chinese interests that do business there, stand up and take notice."

Paulson Calls On China To Implement Economic Reforms. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has called on China to implement a range of economic reforms. The AP (9/14, Crutsinger) reports that Paulson "let it be known that the Bush administration would firmly oppose any efforts by Congress to erect trade barriers in response to America's large and growing trade deficit with China, which last year hit a record $202 billion. 'Protectionist policies do not work and the collateral damage from these policies is high,' he said Wednesday in a speech in Treasury's ornate Cash Room. 'We will not heed the siren songs of protectionism and isolationism.'" The AP adds that Paulson "sought to lower expectations that he will achieve any major breakthroughs when he visits Beijing for two days of talks with Chinese officials next week."

The New York Times (9/14, Weisman, 1.21M) reports that Paulson issued "the Administration's toughest warning yet to China on economic issues," saying that Chinese leaders "were imperiling their nation's future by engaging in policies that Americans and others see as unfair."

The Washington Post (9/14, D1, Blustein, 748K) reports that Paulson said Beijing "must take steps to combat piracy of patented products, shift its economy away from dependence on exports and toward greater consumer spending, and open its financial system to foreign competition. As for the currency issue, he called it one of 'several critical, immediate challenges' that China faces."

USA Today (9/14, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that Paulson "gave a forceful defense of the benefits of trade even as he issued a tough warning to China…that it faced 'peril' unless it enacted further economic reforms." USA adds that "in a passage that won quick praise from China's critics, he warned Beijing that keeping its currency virtually fixed in value against the US dollar invites a political backlash." USA also reports, "Much of Paulson's address Wednesday could only have been welcomed by the Chinese, who explain their failure to more quickly adjust currency policy by citing the danger of undermining job growth."

In an interview with the Financial Times (9/14, Guha), Paulson said he wanted "to 'strike a balance' between tackling pressing short-term issues while maintaining a strategic perspective on China's emergence as a leading player in the global economy. 'We have a common interest,' he said, arguing that many of the steps the US wanted China to take were in its own best interest." Paulson added that the US "looked to China to be its 'co-operative partner' in reviving the Doha trade talks. Officials said Mr Paulson would push hard on Doha in meetings with world finance ministers in Singapore later this week."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Solomon, 2.03M) reports that Paulson also expressed concern about China's "energy consumption and its environmental record." Paulson "devoted several minutes to China's 'severe environmental hazards' and the need for that country, along with the US, to reduce dependence on foreign oil from unstable regions. 'China's severe environmental hazards not only are harming the health of its people and ecosystems, they are also harming China's long-term economic potential,' he said, a week before heading to China. 'Economic development without regard for environmental protection is not sustainable.'"

Bombings Fail To Spark Hindu-Muslim Riots In India. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Sappenfield, 58K) reports that immediately after last week's bombings outside a mosque in Malegaon, India, the city's Muslim leaders gathered to discuss what to do. The Monitor says that before police arrived to investigate the bombings, "the imams had made a choice. They used the loudspeakers of their mosques to spread a blanket of audible calm over the frayed city, imploring patience and forbearance. And for the second time in two months, a bombing apparently designed to ignite Hindu-Muslim riots failed. For a nation whose past has lurched from one riot to another, the response to this summer's bombings in Malegaon and Mumbai (Bombay) is no small shift, suggesting that - at least for the moment - the forces of calm are eclipsing those that would sow chaos."

Blair Criticizes Anti-American "Madness" In Europe. British Prime Minister criticized European leaders for their "anti-American 'madness'" and urged a rethinking of strategy to defeat terrorism. AFP (9/14) reports that in a 37-page document, Blair argued that none of the world's most pressing problems "could be fixed 'or even contemplated' without US involvement." Blair "urged the international community to unite around a shared set of values, tackling climate change and trade justice as well as extremist terrorism in the pamphlet 'A Global Alliance For Global Values' for the Foreign Policy Centre, a Blairite think tank."

Ros-Lehtinen Says US Must Not Waiver In Its Mission To Overcome Fanatics. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, who serves as co-chair of the Congressional United Kingdom Caucus, writes in the Washington Times (9/14, 88K) that that during her administration, former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and President Ronald Reagan "led the free world to vanquish the tyranny of our Cold War enemies. Establishment of the [Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom] in the US is an outstanding occasion to reflect on how together the United States, Britain and our freedom-loving allies defeated a common enemy." In doing so, "we can gain a better understanding of the nature of the threat we face today and the commitment that is necessary in our current struggle against Islamic fascism." Ros-Lehtinen adds, "Lady Thatcher recently said in a statement released during her visit accompanying President Bush and the first lady at the September 11 remembrance ceremony: 'That heinous attack on America was an attack on us all.' … We must be encouraged by and continue to learn from the successes with which we have collaboratively thwarted events like the foiled air plot, and must not waiver in our collective mission to overcome the fanatics. Our very survival depends on it."

Wolfowitz's Anti-Corruption Drive Sparks Backlash At World Bank. World Bank President Paul Wolfowtiz has made the fight against corruption in poor countries a hallmark issue during the first 15 months of his presidency. The New York Times (9/14, Weisman, 1.21M) reports that Wolfowitz has waged "an aggressive campaign that has led to the suspension of hundreds of millions of dollars in loans and contracts to nations including India, Chad, Kenya, Congo, Ethiopia and Bangladesh." The Times adds, "In recent months, however, his campaign has run into a host of critics, both at the bank and among financial officials outside the United States, who say that developing countries are being threatened with arbitrary punishment in a way that jeopardizes the bank's longtime mission to reduce poverty. Few here at the World Bank dispute the idea that corruption is a serious problem, but the rift over Mr. Wolfowitz's approach has grown deep and bitter, according to more than a dozen bank officials interviewed recently. The backlash at the bank against Mr. Wolfowitz's approach centers not on his intentions or goals, but on a widespread fear that countries will be categorized in the future as corrupt or not corrupt, and that lending will be shut off in a selective way."

Philanthropists Pledge $250 Million to Fight Poverty In Africa. ABC World News (9/13, story 8, 2:35, Gibson) reported, "Three philanthropists announced some extraordinary gifts today to fight extreme poverty in Africa. The Rockefeller and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundations pledged $150 million to improve farming. And George Soros has pledged $100 million to help Africa's most-desperate communities. What is so striking is how much the money can do and how far it can go."

Kondracke Says Rice, Hughes Making Headway In Fight For Overseas Opinion. In his column in Roll Call (9/14), Morton Kondracke says Clinton Administration perceptions of "ideological struggle" as "passé" led to the "folding" of the United States Information Agency into the State Department, "where public diplomacy was a backwater." However, a "spirit" of public diplomacy "is back in the person of Karen Hughes." Critics "are laughing at the idea of a presidential crony, an alleged foreign policy naïf, trying to combat an international adversary with images — in this case, fighting terrorists by visiting with Muslim women and getting the president to talk respectfully about Islam." Hughes "has the president's ear. She has energy. She understands that what people overseas think is a vital part of foreign policy. She's TV-savvy, and she's launched a stream of initiatives designed to improve America's position in what Bush calls 'the great ideological struggle of the 21st century.'" Kondracke notes, "In a controversial move within the administration, Hughes and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice seem to have persuaded Bush -- temporarily, at least -- to drop the label 'Islamic-fascism' from his speeches; diplomats say that Muslims hear it as an attack on their religion, thereby validating the extremists' false charge that the U.S. is at war with Islam." He says she "is serving as the nation's top propagandist at a time when enemy ideology is ascendant in the world." When Kondracke "asked Hughes whether she thought the US was losing the ideological war, she said, 'I'm an optimistic person. I think we have a long way to go. We have a lot more to do.'"

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House, Senate Republicans At Impasse On Terror Bill. Fox News' Special Report (9/13, Hume) reported, "Congressional Republicans today struggled to work out their differences with the Bush Administration over legislation the President has requested governing the treatment of captured terror suspects and the tribunals before which they could be tried." Fox (Garrett) added, "There is now a full blown impasse in the Senate," and "for first time, Congressional Republicans and the White House are looking at the reality that this legislation will not be passed before Congress adjourns at the end of this month to campaign for reelection."

McClatchy (9/14, Talev, Rosen) reports "President Bush and trio of influential Republican senators appeared headed for a showdown Thursday as they suspended talks on legislation outlining how to try suspected terrorists." Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner "announced that his panel will meet behind closed doors Thursday to consider legislation that he's sponsoring along with Sens. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and John McCain, R-Ariz." Their bill "aims to set new rules for military commissions that try detainees; the Bush administration's current approach was invalidated by a June Supreme Court ruling. The administration prefers a competing proposal much like the one the court struck down that's moving through the House of Representatives and is supported by some Senate Republicans."

The New York Times (9/14, Lichtblau, Zernike, 1.21M) reports the impasse "signaled the tough road the White House faces in trying to sell…key planks in its national security agenda to sometimes skeptical Congressional Republicans less than two months before the midterm elections." Democrats "have allowed Republicans to fight among themselves over the issues, and appear willing to allow the issues to come to a vote rather than risk charges of political obstructionism in an election season." The AP (9/14, Flaherty), meanwhile, refers to "election-season divisions among Republicans on the high profile issue of security," and calls Warner's actions "a direct challenge to…Bush." Warner "said the administration proposal would lower the standard for the treatment of prisoners, potentially putting US troops at risk should other countries retaliate." The White House "said Warner's proposal would undermine the nation's ability to interrogate prisoners and arranged an extraordinary conference call with reporters in which the nation's top intelligence official criticized Warner's plan."

The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt, 88K) runs a similar report under the headline "GOP In Standoff On Gitmo Rights," in which it says "late yesterday, White House officials began calling Republicans on Capitol Hill to say that they have offered to negotiate about as far as they can. The White House is expected to issue some sort of official statement sometime today on where it stands." If the committee "alters the original bill today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is expected to bypass the committee and introduce the administration's proposed bill in the coming days and move it directly to the floor. There, amendments will be offered and public votes recorded."

USA Today (9/14, Kiely, Jackson, 2.27M) quotes Graham saying, "I have lost friends in this war. I do want to bring these people to justice. … But I can't say it enough. If we start acting like our enemy, we're going to lose." Meanwhile, "the House Armed Services Committee approved Bush's plan Wednesday and rejected a proposal similar to Warner's on a party-line vote. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has scheduled a House vote for next week." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino "expressed hope that 'we'll be able to reach resolution' with Bush's Senate critics."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Lueck, Rogers, 2.03M) titles its story "Senate-Panel Republicans Break With Bush Over A Tribunal Bill," and notes Bush "comes to Capitol Hill today to meet with Republicans on his agenda." Warner adds the Journal, "has begun to reach out to the State Department in an apparent effort to soften the opposition from CIA Director Michael Hayden. And Mr. Graham said Congress must view the legislation as a chance to start over and reassert ourselves as a rule-of-law nation in the eyes of the world.'" The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Neuman, Schmitt, 918K) also says Bush "plans a personal and rare visit to the Hill on Thursday to confer with House Republicans, who are feeling political pressure to distance themselves from an unpopular president and an unpopular war in Iraq."

Hunter Says House Democratic Bill Would Grant "Enormous Rights" To Terrorists. Rep. Duncan Hunter said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "I just finished the…passage of the terrorist court bill, which will allow us to try these terrorists, including the ones that designed this attack on 9/11. And the Democrats did offer a bill that gave more rights, more defendants' rights, to the alleged terrorists than my bill did. And they made a very passionate argument that we needed to give these additional rights to alleged terrorists. And they made an argument that the only way we could obtain a conviction, if it was the only evidence available, and that evidence came from an American agent who was undisclosed to the terrorists, that we would have to disclose that agent, and let the terrorist himself, face to face, know the identity of the American agent. Now, that's giving them enormous rights, and, I would say, to the detriment of American agents and American military personnel."

Schieffer Says Secret Prisons Akin To "Adopting The Methods Of Our Enemies." CBS Evening News (9/13, story 8, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The treatment of terror suspects is the topic of tonight's 'Free Speech.' The speaker is our own Bob Schieffer, chief Washington correspondent, and anchor of 'Face the Nation.'" Schieffer said, "I have no sympathy for those suspected 9/11 ringleaders. If the evidence proves them guilty, I hope they get the death penalty. But I'm glad they took them out of those secret CIA prisons. For me it's a matter of national security -- ours. Democracies have no business running secret prisons. That's what our enemies do. If we are in a battle for the hearts and minds of people around the world, as the Administration says we are, I won't feel very secure if the people around the world believe we are no different than our enemies. Of course, we must do all in our power to protect this country. During the Cold War, we built a mighty arsenal of weapons, and it kept the Soviet Union at bay for decades. But the weapons didn't win the war. We won when the people under Soviet domination could finally look across the Iron Curtain and see that open, democratic government made for a better life." Schieffer concluded, "Real security begins with remembering who we are. We gain nothing by adopting the methods of our enemies."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M) editorializes that there is "a legitimate debate to be had over waterboarding and other tactics," but "we hope the next '9/11' commission doesn't have to explain why the US stopped employing interrogation methods that were both lawful and successful."

The Washington Post (9/14, A20, 748K) says in an editorial that in "deciding between the two main proposals for handling and trying accused terrorists, the Senate confronts a fateful choice: Will it send President Bush, as he demands, legislation that would authorize the CIA to engage in interrogation tactics the world understands as torture, rewrite America's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, and authorize trials whose fairness many people at home and abroad will question? Or will the Senate approve a bill that ensures justice for foreign detainees and ends the CIA's secret detentions and harsh interrogations? The White House is pulling out all the stops to get the former. The question now is whether the group of Republicans who have courageously pushed a competing bill -- John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John W. Warner (Va.) -- will be able to team up with other moderate Republicans and Democrats to stop the excesses that have so damaged America's standing in the world." Having "finally been forced by the Supreme Court to take responsibility for writing law to govern the war on terrorism, Congress will now decide whether it simply means to sign off on the administration's past abuses, or reaffirm fundamental American values."

In his New York Times column (9/14), Bob Herbert says, "The character of the US has changed. We're in danger of being completely ruled by fear. Most Americans have not shared the burden of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Very few Americans are aware, as the Center for Constitutional Rights tells us, that of the hundreds of men held by the US in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, many 'have never been charged and will never be charged because there is no evidence justifying their detention.' Even fewer care. We could benefit from looking in a mirror, and absorbing the shock of not recognizing what we've become."

Senate Judiciary Panel Approves Eavesdropping Program. The Washington Post (9/14, A13, Weisman, 748K), under the headline "GOP Leaders Back Bush On Wiretapping, Tribunals," says "Congress's Republican leadership yesterday threw its weight behind two of President Bush's most controversial national security programs, warrantless wiretapping and extrajudicial military tribunals." However, "the party leaders are having trouble getting all their members on board, including the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. And by backing the president's legislative demands, the leadership risks being labeled by Democrats as a rubber stamp for an unpopular president. With prodding from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10 to 8 along party lines to approve a bill negotiated with the White House to allow -- but not require -- Bush to submit the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program to a secret court for constitutional review." USA Today (9/14, 2.27M) notes Republicans "defeated Democratic amendments to insert a one-year expiration date and require the NSA to report more often to Congress on the program."

Bloomberg (9/14) reports "the measure would authorize a secret court to rule on the legality of the National Security Agency's program to listen to the international calls between al-Qaeda operatives overseas and their suspected confederates in the U.S. without court warrants." Bush "agreed to the measure's wording in negotiations with Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the panel. By a series of 10-8 votes, the Republican-controlled committee defeated efforts by Democrats to change it."

Deputy Attorney General Says Restrictions On Surveillance Program Would Have Little Effect. CQ (9/13, Starks) reports, "A Justice Department official seemed to imply earlier this week, to the astonishment of some House Judiciary Committee members, that a bill aimed at reining in the Bush administration's warrantless wiretapping program would have little impact even if passed." Deputy Attorney General John A. Eisenberg "testified that New Mexico Republican Heather A. Wilson's bill (HR 5825) -- designed to update the law governing domestic surveillance while giving the president limited spying authority -- might 'reduce' the need for President Bush to use what he calls his Terrorism Surveillance Program (TSP)." But "when pressed by Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., on whether the measure would eliminate the need for the program, Eisenberg said, 'I think we just view TSP as separate from Wilson.'" His testimony, "combined with Bush's assertion of executive authority under the Constitution, has led some lawmakers to question whether the administration would follow a revised surveillance law."

Opening Arguments Made At Albany Terrorism Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/14, Virtanen) reports that in opening arguements at the trial of Albany mosque imam Yassin Aref and mosque member Mohammed Hossain, accused of material support of terrorism, "a defense attorney attacked the credibility of an FBI informant who posed as an arms dealer in a fictitious plot to kill a Pakistani diplomat." Hossain lawyer Kevin Luibrand said of the informant, "He's a convicted felon. He's a con man. … They got somebody that lied to the FBI completely and continuously about what was happening." Aref's attorney, Kent Sprotbery, said that "Aref was never shown any shoulder-fired missile, and testimony will show all three men thought the talk about attacking the diplomat was 'a joke.'" The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said the audiotapes and videotapes will show the informant impersonated an arms dealer in conversations with both Hossain and later Aref, that he told them the $50,000 came from the sale of the missile. … 'A sting is simply a crime of opportunity, where the opportunity was provided by the government,' Pericek said."

Under the headline "Prosecutors Weave Tale Of Zeal Gone Wrong," The Albany Times-Union (9/14, Lyons) reports, "The first day of testimony was at times disjointed and, in one instance, confusing as prosecutors called a Bangladeshi immigrant to the stand whose English was so poor, numerous court observers said they could not understand what he was saying." Meanwhile, Luibrand "assailed the FBI's informant as a 'convict' and 'con man' whom he contends misled FBI agents about the context of secretly recorded conversations the men had in Arabic and Urdu. 'He's called an informant,' Luibrand said. 'I have a few other words for him. ... Malik was giving a different message back to his (FBI) handlers than what was taking place in the room.'" The Times-Union adds that the first prosecution witness, "a Department of Defense official from Alabama, gave the panel a crash course on the destructive capabilities of a 5-foot long, Russian-made missile launcher that he hoisted atop his shoulder. … Aref was never shown the weapon, although he did see its metal triggering device at a later meeting."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intense FBI Search Continues For Al Qaeda Sleeper Shukrijumah. CNN yesterday ran two versions of Kelly Arena's report on the FBI search for Saudi-born Adnan el Shukrijumah, whom she described as "one of al Qaeda's most deadly sleeper agents and an urgent threat to the United States." On CNN's The Situation Room (9/13, Blitzer), Arena reported that el Shukrijumah "came to the United States when his family was just 2 years old. His father wanted what only America could offer his son. … But Shukrijumah's American experience took a sharp turn in his mid 20s. Sources say he met an alleged al Qaeda operative who officials say helped turn him from a typical student into one of the most-wanted men in the world." FBI Director Robert Mueller: "Yes, he is dangerous. Yes, he had ties with persons who were al Qaeda. And we believe he shares the ideology. And if had the capability, would participate and attack himself." Arena: "The FBI says he has surveilled targets in Chicago, New York, Washington and Houston. And it's believed he came up with a plot to blow up apartment buildings." FBI Special Agent Stu McArthur: "He has great understanding and knowledge of how this country works and operates, and that, you know, underscores his dangerousness." The FBI believes that he is now somewhere in Pakistan. The US is passing out match books there with his picture promising a $5 million reward."

The version which aired on CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/13) included the comments from Mueller and McArthur, but Arena also interviewed FBI Special Agent Andrew Lenzen, lead agent on the case. Arena noted, "Shukrijumah studied at Broward Community College," and "he did really well, excelling in chemistry and computers. His father, an imam, tried to raise him right, to be a good Muslim," but after meeting alleged al Qaeda operative Ishmael Faeez, "Shukrijumah made his way to al Qaeda training camps, where it's believed he received extensive weapons training." Lenzen: "Adnan went to these camps and was not necessarily recruited but developed himself into an al Qaeda warrior. And part of that was that he started with these menial tasks, washing dishes, doing the chores of a low-level recruit to prove himself." Arena: "Lenzen says when Shukrijumah returned to south Florida, he had changed -- more calm, more self-assured. But before the 9/11 attacks, he left his family for good and didn't even return when his father died two years ago." Lenzen: "We can firmly say that al Qaeda is using his skill sets as -- his chemistry background and his computer expertise, his interest in making movies, to really fit well into the al Qaeda" agenda.

Miller Says Publicity Deprives Sleepers Of Needed Anonymity. Following the Arena piece, Zahn interviewed FBI Assistant Director John Miller and former CIA Counter-Terrorism Center Director Robert Grenier, asking Miller about Shukrijumah, "How much of a priority is it for the FBI to apprehend him?" Miller: "Well, it's a priority. As you saw in Kelli's report, it was announced by the FBI's director and the Attorney General some time ago that he was a priority," but "I want to add, Paula, that anonymity -- the ability to move in the shadows -- for an operator within a group like al Qaeda, is a key piece, and by adding him to these lists, by putting him on your show, by doing these stories, by having him on our Web site, we take away a lot of that am anonymity. We neutralize a lot of the abilities that would give us concern, the idea that he's comfortable in Western culture, that he's familiar with the United States, that he's got an ability to move around."

Later in the interview, Zahn said, "John, you were describing a little bit earlier on how this guy loses some of his anonymity by having his face plastered all over the Internet…which makes you wonder just how valuable you think average citizens are in this war, particularly in the search, perhaps, for home grown terrorists." Miller: "Well, very valuable. I mean, you take a case like this, an airline ticket clerk, an alert border official, a citizen on the street, you know, people think that the match books, which are put together by the U.S. Department of State as part of their rewards for justice program, is kind of a long shot or a little quaint, yet it was the match books and the advertising of the reward that led to the capture in Pakistan of Ramsey Usef, who was wanted in connection with the bombing of the first World Trade Center."

Zahn also said to Grenier about Shukrijumah, "We understand…that law enforcement believes that, in fact, 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed was actually giving him the instructions to keep the terror network alive in the United States. What does that say about his value to al Qaeda?" Grenier: "Well, obviously, this is someone who had that background in the United States, had the ability to move freely and is the sort of individual, perhaps among others, that al Qaeda would look to in order to carry out attacks in the future in the United States, particularly if their handlers and their trainers were to be captured or killed."

House Passes 9/11 Resolution 395-22 After Bitter Debate. The AP (9/14, Dalrymple) reports, "House Republicans and Democrats traded accusations of improper politicking Wednesday as they sparred over a resolution commemorating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks." Democrats "criticized the GOP-drafted resolution for praising controversial legislation, including the USA Patriot Act and a border security bill. Some faulted it for stating 'the nation is safer than it was on Sept. 11, 2001.'" House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi "called the resolution 'self-congratulatory.'" The bill's sponsor, GOP Rep. Peter King, "called the criticism 'cheap demagoguery.'" Republicans "defended the inclusion of the GOP-crafted security laws and bills. Without them, said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., 'we would not be here today without having suffered another attack on our soil.'" The AP adds, "Despite the rhetorical battle, the resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks passed 395-22." The "intensifying quarrel between Republicans and Democrats" over national security "comes weeks before this fall's midterm elections, which will determine which party controls the House and Senate."

The Washington Times (9/14, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "While many Democrats characterized the Patriot Act as a violation of civil liberties, Republicans said it has broken up terrorist cells." Said Drier, "It is absolutely essential that those keeping us safe have every tool necessary to do so. … Our homeland has not been attacked again. That seems to be so often forgotten."

Democrats Blast Boehner Over Terrorism Comments. CNN's The Situation Room 99/13, Blitzer) reported, "Democrats are blasting the House Majority Leader John Boehner" over his claim that Democrats are "more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people." Sen. John Kerry "fired right back today," saying, "I'm not interested in asking Mr. Boehner for clarification or retraction or even an apology. His statement was very clear and I believe equally despicable. And his words are frankly beyond redemption."

Democratic Rep. John Murtha said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "I'm convinced they're desperate, for him to say something. He can't mean what he's saying. In this free country, if we disagree with the President when he's going in the wrong direction, and we want to change direction, you are going to have to speak out. We can't just go along with a policy which is a failed policy." Murtha added, "I think he owes all the members an apology who disagree."

Democrats Say They "Will Not Be Swift-Boated." The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Capitol Hill Democrats said yesterday they will not be 'swift-boated' by Republicans who accuse them of being soft on national security and coddling terrorists. 'Democrats stand ready to protect and defend the American people,' House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said. 'We will not be swift-boated on the issue of security, and that is what the Republicans are trying to do.'" Pelosi "was referring to the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which was highly critical of John Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004."

The Financial Times (9/14, Yeager, Luce) reports, "America's mid-term congressional elections, which take place on 7 November, are shaping up as one of the most bitter campaigns in recent US history. Although George W. Bush is not expected to play a prominent role on the campaign trail over the next seven weeks, the president has given a series of speeches in the past 10 days that have helped crystalise his party's att-empts to paint the Democrats as weak on national security." In an interview last Sunday, Dick Cheney "was more blunt in suggesting a connection between Democratic criticism of the Iraq war and being soft on terrorism. 'Suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw US forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion [and] validate the strategy of the terrorists,' he said." While "viewed by many as below-the-belt, such pugilism could be a small foretaste of what is to come."

Reid Calls Bush's 9/11 Address "Untoward." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid discussed President Bush's televised address on PBS NewsHour (9/13, Lehrer), saying, "If you look at his speech, all he did was take words that he had given all the previous month in his political speeches -- campaign speeches in Georgia, and other places in the country, exact same words. He had an opportunity, on that night, that solemn occasion, to bring America together, not point fingers -- and that's what he did -- not give a campaign speech. And I thought that it was untoward for him to do that."

Senate Republicans Reject Democratic Additions To Port Security Bill. The AP (9/14) reports, "Senate Republicans on Wednesday rejected a Democratic attempt to attach dozens of national security programs to legislation intended to protect seaports." The Democrats' proposal "had threatened the overall ports security bill, which would install monitors at the 22 largest ports. These devices would screen for materials used to make radiological bombs or nuclear weapons. The ports bill could come to a final vote on Thursday." The AP adds, "The plan by Democratic leader Harry Reid would have put Republicans in the awkward position of opposing security measures that many people in the United States believe are long overdue. Examples include improving safeguards on trains and buses and at chemical plants. … Democratic Sens. Bill Nelson of Florida, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Mark Pryor of Arkansas voted against Reid's proposal."

NYTimes Suggests Bush Team Putting "Corporate Profits" Ahead Of "Safety." The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) editorializes, "Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, seems determined to outdo his commander in chief in ratcheting up fears of Al Qaeda whenever he wants to score political points. This week, he raised the specter that if the government starts too many expensive antiterrorism programs it could further a plot by Osama bin Laden to 'drive us crazy, into bankruptcy" through overspending on homeland defense.'" The Times adds, "It was particularly ironic that Mr. Chertoff spun this theory while he was fighting off a measure, up for a vote today, that would help protect our ports against the threat that he himself deems most worrisome -- a nuclear explosion within our borders -- without government spending." The Times adds, "When it comes to homeland security, the Bush administration has repeatedly allowed corporate profits to trump safety. That seems to be the problem here, just as it has been when it came to the chemical industry's resistance to reforms that would help protect against toxic disasters if terrorists ever attacked their plants."

Terror Informant Sought Aid From Hillary Clinton. The AP (9/14, Hays) reports an "unusual exchange of letters between an undercover informant and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's office has apparently angered authorities and may have complicated the case of a man convicted of plotting to bomb a busy subway station." Osama Eldawoody, "a paid New York Police Department informant who was instrumental in exposing the 2004 subway scheme -- told The Associated Press that he wrote to Clinton last month, complaining that his law enforcement handlers misled him with false promises of a better life and asking her to intervene on his behalf." A written response "from Clinton, shared with the AP by Eldawoody, said she had 'requested a review of this matter and a written response' from federal prosecutors in Brooklyn. The letter also suggests Eldawoody seek help from Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, where he now lives." Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines "confirmed that her office had received the letter from Eldawoody, but said the senator was not personally involved in the written exchange and was unaware of the issue." Eldawoody "said in a telephone interview last week that he was summoned to a meeting with investigators and a federal prosecutor and was reprimanded for contacting Clinton and told not to do it again." The AP adds Eldawoody, 50, "was a key prosecution witness in the federal government's case against Shahawar Matin Siraj, who was convicted in May of plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in Manhattan."

Audit Finds California Homeland Security Funds Held Up In Red Tape. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Halper, 918K) reports a study released Tuesday by State Auditor Elaine M. Howle finds that "California's efforts to prepare for a terrorist attack or natural disaster are being undermined by a morass of red tape." Howles says in the report that "the administration of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has let tens of millions of dollars in federal emergency preparedness grants languish unspent and has not adequately tested the ability of California's medical facilities to handle mass casualties. … By the end of June, the state had spent less than half of the $954 million of federal homeland security grants it had been awarded since 2001, the report said."

Disruptive Airline Passenger To Be Arraigned Today In Virginia. The Washington Post (9/14, B1, Markon, Rondeaux, 748K) reports, "A professional jujitsu fighter from Brazil sat in a Loudoun County jail yesterday on a felony charge that he tried to open the cabin door of a Dulles-bound airliner as it cruised at 30,000 feet over Tennessee. Carlos Alberto de Oliveira, 43, missed his appearance in court yesterday morning because he fought with sheriff's deputies who came to escort him, Loudoun authorities said. He is expected to be arraigned today on a state charge of interfering with an aircraft's operations." The Post notes, "Although de Oliveira's motivations were unclear, federal officials have ruled out terrorism and concluded after interviewing him that he did not intend any harm. 'He didn't threaten anyone, he didn't hurt anyone. He wasn't intending to open the door, he didn't kick it,' said Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office. 'He just pulled a stupid stunt.'"

Cost Of Registered Traveler Could Kill Program. USA Today (9/14, Frank, 2.27M) reports a proposed cost of "up to $200" a year to participate in the "long-delayed" Registered Traveler program "could kill the program, advocates and lawmakers said Wednesday." The TSA "said last year that it expected to charge about $30 for a terrorism check. Now it wants to charge another $70 to pay for TSA screeners at Registered Traveler checkpoints, TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said. It also may charge an additional $20 for a criminal background check. Those costs are in addition to yearly fees of up to $80 that fliers would pay to companies operating the program. … The agency revealed the $100 fee on its website Monday with no publicity."

Democrats Seek Probe Of Former EPA Director On 9/11 Health Issues. The AP (9/14, De La Cruz) reports, "Democrats from New York and New Jersey asked on Wednesday for an investigation that could lead to criminal charges against former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christie Whitman for breathing problems suffered by thousands after the Sept. 11 attacks." The AP continues, "Whitman told The Associated Press that she and the EPA 'agreed then and I reiterate now that the air on the WTC site was not clean – the consequence of millions of tons of burned debris from the most horrific attack in our nation's history. … We were emphatic that workers needed to wear respirators, a message I repeated frequently.'" The AP adds, "At hearings last week in New York, Whitman was the most frequent target of lawmakers who charged that ground zero workers were not protected as they worked to clear the pile of toxic debris. … Whitman, a former Republican governor of New Jersey, declared in the days after Sept. 11 that the air in lower Manhattan was safe for workers and residents. But she has said she and the EPA always differentiated between the air quality in lower Manhattan and at ground zero." The AP notes, "Former Sept. 11 Commission chairman Thomas Kean, also a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said it was troubling that the Democratic congressmen 'would misuse the heroic service of thousands for their political gain in an election season.' … The congressmen – New York Reps. Jerrold Nadler and Anthony Weiner and New Jersey Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. – said the health of their constituents, and not politics, was their concern. … In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the trio accused Whitman of 'endangering the lives of thousands of people.' … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency had not yet received the letter."

FBI Assistant Director Rebuts Calls For US MI5. In a New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) op-ed, FBI Assistant Director John Miller writes that with the 9/11 anniversary and the disrupted airline bombing plot, "we are seeing another round of calls to break up the F.B.I. or to create a domestic intelligence agency separate from the F.B.I. with no police powers, similar to Britain's MI5. But these critics…seem to be unaware of two critical things. One is how far the F.B.I. has come in transforming itself into an intelligence-driven organization in the last five years; the other is how many attacks we have prevented in that span. Using intelligence and technology — and our authority to make arrests — the F.B.I. has stopped five terrorist plots in progress in roughly the last year alone." Miller adds, "As we break down the structure of Al Qaeda, we see the very shape of the terrorist threat changing and adapting. Our approach has to continually evolve to keep up. Starting over from scratch will only set us back and make America less safe."

Kerry Says Bush Administration The Real Source Of Harm For CIA. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (9/14), Sen. John Kerry says, "Your Sept. 12 editorial 'Jack Bauer Insurance' was a disservice not to me or to fictional characters like Jack Bauer, but to the very real CIA agents whose commitment to the truth didn't fit the administration's neoconservative agenda on Iraq, and to agents endangered by reckless administration policies. It's been reported that CIA officers refused to be trained in the administration's controversial interrogation techniques, and in at least one instance these techniques yielded questionable information aimed at pleasing the interrogators. The Supreme Court, not Democrats, ruled administration detainee policies out of bounds, and it was the outrage of Republican senators that forced the administration to apply the Geneva Convention to enemy prisoners in order to best protect captured Americans." Former CIA case officer Jim Marcinkowski "argued the Valerie Plame leak hurt 'the credibility of our case officers when they try to convince an overseas contact that their safety is of primary importance.' Former CIA agent Larry Johnson, a registered Republican, said it 'speaks volumes' that President Bush held no one accountable for the leak of an agent's identity." CIA officers "don't need Jack Bauer insurance -- they need insurance against the recklessness of this administration."

Pentagon Police Officer Who Survived 9/11 Profiled. The Washington Times (9/14, Taylor, 88K) runs the fourth installment of a five-part feature series offering updates on "three men and two women who survived the attack on the Pentagon" on 9/11. Today's checks in with Pentagon police Officer George E. Clodfelter III.

WAR NEWS:

Death Squads Blamed For 65 Bodies "Dumped Across Baghdad." Media reporting on Iraq focuses on the discovery of what ABC World News (9/13, story 4, 2:40, Gibson) called "65 men, most of them bound, tortured and shot," found "dumped across Baghdad. Officials believe they were the victims of sectarian death squads, roaming the capital." While that incident is the basis of most coverage, some reports suggest it is representative of the general situation in the country. In its lead story, CBS Evening News (9/13, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) said the "violence in Iraq just keeps getting worse." CBS (Logan) added, "American and Iraqi officials agree death squads now pose a greater threat to Iraq than the ongoing insurgency." At the Pentagon, CBS (Martin) added, "Sectarian violence, Iraqis killing Iraqis, has become what the Pentagon calls the greatest threat; in breaking the cycle of violence, the most pressing role. … There's still no time table for Iraq, but the months between now and the end of the year are shaping up as crunch time."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) called it "an especially gruesome day in Iraq," reporting that in addition to the bodies found "despite the massive security crackdown underway right now," at least "39 other people were killed today in other attacks and dozens more were wounded. The US military announced the deaths of two more American soldiers just today." McClatchy (9/14, Brunswick, Ahmed) calls the discovery of the bodies "a setback to the U.S. military's efforts to reduce sectarian violence in Iraq's capital city." The "apparent resurgence in execution-style murders, which are often associated with sectarian violence and death squads, came as U.S. and Iraqi patrols have been sweeping Baghdad neighborhoods in search of insurgents and sectarian militiamen."

The Washington Post (9/14, A16, Paley, Ibrahim, 748K) reports "nearly 100 people were killed or found dead in the Iraqi capital over the past 24 hours, authorities said Wednesday, continuing a wave of sectarian violence that has defied American efforts to thwart the carnage." The Los Angeles Times (9/14, McDonnell, Barnes, 918K) reports that "on a day in which nearly 100 bodies attested to Iraq's unbridled violence, Democrats stepped up their response to President Bush's policies." In its front page headline, the New York Times (9/14, Oppel, 1.21M) simply says, "On Another Grim Day, Bodies Lie Everywhere In Baghdad."

Sunni Leader Demands Government Action To Disarm Militias. An AP (9/13, Quinn) story carried by more than 80 newspapers and websites leads by reporting Adnan al-Dulaimi, whose Iraqi Accordance Front is Iraq's largest Sunni political party, "demanded Wednesday that the beleaguered Shiite-led government take steps to disarm militias" after the bodies were discovered. Dulaimi said, "We hope the government carries out what it pledged and disbands militias and considers them terrorist organizations."

Baghdad Emergency First Responders Profiled. ABC World News (9/13, story 5, 2:50, Gibson) took a "rare inside look…at what might be called 'Baghdad 911': Iraq's first responders. When violence erupts in the capital, as bodies are found as they were today, the first call goes there. The number rings often. And recently, they have been very busy."

Khamenei Says US Withdrawal Would End Iraq Instability. The AP (9/13, Dareini), in a report carried by more than 80 newspapers and websites, says Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told visiting Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki that the "way to end instability in Iraq is for U.S. forces to withdraw." Maliki is in Iran "looking to a close ally of his Shiite-led government for help in calming the violence tearing apart Iraq and in developing Iraq's troubled oil industry," the AP says.

Annan Says Mideast Leaders See Iraq War As "A Real Disaster." The Washington Times (9/14, Pisik, 88K) details press conference remarks by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan that "Washington's options in Iraq are constrained by competing pressures from countries in the region for the U.S. to stay or to leave quickly. 'The U.S. has found itself in a position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave. And if it has to leave, the timing has to be optimum and it has to be arranged in such a way that it does not lead to even greater disruption or violence.'" Annan added that "most regional leaders felt the U.S. occupation of Iraq had harmed their countries. 'Honestly, most of the leaders I spoke to felt invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them. They feel it has destabilized the region.'"

Murtha Resolution Seeks Rumsfeld Resignation. The Hill (9/14, Tiron) reports Rep. John Murtha, "echoing moves in the Senate," is seeking the "immediate resignation" of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. In his resolution, Murtha "lists a litany of reasons for Rumsfeld's immediate resignation, ranging from the secretary's insistence that there were weapons of mass in destruction in Iraq to his failure to anticipate the number of troops needed to secure Iraq and to address the flagging readiness of U.S ground troops." Meanwhile, Rep. David Obey said Wednesday, "The Defense Secretary should return to the private sector."

Carter Says Cheney Deliberately Misled American People On Iraq. Ex-President Jimmy Carter was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (9/13) about Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion that criticism of the Iraq war emboldens US enemies and makes allies doubt American resolve. Carter said, "The Vice President unfortunately has been consistently very careless with the truth. He still maintains some preposterous comments and attitudes toward the origins of the Iraqi war, the circumstances in Iraq now and he's had a policy in my opinion of deliberately trying to mislead the American people by making untrue statements and there's no reason to give any credence to his ridiculous claims that you've just described."

Reid Says US Needs "To Change Direction" In Iraq. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said on PBS NewsHour (9/13, Lehrer), "We need to change direction in Iraq. We need to make sure that people understand that we can't be there forever. We're not for moving out right away, but we believe there should be a redeployment that would start by the end of this year."'

Korb, Ogden Say Sending More Troops To Iraq No Simple Task. In a Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K) op-ed, Lawrence J. Korb and Peter Ogden of the Center for American Progress respond to the September 12 op-ed "Reinforce Baghdad" by William Kristol and Rich Lowry, which called for a substantial increase in US troop numbers in Iraq. Korb and Ogden write, "Aside from the strategic dubiousness of their proposal…there is a practical obstacle to it that they overlook: Sending more troops to Iraq would, at the moment, threaten to break our nation's all-volunteer Army and undermine our national security. This is not a risk our country can afford to take. … The only way for Kristol and Lowry to put their new plan into action anytime soon without resorting to a draft -- and thereby dismantling the all-volunteer Army, which, as the authors themselves would certainly admit, could be strategically disastrous -- is by demanding even more from our soldiers by accelerating their training and rotation schedules. While there is no question that the soldiers would respond to more frequent calls to duty, it is doubtful that they would be supplied with proper equipment and training for their mission in the near term. Moreover, the long-term toll on the cost and quality of our troops would be threatened by the added strain."

NATO Nations Fail To Agree On More Troops For Afghanistan. In a straightforward report, the AP (9/13, Garwood) says NATO nations "failed to agree on calls by military commanders for 2,500 extra troops to help crush the growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan, where at least 50 people were killed Wednesday in widespread violence." The Washington Times (9/14, Kralev, 88K) runs a more critical story under the headline "NATO Allies Ignore Call For Troops," leading by saying NATO allies "failed to answer Washington's call to commit more troops to the escalating battle with Taliban and al Qaeda fighters in Afghanistan yesterday, prompting the Bush administration to rethink its diplomatic strategy ahead of two meetings of alliance ministers later this month."

Poland Is "Best Hope" For Fresh NATO Troops. The Financial Times (9/14, Dombey, Fidler, Cienski) reports Poland "emerged on Wednesday as Nato's best hope of more troops for Afghanistan." The Polish Defense ministry said Poland, "which has announced plans to withdraw its 900 soldiers from Iraq, was in talks with its Nato allies about where and when they would be deployed in Afghanistan. Poland, which has about 100 troops in Afghanistan, has already announced it will send about 900 extra soldiers to the country from 2007."

Army Did Not Take Out Taliban Members Spotted At Funeral. An NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 3, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M) report on Afghanistan is sympathetic to soldiers on the ground and seems critical of commanders and rules of engagement. NBC reported, "We have a story that that has do with a single photograph. It is a surveillance photo taken in Afghanistan" showing "a gathering of Taliban fighters. But some say it shows more than that. Some say it shows what was a perfect opportunity to take out the enemy but the military was unable to take the shot. The question is why." NBC (Sanders) added, "Army intelligence officers say the photo shows 190 members of the Taliban at a funeral two months ago. The US Army claims among those in formation, high ranking members of the Taliban leadership. An unmanned armed Predator was spying on the group.

Intelligence officers monitoring the scene in real time wanted to fire. They asked permission but the request went to intelligence analysts, senior commanders, and lawyers. The intelligence officers were told no. They were not allowed to fire. Why? US rules of engagement do not permit waging war in a cemetery. … Meantime, the Taliban fight by their own rules. On Monday at a funeral for an a government official, a Taliban bomber blew himself up killing six policemen."

In a follow-up, NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 4, 1:15, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said, "Actually, there is a little bit of confusion here tonight. A senior Pentagon official tells us that the rules of engagement did not prevent the commanders on the ground in Afghanistan from launching air strikes against that grouping of Taliban. Now, these rules are set in place to avoid serious accidents such as killing of innocents or destruction of sensitive religious sites but there are exceptions. If the value of the target outweighs the potential collateral damage, death of civilians or cultural backlash, then commanders are able to take the shot. … Officials tonight think that the commanders in Afghanistan blew the call and they should have taken the shot."

Pentagon Says Military Will Meet Recruiting Goals. The Washington Times (9/14, Scarborough, 88K) reports the US military "will meet wartime recruiting goals for the fiscal year that ends in two weeks," according to the Pentagon. The Times says that "despite Washington's heated political debate on the worthiness of the Iraq war, frequent overseas war deployments and daily casualties, officials say a sufficient number of young men and women are signing up."

Gay Rights Groups Revive Push For Reversal Of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." The New York Times (9/14, Alvarez, 1.21M) reports that as the "Pentagon's search for soldiers grows more urgent, gay rights groups are making the biggest push in nearly a decade" to reverse the 1993 "compromise policy…dubbed 'don't ask, don't tell,' that bars openly gay people from serving in the military." But the "move to change the policy faces stiff resistance from the Pentagon and Republicans in Congress, who, in a time of war during a tough election year, have no longing for another contentious debate about gay troops." A House bill to "do away with the policy" has "picked up 119 supporters, but only five of them Republicans."

DOJ:

Gonzales Seen As Legal Architect Of Anti-Terror Strategy. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (9/14), Jose De La Isla writes, "President Bush has finally announced that 14 terrorist suspects will go on trial. He has acknowledged the detainees have been in CIA hands and are now in military custody. Congress still has to authorize court procedures for the trials. This is a pivotal moment. It is a 'paradigm change,' a time when one conceptual way of understanding could give way to another." De La Isla continues, "Alberto Gonzales, as Bush's legal counselor in the White House before becoming U.S. attorney general, will continue as a central character. He is without peer in putting the policies together. … Not since Robert F. Kennedy was working for his brother JFK have the White House and Justice Department driven such fundamental change. The enigmatic, secretive Gonzales will have a lasting effect on future presidencies." De La Isla adds, "Before going to the White House, Gonzales had been Gov. George W. Bush's legal advisor, Texas' secretary of state, and then chief justice on the state Supreme Court. … He was from the beginning a close, trusted member of the Bush team. … What Karl Rove has been to Bush's political planning, Gonzales has been to legal strategy." De La Isla continues, "Before 9/11, Gonzales had assembled a group of lawyers, mainly members of the Federalist Society, in the White House's Office of Legal Counsel. The conservative organization holds that the Constitution has a fixed and knowable meaning and they oppose interpretations that cast it as having an evolving significance. … He and his group were leaders on legal policy issues, even over the Justice Department, national security advisor Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell at the State Department, mostly because Gonzales had the president's ear. … From the White House, Timothy Flanigan, Bradford Berenson and Brett Kavanaugh, among others, sought to fast-track, streamline and broaden presidential authority." De La Isla notes, "The attacks of 9/11 only accelerated that approach, called 'forward leaning,' to anticipate, detect, detain and prosecute suspects and those who maintained ties to or supported suspected terrorist activities. … Much of what happened next is widely known. … The fast-tracking, streamlining, and broadening of presidential powers rolled over Congress, which granted broad authority in its resolution of Sept. 14 and the Patriot Act. Otherwise, Congress was not a full partner in granting and overseeing war powers. Now it has to decide whether to go along with the Bush administration's proposal for trying terrorists. … Through it all, Gonzales was there, in the middle of the legal justifications for the hallmarks of this administration. He had a hand in or he could have intervened before ideas reached the president on paper. But to the legal team that worked for him, the assumption all along was Alberto Gonzales represented the direction the president wanted."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lockyer Says HP Charges Possible Within A Week. The AP (9/14, Robertson) reports, "Criminal charges could come within a week in the boardroom spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co., the state Attorney General's Office said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Spokesman Tom Dresslar did not say who would be charged or what the charges would be. He also emphasized that it may take longer for the detailed investigation to produce charges. … 'We're not going to confine ourselves to any particular timetable,' Dresslar said. 'We'll go when we're ready to go, and not a minute before that.'" The AP adds, "On Tuesday, Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he already had enough evidence to charge HP insiders and the private investigators who impersonated board members and journalists in order to access logs of their personal phone calls. … 'We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside,' Lockyer told PBS' 'NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.' … He has said HP's internal probe of media leaks violated two California laws governing identity theft and illegal access to computer records. … The FBI and the U.S. attorney for Northern California are also investigating HP for illegal computer intrusion and wiretapping. The company also faces inquiries by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission and the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee."

Lockyer Takes Center Stage In HP Drama. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Carlton, Emshwiller) reports, "Now that Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board has taken steps to address its investigation of boardroom leaks, attention is firmly fixed on Bill Lockyer, the California attorney general who has made high-profile pledges to bring any lawbreakers to justice." The Journal continues, "In an interview yesterday, Mr. Lockyer added that he is looking beyond a Boston-area investigation firm linked to the H-P probe to a 'complicated chain' of parties in multiple states that may have taken part in a practice called 'pretexting,' in which private phone records were obtained under false pretenses. He said he has spoken about the case with Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly, whose office is cooperating." The Journal adds, "Mr. Lockyer's remarks indicate that his investigation has expanded well beyond the borders of California. They also raise the profile of a man who many people outside the state have never heard of, a veteran brawler who has shown little hesitation in going after legal scofflaws and political foes."

USA Today (9/14, Kessler) reports, "The Department of Justice, FBI, House Energy and Commerce Committee, and Securities and Exchange Commission also have launched inquiries. … But outspoken Lockyer may be HP's biggest threat. The life-long politician is often 'greatly underestimated,' says Los Angeles defense attorney Mark Geragos, who is both Lockyer's friend and rival." USA continues, "Lockyer has held state office since 1973 without ever losing an election. He earned his law degree while simultaneously serving as a state senator. As attorney general, he has taken on energy giants and the Bush administration. He once left his own wedding reception to appear on television about the Laci Peterson murder trial. … But the HP case will be a challenge, legal experts say. In an attempt to stop leaks to the press, HP hired a detective firm, which hired a subcontractor. Employees of the subcontractor pretended to be HP board members and journalists to get their phone records."

Small Boston Firm Is Key Link In Probe. The New York Times (9/14, Richtel, Darlin) reports, "California prosecutors looking into the Hewlett-Packard spying case are focusing in part on a small private investigation firm in suburban Boston, operating out of a yellow house with black shutters in a quiet neighborhood." The Times continues, "How such a tiny firm ended up handling work for H.P., one of the largest technology companies in the world, as it tried to find out who had leaked company secrets is not clear. But other private investigators said on Wednesday that the situation was not surprising, because corporations in need of such services often end up relying on a chain of subcontractors." The Times adds, "Prosecutors will have to follow that chain as they pursue those responsible for gaining access to the phone records of journalists and company board members. … It is common practice for a company's head of security, its general counsel or its outside law firm to hire a security consulting firm, which often hires smaller firms, like the one prosecutors say was involved in this case, Security Outsourcing Solutions in Needham, Mass. … Those firms then hire freelance investigators to do work like surveillance or the acquisition of phone records. … The small firms provide skills that larger firms may not have, but they also offer another benefit. Using middlemen can insulate the company that has ordered the investigation from any shadowy activities, private investigators said."

The Washington Post (9/14, D03, Nakashima) reports, "According to the Web site for Security Outsourcing Solutions, it provides support services to in-house security departments and evaluates and addresses corporate security risks. … It caters to small- and medium-size companies and those that do not have full-time security departments. The Web site says the company has a 'global network of over 40 affiliated professional investigative firms.' … The firm, founded in 1998, has 10 employees and reports annual sales of $990,000, according to Dun & Bradstreet Inc."

HP Hires Morgan Lewis For Help In Probe. The California Recorder (9/14, Scheck) reports, "It only looks like Larry Sonsini is doing all of Hewlett-Packard's legal work. …

In fact, the troubled tech company has hired Morgan, Lewis & Bockius as it tries to fend off various criminal investigations into whether its board of directors broke the law by having an investigator lie to gain access to board member phone records." The Recorder continues, "On Monday, Morgan Lewis lawyers sat down with San Francisco federal prosecutors in hopes of forestalling federal criminal charges. … The Monday meeting involved a 'proffer' -- a normal step these days in white-collar investigations, in which a company under scrutiny offers up information to the government with certain conditions, as a means of showing good-faith cooperation with investigators. … John Hemann, a Morgan Lewis partner who was at the meeting -- and who was until last year a white-collar prosecutor with the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office -- didn't want to talk about HP on Tuesday. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Krotoski, the chief of the office's criminal division, is the lead prosecutor handling the investigation. He referred questions to a spokesman, Luke Macaulay, who confirmed the investigation but would not discuss its details." The Recorder notes, "The focus of the federal query remains unclear, but the fast-multiplying probes into the matter have Silicon Valley lawyers abuzz with the possibility that attorneys, either at HP or at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, could be ensnared."

Silicon Valley's Image Tarnished By Probes. The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Johnson) reports, "Silicon Valley has long been the stuff of dreams, a place where gawky entrepreneurs create billion-dollar companies in their garages, their innovations sometimes bending the rules but forever changing the way we listen to music or chat with friends. … But lately, it seems, the valley has shifted from a shiny beacon of capitalism's promise into a shadowy target for investigators." The Post continues, "Last week Securities and Exchange Commission officials told Congress that they were investigating 100 companies for possibly rigging their compensation systems to guarantee lucrative payments to executives and favored employees. That figure includes many technology firms whose volatile stock prices sweetened the incentive to engage in improprieties. … Even Hewlett-Packard Co., the standard bearer for ethics among Silicon Valley's home-grown technology community, is hustling to move forward after the resignation Monday of its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, amid investigations by prosecutors and federal lawmakers over whether directors' phone records were illegally accessed. Prompted by concerns that a board member leaked information to the press, the HP debacle is shedding light on the valley's insular culture, where secrets are prized and key players have multiple and sometimes conflicting obligations." The Post adds, "No industry has been immune to executive greed or governance lapses in recent years. The era's most disastrous collapses, of Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., occurred far from Silicon Valley. But the same mind-set that inspired so many technology entrepreneurs probably contributed to a breakdown in sound business practices, regulators said."

WSJournal Criticizes Lockyer's Comments On HP. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M) says that while HP's "leaker chase" was "was one of the dumber corporate decisions of recent times," it "hardly justifies California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's decision to go on national TV and publicly allege that crimes were committed before any charges have been filed. … Even assuming crimes were committed, it is irresponsible for any prosecutor to make such bald criminal assertions in public before he makes them in court." The Journal adds, "Even rich corporate defendants deserve due process, however, and someone at the California bar should call Mr. Lockyer on his prosecutorial misconduct."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/14), Michael S. Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, and author of 'Bill and Dave: How Hewlett and Packard Built the World's Greatest Company,' to be published in Spring 2007, writes, "When the story broke about the crisis in the boardroom at Hewlett-Packard last week, the almost universal reaction here in Silicon Valley was: What would Bill and Dave have done?" Malone continues, "The spirit of Bill Hewlett and Dave Packard still haunts high tech, especially the Valley. A quarter-century after the two men stepped down from the day-to-day management of the company they founded, their business philosophy still stands as the ultimate example of enlightened management -- and as a perpetual rebuke to executives who fall short of their lofty standards. … Nowhere is this more true than at Hewlett-Packard itself. It's one thing to run some semiconductor company on paranoia, or an enterprise software firm on fear. You can always rationalize your abusive management as necessary to succeed in a uniquely competitive market. But violate the precepts of the HP Way -- management by objective, pushing decision-making down through the organization, deep trust in your employees -- at HP and you have to convince the world that your results will outperform what was perhaps the most successful corporate stewardship in U.S. business history." Malone argues that Hewlett and Packard "always operated on trust and openness, but also with a strong hand. They would never have allowed the board to sink into civil war. We can also assume that they would have skipped the skullduggery and presented the leak problem to the assembled board at the beginning, and requested a full buy-in on any investigation. That alone would likely have plugged the leak. Given that HP under their leadership was never allowed to speak ill of a competitor to the media, we can also guess that Bill and Dave never, ever would have approved any investigation against reporters. And as men who had grown a company from a garage to a billion-dollar multinational corporation, they were wise enough to know that you can't buy the cloak without getting the dagger. … Finally, Hewlett and Packard firmly believed that you don't fire loyal employees for being beyond their competence; rather, you move them to where they can make the best contribution. In demoting Ms. Dunn, but still keeping her on the board, Mr. Hurd did the right thing. He did what Bill and Dave would have done. … Look next for deep and sincere apologies to everyone involved. That's the HP Way. Mark Hurd is learning fast."

DOJ To Review Corporate Cooperation Guidelines. The National Law Journal (9/14, Coyle) reports, "During a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Tuesday, a top U.S. Department of Justice official acknowledged that the so-called Thompson Memo on the attorney-client privilege in corporate investigations has ignited complaints across the legal and business landscapes, but he vigorously defended the current policy as a sound one. … 'I've got the [Senate Judiciary] chairman and ranking chairman upset; former department attorneys general and other officials complaining. Everyone is complaining,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. 'But I believe the perception of how this works is different from the reality. … I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice that is being described by groups.'" The Journal continues, "Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and ranking minority leader Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both former prosecutors, questioned McNulty and a panel of critics of the Thompson Memo on how that memorandum -- the department's internal policy guideline on charging corporations -- affects the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in corporate investigations. … The Thompson Memo tells a prosecutor to consider nine factors in determining whether to charge a corporation for criminal wrongdoing. One of those factors is whether the corporation has cooperated in the investigation. In assessing cooperation, the memo says, one consideration is whether the corporation waived attorney-client and work-product protections. … A coalition of business and legal organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Bar Association, Association of Corporate Counsel and National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, contends that the memo has created a 'culture of waiver' in which federal prosecutors now routinely demand waiver of attorney-client and work-product protections even where there are less intrusive means of getting information. … 'It's just one part of one factor,' insisted McNulty. 'It's not an investigative issue; it's a charging issue. If [the corporation] has cooperated, which they almost always do, that's when the issue -- do you have an internal investigation report? -- comes up. The text of the memo itself says this is one factor to be considered. We're giving [prosecutors] the option to consider it.' … But Specter countered, 'As I read this policy, I think it is coercive and may even rise to the level of being a bludgeon. I would ask you to reconsider the policy.'"

Former SEC Head Breedon To Run Adelphia Victims Compensation Fund. The AP distributes an article from Dow Jones Newswires (9/14, Bray) that reports, "Former Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Richard C. Breeden will administer the compensation process for victims of a massive accounting scandal at Adelphia Communications Corp., prosecutors said Wednesday." Dow Jones continues, "The U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan said Breeden, chairman of Richard C. Breeden & Co., has been retained to serve as a special master overseeing the compensation process. … Last year, Adelphia agreed to pay $715 million in cash and stock to settle Justice Department and SEC charges stemming from an accounting scandal that plunged it into bankruptcy. Prosecutors have called it one of the most extensive financial frauds on record." Dow Jones adds, "In 2004, Adelphia founder John Rigas and his son Timothy Rigas, the company's one-time chief financial officer, were convicted of pocketing more than $2 billion from Adelphia for their own personal use and misleading investors about the company's finances and performance. … Last year, John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison, while Timothy Rigas was sentenced to 20 years. Both men, who remain free on bail, have appealed their sentences. … In March, Michael Rigas, another son and former Adelphia executive, was sentenced to 10 months of home confinement after admitting last November that he filed a Form 13D with the SEC that falsely stated he had conducted an inquiry into the source of funds used for a purchase of Adelphia shares in late 1999. The certification was kept in Adelphia's records."

Gonzales Awards Exceptional Service Award To Enron Task Force. Law Week Colorado (9/13) reports, "More than 230 Justice Department employees – along with 42 other individuals, many of whom are federal employees and law enforcement officers – were honored today at the Department's 54th Annual Awards Ceremony at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty joined the Attorney General in presenting the Department's highest award, the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, to the outstanding members of the investigative and trial team of the Enron Task Force, who were recognized for their exceptional service to the American public and the Department in the investigation and successful prosecution of the individuals who were most responsible for the Enron fraud."

OFHEO Likely To Sue Former Fannie Mae Officials. The AP (9/14) reports, "The two executives who led Fannie Mae to an $11 billion accounting scandal can expect federal regulators to file lawsuits against them, the head of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said Wednesday. … 'We will more than likely be filing litigation against them,' OFHEO director James Lockhart said during a speech at the American Enterprise Institute." The AP continues, "When later asked by reporters if legal action was likely against Fannie Mae's former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and the mortgage finance giant's former chairman and chief executive Franklin Raines -- who was White House budget director under President Clinton -- Lockhart did not name names but did say 'they are the top two.'" The AP adds, "Last month Fannie Mae announced -- and the Justice Department confirmed -- that the criminal investigation against it had ended after two years. Fannie Mae, whose accounting scandal came to light in September 2004, has been ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission to restate its earnings back to 2001 -- a correction expected to reach around $11 billion. … Fannie Mae reached a civil settlement in May with the SEC and the OFHEO, agreeing to pay a record $400 million fine after OFHEO found serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation by the company. … Earlier this week, Freddie Mac -- Fannie Mae's smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market -- said it would not face criminal charges in connection with its own multibillion-dollar accounting scandal. … The Justice Department began investigating the accounting of Freddie Mac, which is the second-largest financer of home loans in the country, after it disclosed in June 2003 that it had misstated earnings by some $5 billion -- mostly underreported -- for 2000-2002."

The Washington Post (9/14, D01, O'Hara) reports, "Lockhart's agency has power to lodge only civil or administrative complaints. The Securities and Exchange Commission is also weighing civil action against former Fannie Mae executives. The Justice Department last month said it had closed its criminal investigation of the company's accounting scandal, though it is looking at whether Raines and Howard committed perjury in congressional testimony about Fannie's accounting practices." The Post adds, "One lawyer with knowledge of the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to publicly speculate on OFHEO's intentions, said the agency could file a lawsuit before the end of the year. One thing OFHEO may be waiting on: the completion of a mandatory investigation by Fannie's independent directors to determine whether the company itself should sue Raines, Howard or others. The results of that investigation are due at the end of next month. … Such strong statements from Lockhart are not new. In May, after his agency and the announced the $400 million fine against Fannie Mae, Lockhart took aim at the $52.8 million in bonuses Raines received during the six years the company used improper accounting. … In addition, since neither Raines nor Howard were technically fired by the company when the accounting improprieties came to light in 2004, both men took home millions of dollars in severance payments, and Raines received retirement pay of $114,000 a month for the rest of his life."

Grasso Seeks Judge's Recusal In Compensation Case. The New York Law Journal (9/14, Bar) reports, "The battle over former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's multi-million dollar compensation package continues to heat up." The Journal continues, "Grasso's attorneys have filed a motion asking Justice Charles Edward Ramos, the presiding judge in the case, to reassign the matter to a different judge. … 'Throughout this lengthy case, the Court has steadfastly expressed its desire that this significant case be handled in a way that engenders public confidence in the justice system,' attorneys for Grasso said in papers filed with the court last week. 'At this time, reassignment of the case would best serve that important goal.'" The Journal adds, "Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has challenged Grasso's total compensation under New York's not-for-profit laws. … Gerson A. Zweifach of Williams & Connolly who represents Grasso, laid out three grounds for recusal in the motion. The first stems from ex parte settlement talks with Ramos, which Grasso entered into based on the court's "advance agreement not to serve as trial judge should Mr. Grasso object." … After the judge decided to conduct a bench trial to address the separate issue of whether Grasso's compensation of more than $139 million was reasonable, Grasso sent a letter to Ramos expressing concerns over his continued involvement with the case. … 'Having obtained Mr. Grasso's and his counsel's consent to participate in an ex parte conference based on this commitment, it would be improper, to say the least, for the Court now to try the case over Mr. Grasso's objection.' … The second grounds for recusal, Zweifach said, were that Ramos, during the course of the settlement discussions, expressed views on 'factual and legal issues that lie at the heart of any upcoming trial.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Touts Work Of Katrina Fraud Task Force. The AP (9/14, Foster) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales credited a task force he established a year ago with deterring fraud in the Hurricane Katrina relief effort, citing as evidence money returned to the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency." The AP continues, "Gonzales addressed members of the Hurricane Katrina Task Force Wednesday, the first anniversary of its creation, during an appearance in New Orleans, where the hurricane flooded 80 percent of the city on Aug. 29, 2005. … 'People need to know that they will not get away with these crimes,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "The report released at the meeting said that by Oct. 17, 2005, the task force had charged 36 people in 17 cases with hurricane-related fraud. By Sept. 6, 2006, Gonzales said that number had grown to more than 400 people charged in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation. … Most task force prosecutions in the past year involved fraud in obtaining individual assistance benefits from FEMA and the Red Cross, the report said. … Between them, the agencies had more than $18.2 million returned by recipients individual aid, the report said, calling it a 'sign that our prosecutions are deterring fraud.'"

WGNO, ABC 26, New Orleans (9/14, Murphy) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales spent Wednesday in New Orleans getting a one-year report from his National Katrina Fraud Task force. … He predicts fraud cases will rise as more and more federal recovery dollars reach the Gulf Region. … 'Billions of dollars are headed to the Gulf Coast region for the rebuilding effort,' said Gonzales. 'We know that fraud, sadly follows dollars.'" WGNO continues, "Gonzales a group of prosecutors and law enforcers meeting at the Downtown Sheraton, so far his Katrina Fraud Task force is responsible for 400 arrests nationwide, half of them in Louisiana and Mississippi. … 'It is disturbing to see not only the volume of fraud, but the lengths to which people will go to take advantage of others sufferings,' said Gonzales."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/14, Finch) reports, "Despite the task force's success in making Katrina-related fraud cases for everything from public corruption to identity theft, it faces an enormous job ahead: keeping tabs on the billions of dollars of government money now in the pipeline to help rebuild the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast region. 'When the criminals find an easy route for money, they tend to return for more, giving law enforcement an opportunity to stop it,' Gonzales said. He devoted his first remarks at the podium to New Orleans' struggle to recover from the hurricane at the same time it is contending with a rising tide of crime. 'This great city cannot return to its former glory if it's being held hostage by criminals,' he said, adding that the federal government is doing all it can to help the city's struggling criminal justice system."

CNN.com (9/14, Frieden) reports, "More than 400 people -- including government and charity workers -- have been charged so far with illegally benefiting from Hurricane Katrina and the ensuing flooding, according to a Justice Department report released Wednesday. … However, the Katrina Fraud Task Force hasn't even begun to skim the waters, and the number could climb into the thousands, the report stated on the first anniversary of the task force. … 'Disaster relief agencies have reported to law enforcement that they have identified thousands of questionable or possibly fraudulent payments to purported hurricane victims,' the report said." CNN adds, "To date, the multi-agency command center in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, has received more than 6,800 complaints or tips for investigators to pursue. … The prosecutions of negligible fraud schemes has had a deterrent effect, as ineligible recipients of aid have voluntarily returned $18.2 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the American Red Cross, the report says. … Most of the cases have involved people trying to obtain assistance from FEMA or the Red Cross, though cases of identity theft, procurement fraud and public corruption are emerging, the report states."

Judge Drops Two Counts Against Gotti, While Defense Questions FBI Transcript. The New York Times (9/14, Williams, 1.21M) reports, "A federal district court judge dropped two counts against John A. Gotti yesterday involving two of his businesses that prosecutors claimed had been set up and operated with illicit funds. The charges had been added by the government for Mr. Gotti's third racketeering trial, but Judge Shira A. Scheindlin said prosecutors had not offered sufficient proof to support the charges." The Times adds, "Also yesterday, in what could prove to be a critical development, Mr. Gotti's lawyers questioned whether Mr. Gotti could be heard saying on a secretly recorded F.B.I. tape that he was angry about being demoted from the top echelon of the Gambino crime family to a captain. … While the words on the tape are difficult to make out, the F.B.I. transcription of the recording reads: 'I'm a captain? What happened? And when I get out, I want to see this kid. He can send me all the love letters he wants, I don't have to answer to him.' But Steven Dobies, who prosecutors say is an associate of the Gambino crime family, testified that he was present during the conversation and never heard the word 'captain' used."

Newsday (9/14, DeStefano) notes, "Despite the dismissal…Gotti still faces serious racketeering conspiracy and related charges, including allegations he was involved in extortion, loan-sharking and the 1992 beating of…Curtis Sliwa." Newsday adds, "Under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Dobies insisted that he never passed messages of a criminal nature for Gotti. Dobies also said that Gotti stated a number of times in 2002 and 2003 that he wanted nothing to do with his former mob associates, wanted out of the mob life and wanted to get away from New York. Questioned about Gotti's anger that his uncle Peter and others had allegedly stolen his father's money, Dobies said that Gotti believed it was money that was due his mother and sisters." The New York Post (9/14, Cornell, 608K) also reports on the ruling under the headline "Judge Whacks Two Charges Against Gotti." The AP (9/14, Neumeister) also reports this story.

Final New York Gambino Crackdown Defendant Pleads Guilty. White Plains Journal News (9/13, O'Connor) reported, "The last defendant in the massive roundup of the reputed leaders of the Gambino crime family has joined the ranks of his convicted compatriots." Louis "Little Louie" Natrella pleaded guilty on Tuesday "to conspiring to defraud the United States, conspiring to operate an illegal numbers business, illegal gambling and operating an illegal numbers business. … 'We are very pleased with the efforts of the investigative team,' said David Velazquez, the senior supervisory resident agent in charge of the FBI's White Plains office, 'and the resulting clean sweep of 32 convictions for 32 defendants.'" The Journal News noted, "Natrella was accused of operating a thriving Gambino numbers operation in the Bronx that was handed down to him by longtime Gambino associate Leonard Minuto Sr. from Dobbs Ferry."

Heron Says Mafia "Wounded But Not Dead." U.S. News and World Report (9/12, 2.03M) reported on its Web site, "'Anybody who thinks that the Mafia is breathing its last breath is just wrong,' says Matt Heron. Heron oughta know--he's just finished running the FBI's Organized Crime Section in New York and is moving down to FBI headquarters in Washington this month to oversee its anti-mob operations nationwide." The many successful prosecutions "make it tempting to ignore the mob in this age of terrorism. But the cases also suggest just how active the Mafia remains. 'We've hit them very hard, but they keep adapting and regenerating,' says Tom Metz, acting chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Section. There's also a new generation of smarter, more educated mobsters. … Call it the New Mafia -- their members tend to avoid thuggish acts like extortion and murder in favor of white-collar crimes, like Internet and stock market frauds." US News adds, "There's too much money to be made. 'It's an organization that's wounded but not dead,' says Heron, who's worked Mafia cases for 20 years. 'It will never be dead.'"

Las Vegas Bribery Case Bagman Agrees To Plead Guilty. The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/14, Thornton, 337K) reports, "Lance Malone, a strip club mogul's bagman who was convicted in a San Diego corruption scandal last year, has agreed to plead guilty in the parallel Las Vegas case on the eve of his trial. Malone pleaded guilty in exchange for a sentence of about 50 months in prison that would run concurrently with a sentence in the San Diego case, said a source close to the defense." The Union-Tribune notes, "Malone is accused of bribing Las Vegas politicians with cash, lap dances and ski-school tuition in exchange for votes that would benefit strip clubs owned by his boss, Michael Galardi. If a judge approves the agreement, it would avert the trial in Las Vegas, which is set to begin Monday." The Las Vegas Review-Journal (9/14, Packer) also reports on the plea agreement.

FBI Investigating Kansas City Councilwoman. The Kansas City Star (9/13, 278K) reported, "An attorney representing Saundra McFadden-Weaver acknowledged Tuesday that there was an ongoing FBI investigation involving the Kansas City councilwoman. Attorney Ron Partee confirmed the FBI investigation the same day the city's ethics commission launched its own investigation into her involvement in $400,000 in mortgages for a Lee's Summit home." The Star notes, "McFadden-Weaver asked for the ethics investigation after The Kansas City Star reported in August that she obtained the loans, apparently with no money down. Loan documents stated she would occupy the home outside the 3rd District, which she represents."

FBI, New Jersey Police Arrest 22 Alleged High-Level Crips Members. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/14, Schuppe) reports, "Nearly two-dozen reputed members of the Crips gang have been arrested on federal gun and drug charges in what U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie promised would be the start of a lengthy multi-agency campaign against street gangs and other violent criminals in Essex County. … The 22 reputed Crips members -- including the leader of a chapter called 98 Main Street Mafia and ranking members of three other factions -- were arrested by FBI agents and local police in roundups that started Tuesday and continued yesterday morning in East Orange, Irvington and Newark." FBI Newark SAC Leslie G. Wiser said, "This is an important step in our goal to cripple the Crips." The Star-Ledger notes, "The arrests marked a first significant step in a joint effort by federal and local authorities to reduce gun violence in Essex County by focusing on gangs and guns." Essex County Sheriff Armando Fontoura said, "There's a frustration here of revolving door justice…but when you come into the U.S. Attorney's Office with the FBI, there's plenty of room for you, and there will be no revolving door, and you will no longer be preying on the people of Essex County."

The AP (9/14) reports FBI Newark spokesman Steven Siegel said, "These are upper-echelon guys, not just street dealers." Siegel added that "the arrests were unrelated to raids carried out in Britain and New Jersey Wednesday morning that broke up an arms trafficking operation supplying guns to criminals in London. More than 100 federal and local agents, including an FBI SWAT team, participated in the early morning street gang arrests."

Missouri Crips Leader Convicted Of Murder, Drug Trafficking. KMBC-TV Kansas City, MO (9/8) reported, "A federal jury convicted the former leader of the 51st Street Crips gang…of three homicides, drug trafficking and firearms violations. Steve L. 'Moody' Wright, 23, of Kansas City, was found guilty on 15 counts contained in a 2004 federal indictment. Federal authorities said that Wright and other members of the street gang were repeatedly involved in illegal drug trafficking and had guns that they used to protect their drug supplies and drug profits. 'Wright's modus operandi was to rob other drug dealers, often shooting to kill, steal their supply of drugs, then sell them for profit,' U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said a news release." The Kansas City Star (9/9, Rizzo, 278K) also reported on Wright's conviction.

British Library Urges US Judge To Give Map Dealer Longer Sentence. The New York Times (9/14, Cowan, 1.21M) reports rare map dealer Edward Forbes Smiley III pleaded guilty in June "to having stolen 97 rare maps from some of the world's leading universities and libraries, a staggering haul estimated at about $3 million." Among the "items taken was the centuries-old map by Peter Apian that was ripped from a book Mr. Smiley found at the British national library. Because of that $100,000 map, and three more missing maps that the British Library believes Mr. Smiley may have snatched, the library is arguing that he deserves more than the 57 to 71 months in prison that prosecutors and Mr. Smiley's lawyers backed at the time of the guilty plea. In a legal brief dated Wednesday, the library's lawyer, Robert E. Goldman, urged Judge Janet Bond Arterton of Federal District Court to impose a harsher sentence — of at least 78 to 97 months — when she revisits the case on Sept. 27."

The AP (9/14) adds, "Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted. 'Smiley's actions ripped at the heart of our public institutions which stored, protected and made available to the public over centuries maps which provided a bridge between past and future generations,' the library wrote. One of the stolen maps had survived civil war, royal intrigue, economic depression and the Nazi bombing of London. 'They had been cared for and preserved for centuries until Smiley ripped them from their volumes and slid them into his coat,' the library wrote."

Moroccan Court Sentences Zotob Defendants To Prison. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, B3, Bryan-Low, 2.03M) reports, "Authorities in Morocco sentenced two individuals for their role in unleashing an Internet worm dubbed Zotob that infected computer networks at hundreds of companies last year." The court "on Tuesday sentenced Farid Essebar, a 19-year-old student and a Moroccan national born in Russia, to two years in prison. Another student, Achraf Bahloul, 21, received a one-year prison sentence." The Journal notes, "The case, which U.S. and Moroccan authorities say they believe is connected to a credit-card theft group in Turkey, illustrates how geographically dispersed cybercriminals have become." The AP (9/14) also reports on the sentencings.

California DNA Program Hobbled By Funding Shortfall. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Weinstein) reports, "Two years after California set out to create a vast DNA database to help unravel tens of thousands unsolved crimes, the program is being severely hampered by a lack of resources, officials across the state say." The Times continues, "The state crime lab has a backlog of more than a quarter-million DNA samples it is unable to process because of a funding shortfall and a lack of manpower, directors acknowledge. At its current rate of progress, the lab would have to spend 2 1/2 years to clear the backlog -- if it received no more samples, which is hardly likely, since it is currently taking in about 20,000 samples a month, officials said." The Times adds, "State officials, Los Angeles police officers and the director of the Santa Monica Rape Treatment Center say the backlog means that crimes are going unsolved and that criminals who could be nabbed may still be walking the streets. … The problems stem from overly optimistic funding projections when California voters in November 2004 resoundingly passed Proposition 69, designed to make the state the nation's leader in the use of DNA technology as a crime-solving tool. … Prop. 69 requires all convicted felons, certain misdemeanor offenders and those arrested for rape or murder to give up DNA samples. Prison officials swab offenders' mouths with an object called a buccal which looks like a tongue depressor. The samples are subjected to genetic testing, and the results are uploaded into the FBI laboratory's Combined DNA Index System, known as CODIS. The database can be run against evidence from crime scenes for DNA matches that will help identify new suspects."

Virginia Officials Mistakenly Free Murder Suspect. The Washington Post (9/14, B1, Vargas) reports, "Prince William County officials accidentally released a man charged with murder and didn't notice the mistake until five days later, authorities said yesterday." The Post continues, "Authorities said that they have no idea where Christopher T. Broady is and that he is dangerous. … 'He is on trial for murder so that should give you an indication of the seriousness of this, of how hard we are trying to get him back,' Manassas Detective Christine Perry said. 'This is a priority. . . . It is number one.'" The Post adds, "Broady, 19, is charged with shooting a D.C. man in the head in an apparent drug dispute. He walked out of jail Friday, and the mistake was not noticed until Tuesday. … 'He could be anywhere. He could be in Arizona, Mexico, South America,' Prince William Commonwealth's Attorney Paul B. Ebert (D) said. … Jail officials and prosecutors said Broady was released in a period of confusion after murder charges against him had been dropped in Prince William Circuit Court but were pending in General District Court. … Broady is charged with killing Bernard S. Matthews, 22, on Feb. 1. Matthews was shot and left lying near Bruckner Road in the Georgetown South community of Prince William. The slaying made headlines because another man robbed Matthews before police could take him to the hospital. He died the next day. … A week later, authorities found Broady in Danville and charged him with murder in Matthews's slaying and possession of a firearm in the commission of a felony. He told his girlfriend's father that the shooting was over drugs, according to court testimony by the father, James Holmes."

Fourth Animal Rights Activist Sentenced To Prison For Threat Campaign. The AP (9/14) reports, "A fourth animal rights activist who helped incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals was sentenced Wednesday to prison. Joshua Harper, a West Coast coordinator for Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, was sentenced to three years in prison and was ordered to help pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people he helped terrorize. … Two other members of the group still await sentencing: Andrew Stepanian, SHAC's New York coordinator, and Darius Fullmer, an organizer who researched the group's targets. They were scheduled to be sentenced Tuesday." The AP notes, "The defendants, all in their late 20s or early 30s, were not accused of directly making threats or carrying out vandalism." The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) and Philadelphia Inquirer (9/14, 399K) each ran truncated versions of the AP story.

Reid's Call For Polygamy Task Force Sparks Dispute. The Salt Lake Tribune (9/14, Burr) reports, "At least one Utah congressman says the federal government should be more involved in prosecuting polygamy crimes, while others say the matter is largely a concern of state and local law enforcement. … 'Crimes against children cannot be tolerated,' Rep. Jim Matheson said in a statement Wednesday. 'I would support additional federal assistance to help prosecute these crimes.'" The Tribune continues, "The state's lone Democrat in Congress was responding to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's call a day earlier for a federal task force to investigate polygamist activity in the West. … The Justice Department said Wednesday it is reviewing a letter from Reid to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to appoint a team to probe, and prosecute, if necessary, accusations of 'systemic child abuse' in 'this modern day polygamy movement.' … 'For too long, this outrageous activity has been masked in the guise of religious freedom,' wrote Nevada's Reid, who is LDS. 'But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated. Individuals who force minors into adult relationships and marriage must be brought to justice.'"

The Deseret Morning News (9/14, Winslow) reports, "Polygamous groups are upset over a Nevada senator's call for a Justice Department probe into their lives and activities. … 'It is disconcerting to have a senator take a real strong position on that,' said one Utah polygamist, who asked the Deseret Morning News not to use his name. He said all of his wives are consenting adults. 'It appears to be a reaction to (Warren) Jeffs and the FLDS culture.'" The News continues, "Members of the polygamous community of Centennial Park, Ariz., called Reid's request a 'modern-day witch hunt.' … 'Polygamy is not a federal offense but is to be regulated under the prerogative of state's rights,' said Joyce Steed of the Centennial Park Action Committee. 'Therefore, one could question what his justification is for asking the federal government to target their efforts on an unpopular minority. We can be sure polygamy does not represent a personal moral issue for the senator, coming out of the state that has legalized prostitution.'" The News notes, "The FBI has been investigating Jeffs and had put him on its Ten Most Wanted list. Jeffs was arrested last month during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas. He is currently being held in Hurricane's Purgatory Jail without bail pending a Sept. 27 court appearance. … The U.S. Attorney's Office has filed an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against him, but would not say if it was conducting its own investigations."

Court To Consider Reinstating Conspiracy Charge Against DeLay. Texas' highest criminal appeals court has agreed to consider reinstating a conspiracy charge against former Rep. Tom DeLay. According to the AP (9/14, Castro), the court's move "could delay his trial until next year." A state district judge "threw out one of two conspiracy charges in December and let the money laundering charge stand. Prosecutors asked the appeals court to reinstate the dropped conspiracy charge, a move that has postponed trial proceedings on the other charges."

New York Brothers Arrested In Medicaid Billing Conspiracy. The New York Times (9/14, Pérez-Peña) reports, "Two brothers, a doctor in Brooklyn and an owner of pharmacies in Brooklyn and Queens, led a conspiracy that defrauded Medicaid of millions of dollars by billing the program for H.I.V. drugs and other medicines that were never given to patients, federal prosecutors say." The United States attorney's office "announced the arrest yesterday of the brothers, Dr. Muhammad Ejaz Ahmad and Muhammad Nawaz Ahmad, and a third man, Mohammad Tanveer, a pharmacy employee, on charges of conspiracy to defraud the government, punishable by up to five years in prison. The complaint against them points to a larger conspiracy, involving 'others known and unknown.'" The United States Attorney's Office "would not put an overall dollar amount on the cost of the fraud against Medicaid, the joint federal and state health plan for the poor. But the complaint states that for just three antiviral drugs — among many medicines used to treat H.I.V. infection and its side effects — the three pharmacies billed Medicaid for $2.5 million for drugs that they never received from their distributors."

CIVIL LAW:

Plame Sues Armitage Over Leak. The AP (9/14, Apuzzo) reports, "One-time covert CIA officer Valerie Plame sued the former No. 2 official at the State Department on Wednesday for violating her privacy rights." The AP continues, "The suit does not accuse Richard Armitage, who was deputy secretary of state in the Bush administration, of participating in an administration conspiracy to blow her cover. … Plame added Armitage's name to a civil suit in U.S. District Court against Vice President Dick Cheney, his former chief of staff I. Lewis Libby and White House adviser Karl Rove." The AP adds, "Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, say the White House leaked Plame's identity as retribution for Wilson's criticisms of prewar intelligence on Iraq. … Armitage admitted last week that he told two reporters in 2003 that Plame worked for the CIA, but he said the disclosure was inadvertent. Armitage said he knew of no plan to leak Plame's identity; some people said the admission disproved the conspiracy theory. … By adding Armitage's name to the suit, Plame's lawyers set up a different scenario. They contend a White House conspiracy existed, but that Armitage's leak was independent of it."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/13, Blitzer) reported, "Outed CIA operative Valerie Plame and her husband Joe Wilson, have added another name to the civil suit. Lawyers representing the Wilsons say they'll now sue…Armitage." The Wilsons' lawsuit "already includes Vice President Dick Cheney, his former chief of staff Louis Scooter Libby and presidential adviser Karl Rove." The Wilsons "say the White House leaked Plame's name after former Ambassador Wilson criticized the pre-war intelligence on Iraq. Even though he's been added to the suit, lawyers say Armitage was not involved in the alleged White House conspiracy."

Novak Says Armitage Distorted His Role In Plame Leak. The Washington Post (9/14, A12, Smith, 748K) reports, "Columnist Robert D. Novak, who first revealed Valerie Plame's employment by the CIA and touched off a lengthy federal leak investigation, is accusing his primary source of misrepresenting their conversation to make the source's role in the disclosure seem more casual than it was." In "an unusual column that appears today," Novak "says his initial source, former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage, was more sure of Plame's ties to the CIA than the source has indicated." Novak "adds that Armitage linked her directly to her husband's CIA-sponsored trip to Niger and suggested the disclosure would be a good item for Novak's column." This "differs from Armitage's assertions last week that his disclosure was made in an offhand manner and that he did not know why Plame's husband was sent to Niger." Armitage, "in an interview yesterday, said he stood by his account and disputed Novak's."

In his column (9/14, A21), Novak writes, "First, Armitage did not, as he now indicates, merely pass on something he had heard and that he 'thought' might be so. Rather, he identified to me the CIA division where Mrs. Wilson worked and said flatly that she recommended the mission to Niger by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. Second, Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column." Novak adds, "An accurate depiction of what Armitage actually said deepens the irony of his being my source. He was a foremost internal skeptic of the administration's war policy, and I had long opposed military intervention in Iraq. Zealous foes of George W. Bush transformed me, improbably, into the president's lapdog." But "they cannot fit Armitage into the left-wing fantasy of a well-crafted White House conspiracy to destroy Joe and Valerie Wilson. The news that he, and not Karl Rove, was the leaker was devastating for the left." Novak also writes that Armitage's "silence for…2 1/2 years caused intense pain for his colleagues in government and enabled partisan Democrats in Congress to falsely accuse [Karl] Rove of being my primary source. When Armitage now says he was mute because of special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's request, that does not explain his silent three months between his claimed first realization that he was the source and Fitzgerald's appointment on Dec. 30, 2003. Armitage's tardy self-disclosure is tainted because it is deceptive."

Widow Of Anthrax Victim Sues US. The Palm Beach Post (FL) (9/14, Kleinberg) reports, "Maureen Stevens says the federal government probably knows who killed her husband. … She believes they're not telling because that might reveal things the government doesn't want revealed." The Post continues, "Nearly five years after Bob Stevens' death, the first in the anthrax attacks that terrified a nation, 'I want to know what happened,' his widow, who's sued the government, said Wednesday from her lawyer's office. [I want to go into court and find out what happened. What information's obviously there. The truth is there.'" The Post adds, "Bob Stevens of Lantana, a photo editor for Boca Raton-based tabloid The Sun, died in October 2001, after he apparently opened mail laced with the deadly substance. … The government said in February of 2002 that it had a "short list" of 18 to 20 people who had the knowledge, equipment, access, and motive to obtain and 'weaponize' anthrax. Richard Schuler, Stevens' attorney, said Wednesday it might be fewer than a dozen. … Stevens filed suit in December 2003, alleging security lapses at the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases in Fort Detrick, Md., led to her husband's death. A federal judge refused to dismiss the case and it has been in front of a federal appeals court for nearly a year. The government has argued proceeding with the suit would jeopardize the ongoing search for the killer. … In Washington, Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said he could not comment because the suit is still active."

Judge Questions Smokers' Data In Tobacco Class-Action Hearing. The New York Law Journal (9/14, Perrotta) reports, "A federal judge Wednesday expressed skepticism over a proposed class action lawsuit that would seek as much as $200 billion in damages against the tobacco industry for its allegedly deceptive marketing of light cigarettes." The Journal continues, "In a daylong hearing, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein wondered how the plaintiffs could define a viable class -- and accurately assess damages -- when the tens of millions of people who have smoked light cigarettes might have chosen to do so for any number of reasons." The Journal adds, "While the plaintiffs in part rely on a study that shows 90 percent of light-cigarette smokers were attracted by perceived health benefits that experts now claim do not exist, Weinstein said consumers could have relied on those perceived benefits to varying degrees, or even known that those health benefits were illusory. … 'How many people deep down knew they were getting something dangerous, but were willing to pay for the illusion it wasn't?' Weinstein said. … He added: 'You can't get away from the contention of the defendants that every smoker is somewhat different.' … Michael D. Hausfeld of Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington, D.C., a firm for the plaintiffs, said the tobacco industry's marketing had the goal of shifting its buyers to light cigarettes, beginning in 1971, because of growing health concerns about smoking. If they had not, he said, smokers would have 'quit in droves' -- a comment that was greeted with chuckles from the audience."

The New York Times (9/14, Warner, Moynihan) reports, "In the case, known as Schwab after the lead plaintiff, Barbara Schwab, lawyers asserted that cigarette makers had deceived smokers into thinking that light cigarettes, representing 45 percent of the market, were safer or less addicting." The Times adds, "Lawyers are seeking a national class action of tens of millions of smokers and are proposing that tobacco companies pay damages of $20 billion to $200 billion. The case was filed under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act, which entitles plaintiffs to triple damages. .. . Judge Weinstein is expected to decide within several weeks whether to grant class-action status." The Times notes, "The case, filed in 2004, is part of the latest legal assault against tobacco companies. After successfully warding off litigation by people claiming to have been injured by smoking, plaintiffs' lawyers have turned their attention to attacking cigarette companies for defrauding consumers by selling light cigarettes. … While many of these so-called light cases have been unsuccessful, the Schwab case follows an opinion last month by a federal judge in the District of Columbia, who found that cigarette companies engaged in decades of fraud and racketeering, including misleading smokers and concealing information about the health risks of light cigarettes."

DOJ Settles Grants Fraud Claims With Workforce Central Florida. The Orlando Business Journal (9/14) reports, "Workforce Central Florida and the Workforce Central Florida Foundation Inc. have paid nearly $3.5 million to settle claims by the U.S. Department of Justice that they defrauded the government by misusing federal grant funds to improve their privately owned offices and One-Stop Center in Lake Mary. … However, no individuals involved in the case have been either charged with a crime or dismissed from their job because it was considered an unintentional violation of federal rules concerning allowable charges, one described by Workforce officials as an 'accounting dispute.'" The Journal continues, "Still, it is believed to be the largest settlement ever levied against one of Florida's 24 nonprofit workforce agencies, which are locally chartered organizations designed to provide services such as job placement and training. The organizations are overseen by the state Agency for Workforce Innovation. … 'We analyzed every aspect of this transaction and voted at the end (in public session) to do it this way,' WCF board member and past Chairman Atlee Mercer says. 'Later, in hindsight, the government decided we should have done it differently. We don't agree. We thought we followed the letter of the law.'" The Journal adds, "The settlement has been paid by the foundation through a refinancing of the building that houses Workforce Central Florida, which handles One-Stop centers for Orange, Lake, Osceola, Seminole and Sumter counties. It will not have any impact on the services WCF currently offers, its officials emphasize."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Lawmakers Seek DOJ Probe Of Border Agents' Convictions. The San Bernardino (CA) Sun (9/14, Carter) reports, "Sentencing should be delayed for two Border Patrol agents facing 20 years apiece in prison for shooting a drug smuggler and violating his civil rights, 22 congressmen told the Department of Justice on Wednesday." The Sun continues, "In a letter, the congressmen asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to postpone sentencing and review the case against Border Patrol agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. … 'Due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding the prosecution of agents Ramos and Compean, the House Judiciary Committee has already recognized the need for a thorough review of this case by calling for congressional hearings and an investigation of the Department of Homeland Security, Office of the Inspector General, U.S. Customs and Border Patrol and the U.S. Attorney's Office,' the letter stated." The Sun adds, "In a separate letter to the Justice Department, Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas, echoed his colleagues' concerns. … 'If the facts I have laid out are accurate, then this prosecution puts the rights of illegal alien drug smugglers ahead of our homeland security and undermines the critical mission of better enforcing current immigration laws,' Gohmert wrote. … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department had received the letters and is planning a response to the request. She said any comment specifically about the agents' case had to come from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Texas that prosecuted the agents." The Sun notes, "Ramos and Compean are facing prison for their roles in the nonfatal shooting of Mexican national Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who ran away from the agents after entering the United States from Mexico with a van filled with nearly 800 pounds of marijuana. Ramos shot at the smuggler, who he believed pointed a gun at him during a foot chase along the Rio Grande. … The agents were convicted earlier this year by an El Paso jury. … Aldrete-Davila is suing the Border Patrol for $5 million for civil-rights violations. … U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton defended the successful prosecution of the agents by Assistant U.S. Attorney Deborah Kanof. … 'These agents shot an unarmed suspect as he was running away,' Sutton said in a news release Wednesday. 'If they honestly believed the shootings were justified, then they had no reason to lie about it and destroy the evidence.'"

DOJ_NMG_0062735

Cuban Exile Group To Demonstrate During Summit. The AP (9/14) reports, "Cuban exile protesters plan to hold a symbolic, pro-democracy demonstration on a boat in international waters off the communist nation this weekend during a Nonaligned Movement summit, an exile leader said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Ramon Saul Sanchez of the Miami-based exile group Democracy Movement said the 'maritime demonstration[is scheduled to take place Saturday. The weeklong summit began Monday. .. . Current plans call for about 20 demonstrators to leave a Key West marina onboard the 39-foot Democracia after midnight Friday and arrive in international waters off Cuba early Saturday, Sanchez said. … They are demanding free elections and the release of all political prisoners among other things, Sanchez said. The group also hopes to fly a blimp from the ship with the word 'Democracia' on it and mirrors that will reflect light and be seen on the island. … Sanchez said he met with representatives of the community relations board of the U.S. Justice Department Wednesday night to discuss plans for the demonstration. The department had no immediate comment."

New Voting Equipment Expected To Lead To More Snafus In November. USA Today (9/14, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "Eight weeks before elections that will decide control of Congress, a rush by state and local governments to prepare new voting machines and train poll workers is raising the possibility of trouble reminiscent of the 2000 presidential election standoff." The problems "range from delayed delivery of new equipment to an insufficient supply of trained technicians to fix anticipated problems, voting experts say." Glitches have "occurred in Arkansas, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and West Virginia. Maryland became the latest on Tuesday, when technical problems, human errors and staff shortages led officials to keep some polls open an extra hour." The midterms "shape up as the most technologically perilous since 2000, election officials say, because 30% of the nation's voting jurisdictions will be using new equipment. They include large parts of Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Virginia, scenes of key Senate races."

WPost Criticizes Maryland Elections. The Washington Post (9/14, A20, 748K) editorializes, "Clearly, there is something wrong with the way elections are run in Maryland, and there are plenty of people to share the blame. Let's start at the top with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who bears ultimate responsibility since it is largely his nominees on local boards who run elections county by county." The Post adds, "It is encouraging that a spokesman said Mr. Ehrlich, in a departure from the stance he took Tuesday, will work with both parties as well as the state board to ensure a better job is done in November. After all, with his name on the ballot, he too has a stake in the outcome."

California Judge Slashes Bias Judgment Against FedEx. The California Recorder (9/14, Hirsch) reports, "Calling an initial $61 million verdict 'excessive,' last week Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stephen Dombrink whittled down a jury award against national shipping company Federal Express and one of its managers to a modest $12.4 million." The Recorder continues, "In his written decision, Dombrink stated concern that the evidence failed to support the initial verdict in an employment discrimination case. … 'The harassment was mostly just offensive name-calling,' Dombrink noted in his Sept. 5 ruling." The Recorder adds, "In June, the jury handed the $61 million award to two Lebanese-American FedEx drivers who accused a manager of racial discrimination and harassment. The verdict was thought to be the largest single civil rights judgment under California's Fair Employment and Housing Act and the fourth-largest verdict of any kind in Alameda County history. … Plaintiffs attorney Christopher Dolan said last week that he was still reviewing the decision and had not yet decided whether to seek a new trial. Though clearly disappointed by the outcome, Dolan said Dombrink's handling of the issue was 'deliberate and thoughtful. I think Judge Dombrink has exercised what he thought to be in the best interest of justice.' … Whatever happens on appeal, Dolan said he hopes the initial award continues to send a message to the business community that Arab-Americans will not tolerate harassment in the workplace."

Race-Based "Survivor" Said To Mirror Societal Attitudes. In an op-ed for USA Today (9/14), George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley writes, "Segregation is seeping back into public schools, though we justify it away. Perhaps our discomfort is in its reflection of truths in our society." Turley continues, "Millions of Americans tonight will watch different races fight for supremacy over a patch of land. No, this is not the latest installment of an Adolf Eichmann production. It is this season's CBS Survivor: Cook Islands. … With a ratings fall from a high of 29.8 million in 2001 to 16.6 million last year, the show's producers are clearly looking for something to captivate more viewers. To do so, they decided to try a TV version of divide and conquer: Fuel the racial identification of viewers, pit them against other races and reap the benefits of racial pride — or racial animus." Turley adds, "The problem is that this is a reality program that is far too real for our sensibilities. Despite decades of affirmative action, we remain a highly race-conscious society with highly segregated neighborhoods, schools, prisons and — yes — entertainment. More important, the 6-year-old show reflects a growing return to segregationist policies across the country. … Survivor's producers insist that the use of racially segregated teams is designed to boost minority participation and possible success in the show. … That rationale is being used in public schools. Arguing that segregation helps minorities perform, states have introduced schools segregated by race, gender and even sexual orientation. … Survivor is embracing a 'separate but equal' policy that was the scourge of the civil rights movement, ultimately rejected by the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education. It is now the solution to everything from low school scores to low self-esteem — and apparently low ratings. … The fact is that Cook Islands is repellant not because it looks too little, but too much, like our society. It is a reality that many are likely to watch, but few want to recognize."

Barnett Takes Hands-Off Approach To Apple. Market Watch (9/14) reports, "The Justice Department's antitrust chief on Wednesday made a case for taking a hands-off approach to Apple Inc.'s iTunes music service and iPod music device, which are dominant in the online music business." Market Watch continues, "He also offered an implicit criticism of European governments that want the iPod player and iTunes music to be compatible with rival products. In June, French lawmakers approved government-backed legislation aimed at forcing Apple to make its online music and its iPod 'interoperable' with other products. Regulators in Norway and Sweden have threatened to impose fines if interoperability isn't made possible. … 'Apple provides a useful illustration of how an attack on intellectual-property rights can threaten dynamic innovation,' Thomas O. Barnett, who heads the Justice Department's antitrust division, said in the text of a speech in which he also noted that he's not investigating Apple's activities." Market Watch adds, "The music industry has in recent years been hit hard by the illegal downloading of music from the Internet, but the success of Apple's iTunes has boosted the sale of legal downloads and led to forecasts from the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry, a trade body, that recorded-music sales will grow in 2006. The concern across Europe is that Apple's products have too much dominance. … 'While it is true that Apple's digital-rights-management software ensures that the first recording of a song downloaded from iTunes can only play on an Apple device, consumers can re-record an iTunes song in an MP3 format and play it on other devices; in sum, it is hardly clear that they are locked in,' Barnett said. … His remarks came as European regulators traveled to the U.S. to address audiences here, providing U.S. politicians with an opportunity to push back. Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., who co-chairs an intellectual property caucus, in prepared remarks cited 'grave concern' about European regulatory tactics, and he complained that forcing Apple to 'hand over' its intellectual property would damp future innovation. … Barnett rejected complaints that Apple harmed consumers by selling expensive iPods that lock them in to buying the same costly devices in the future."

United, American Airlines Disclose Air Cargo Price-Fixing Settlements. The AP (9/14) reports, "United Airlines and American Airlines disclosed settlements Wednesday in a class-action lawsuit stemming from an investigation into alleged price collusion among carriers in the air cargo industry." The AP continues, "Unlike Lufthansa AG, which said Monday it would pay $85 million to settle pending lawsuits in the case, both U.S. carriers said they are not required to make any payments. … The settlements could close the books on their obligations in the case barring further findings. Officials at both American and United, the largest two U.S. airlines, said that if the Justice Department later brings charges against them as a result of its investigation, the settlements would be off." The AP adds, "More than a dozen airlines have been the subject of an investigation initiated by U.S. and European Union officials into suspected price-fixing in the air cargo industry on surcharges for fuel, security and insurance. … Investigators were quoted earlier this year as saying the surcharges apparently originated among European carriers, with U.S. companies then setting their own charges in line with competitors. For carriers to be hit with criminal charges, prosecutors would have to show they were actively conspiring, not just following others' price increases."

House Judiciary Committee Bill Removes Texas Airfield Antitrust Immunity. The Dallas Morning News (9/14, Reddy, Ramshaw) reports, "Following a setback in a House committee, North Texas lawmakers were plotting Wednesday evening to reinstate language to protect their Wright amendment legislation from potentially crippling court challenges." The News continues, "The House Judiciary Committee dealt the latest challenge to the effort to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, removing a phrase that would have immunized the agreement from antitrust claims. … Supporters of the deal remained hopeful they could recover through legislative maneuvers in coming weeks. But given a short legislative calendar and sustained Senate opposition, the outcome remains uncertain."

The AP (9/14, Gamboa) reports, "The agreement was forged by Love-based Southwest Airlines, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Dallas Fort Worth International Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth. American, based in Fort Worth, has a major hub at DFW. … The bill endorsed Wednesday no longer includes wording that stated the agreement complies with anti-competition laws and gave the Department of Transportation sole authority to decide claims against the arrangement." The AP adds, "Those provisions were opposed by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. He said the claims should be decided by the courts. … 'The antitrust laws are there for a purpose,' Sensenbrenner said. 'They are working, and there should not be legislative determination about what is or is not anticompetitive. The standard antitrust standards that have been applied to commercial arrangements for over 100 years should be applied to this one as well.'" The AP adds, "An unsigned memo from the Justice Department's antitrust division and made public last month said the bill would violate antitrust laws, although the department has not taken an official position. … The agreement calls for shrinking the number of gates at Love Field from 32 to 20, which some argue could block other airlines from competing with incumbents American, Southwest and Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc. Only 19 of the 32 gates are currently being used."

Bloomberg (9/14, Schlangenstein) reports, "The agreement may be ineffective without the immunity, said Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala. 'We will litigate this thing for the next 10 to 15 years,' he told colleagues on the panel. 'It will be tied up in court.'" Bloomberg adds, "The House committee's proposal 'doesn't appear to be a deal breaker,' Ed Stewart, a Southwest spokesman, said in an interview. 'The important thing is that this is another step toward what we were wanting in the first place, giving customers more choice.' … Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American, declined to comment on whether the version approved by the House committee would sink the agreement. The airline is based in Fort Worth, Texas. … 'There are more steps to go before we know what's ultimately going to happen,' Wagner said. Differences in versions approved by the House Judiciary Committee and the House transportation panel will have to be ironed out, he said."

The Dallas Business Journal (9/14) reports, "Last month a group of antitrust professors from law schools in Texas and elsewhere said in a letter to congressional leaders that the Dallas-Fort Worth deal to end Wright Amendment flight restrictions will result in higher fares and reduced service for Dallas-Fort Worth fliers. … Tuesday, D/FW Airport put out a letter written by antitrust law experts that refuted the professors' statements by saying an outright repeal of the Wright Amendment has never happened and would face too many challenges."

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (9/14, Recio) reports that "Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., joined by the ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., proposed an amendment that removes the antitrust immunity in the bill and inserts additional language reinforcing that nothing in the law governing Dallas Love Field 'shall modify, impair, or supersede the operation of the antitrust laws.' … Conyers, joining the chairman in an unusual show of bipartisanship, said, 'I'm not here to say the agreement is pro-competitive or anti-competitive.' … Rather, he said, he was also supporting the antitrust laws as the protector of consumers. 'For more than a century, the antitrust laws have been the cornerstone of preserving our free-market economy.'"

FTC Clears Hedge Fund For McDonald's Stake. The AP (9/14) reports, "An activist hedge fund has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission for a previously announced plan to buy nearly $794 million of McDonald's Corp. stock." The AP continues, "In a Sept. 1 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Oak Brook, Ill., fast-food chain said New York-based Pershing

Square Capital Management LP had informed the company of plans to acquire more than $793.8 million of McDonald's stock, through three investment funds." The AP adds, "The FTC said Wednesday that it granted early termination on Tuesday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law. .. .The purchase would amount to less than a 2 percent stake but would still make Pershing one of McDonald's top institutional shareholders."

EU Fines 14 Firms For Road Bitumen Price-Fixing. Market Watch (9/14) reports, "The European Commission Wednesday fined 14 companies EUR266.717 million for fixing prices of bitumen, a tar used in road construction." Market Watch continues, "Regulators found that eight suppliers and six purchasers participated in a cartel in the Netherlands from 1994 to 2002. … The commission granted BP PLC full immunity for cooperating in the investigation. In contrast, it doubled Royal Dutch Shell NV's fine to EUR108 million as a repeat offender. … 'We should not have attended these meetings and we regret our involvement in this case,' President-Director Rein Willems of Shell Nederland BV said in a statement." Market Watch adds, "The cartel fines represent the seventh largest ever levied by EU regulators and underline their determination to fight cartels. Companies are liable to up to 10% of their worldwide turnover if they participate, but they can appeal all decisions to the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg. … In 2001, the commission imposed fines of EUR790 million on a vitamin cartel. Last year, it imposed fines of EUR388 million on a hydrogen peroxide cartel and EUR344 million on an acrylic glass cartel. … 'The result of the cartel was the price of bitumen was higher than it otherwise would have been,' said E.U. antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd. Although bitumen is a 'small market' Todd said the fine is very high comparatively, because 'very large companies were involved, the cartel lasted for a time and that it was a very serious infringement.' In addition, some companies were 'repeat offenders' and some 'obstructed our investigation.' … He said similar probes were ongoing in both the Belgian and Spanish bitumen markets."

ImClone In Patent Dispute Over Erbitux. USA Today (9/14, Schmit) reports, "More bad news could be looming for ImClone Systems, the biotech maker at the heart of the Martha Stewart stock scandal." USA continues, "A federal judge is expected to rule, possibly within weeks, on a bitter patent dispute affecting ImClone's sole product, cancer drug Erbitux. … One Wall Street biotech analyst, Citigroup's Yaron Werber, has predicted defendants ImClone and Aventis Pharmaceuticals will lose the dispute. That could cost ImClone tens of millions of dollars a year, delivering an 8% to 24% hit to net income." USA adds, "The patent dispute — argued over a 10-day trial that ended in July in an often-packed Manhattan courtroom — pits former colleagues, friends and two giants of science against each other: Michael Sela, 82, a co-developer of multiple sclerosis drug Copaxone, and Joseph Schlessinger, 61, who testified he had been nominated for a Nobel Prize and that, for the last decade, he's been among the top 20 most-cited scientists in the world. … The patent dispute goes back 20 years and centers on who invented the idea of using a certain antibody, such as Erbitux, in combination with a chemotherapy drug to slow the growth of cancer tumors: Schlessinger and his colleagues or Sela and his colleagues. … Aventis owns the patent, which lists Schlessinger as its first named inventor. ImClone licensed the exclusive rights to the patent in 1994 even before it was approved. … The plaintiff, Israel's Yeda Research and Development, alleges that three scientists, including Sela, from Israel's famed Weizmann Institute of Science are the true inventors. Yeda, which commercializes inventions of Weizmann scientists, alleges Schlessinger — during a chance conversation with one of Sela's colleagues — volunteered to supply them with an ingredient to do the experiments."

IG Says Interior Officials Tolerating Ethical Failures. The New York Times (9/14, Andrews, 1.21M) reports, "The Interior Department's chief official responsible for investigating abuses and overseeing operations accused the top officials at the agency on Wednesday of tolerating widespread ethical failures, from cronyism to cover-ups of incompetence. 'Simply stated, short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior,' charged Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, at a hearing of the House Government Reform subcommittee on energy." He also said, "I have observed one instance after another when the good work of my office has been disregarded by the department. … Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials -- taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism and bias -- have been routinely dismissed with a promise "not to do it again."" The "blistering attack was part of Mr. Devaney's report on what he called the Interior Department's 'bureaucratic bungling' of oil and gas leases signed in the late 1990's, mistakes that are now expected to cost the government billions of dollars but were covered up for six years."

California Settlement Would Begin River Restoration In 2009. The Fresno Bee (9/14, Doyle, Grossi) reports, "More water should start flowing down the San Joaquin River by around 2009 under a long-awaited settlement scheduled to be filed in Sacramento today." The Bee continues, "By around 2013, salmon should be reintroduced to the river, which once teemed with them. Hundreds of millions of dollars would be spent on channel improvements and more, and a new 'San Joaquin River restoration' administrator would oversee the complicated work." The Bee adds, "The river restoration details, and myriad others that will change life in the San Joaquin Valley, have been worked out by farmers and environmentalists during months of negotiations. They are to be presented to a federal judge this morning in hopes of settling an 18-year-old lawsuit. … 'To be able to come up with an agreement that parties on both sides can agree to is a monumental step to a healthy river,' said Grant Davis, executive director of the San Francisco-based Bay Institute, one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. 'Failure would not only harm the river, it would harm the San Joaquin Valley.'" The Bee notes, "Davis declined to offer details of the settlement, which was described by others who had been briefed about the pending deal. The Justice Department only signed off on the agreement Monday night, participants said, and details were changing up until the last moment. … But even as environmental groups and their negotiating partners embrace the new deal, it's attracting flak on Capitol Hill and among some water users. Part of the agreement includes an apparent deadline for Congress to approve San Joaquin River restoration legislation: Dec. 31."

The New York Times (9/14, Mckinley) reports, "Under the plan, announced in Sacramento, billions of gallons of water would eventually be released from Friant Dam, just north of Fresno, spilling into the historic river channels. The new flow, environmentalists and fishermen hope, will create a healthy environment for Chinook salmon, which once spawned — and thrived — in the San Joaquin. … In exchange for losing 15 percent to 20 percent of their yearly water, depending on rainfall, farmers and other long-term water users would be assured of a supply." The Times adds, "Fed by downstream tributaries, the San Joaquin, the second-longest river in California, flows as it meets the Sacramento River east of San Francisco, forming an enormous delta that provides water to 22 million Californians. Since the 1940's, the upper reaches of the river, from Friant Dam to its convergence with the Merced River, have been siphoned off to water a million acres of crops through a vast irrigation project that has helped turn the Central Valley into one of the most prosperous agricultural regions. … The proposed restoration would carry a hefty price, with estimates from $250 million to $800 million, a cost that the federal government and state would probably share."

Greenhouse Gases Blamed For Decline In Winter Arctic Ice. The Washington Post (9/14, A3, Kaufman) reports, "The amount of ice being formed in the Arctic winter has declined sharply in the past two years, a finding that NASA climate researchers say significantly increases their confidence that greenhouse gases created by autos and industry are warming the Arctic and the globe." The Post continues, "For years, scientists have reported a steady decrease in summertime Arctic ice, but they had never before found a similar reduction in the amount of ice being created during the frigid and dark Arctic winter. This lack of effect on the Arctic winter was one flaw in the scientific models of global warming, which predicted a steady decrease in ice formation. .. .But a new paper by Josefino Comiso, a senior research scientist at NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, found precisely the reduction in wintertime ice over the past two years that the model had predicted. The past two winters each produced 6 percent less ice than the average amount measured for almost three decades." The Post adds, "Comiso yesterday called the new data from satellite imaging of ice formation and temperatures 'the strongest evidence of global warming in the Arctic so far.' … The drop in wintertime ice tracks a similar drop in sea ice detected in the warmer months. According to Mark Serreze, senior research analyst with the National Snow and Ice Data Center, the amount of ice in the Arctic at the end of the 2005 summer was the smallest seen in 27 years of satellite imaging, and probably the smallest in 100 years. He said this year's summer ice cover started out even smaller but is not another record."

House Rejects Bill To Curb Indian Gaming. USA Today (9/14, Radelat) reports, "Indian tribes hoping to establish casinos away from tribal lands dodged a potential setback Wednesday when the House rejected a bill barring off-reservation gambling." USA continues, "California Rep. Richard Pombo, head of the House Committee on Resources, said 'reservation shopping' by tribes has 'perverted' the intent of the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, which opened the door for tribes to establish casinos. … But Pombo, who introduced the bill, was unable to secure the two-thirds vote needed for it to pass, under special House rules barring amendments. The vote was 247-171 for the bill, with 278 votes needed for approval." USA adds, "As Indian gaming revenues have grown — they reached nearly $22.7 billion in 2005 — so has opposition in Congress to the industry's expansion. … Only four tribes have off-reservation casinos. But at least 44 others, many landless and newly recognized by the federal government, like the Jena Band of Choctaw Indians, have applications pending at the Interior Department. .. . Pombo's bill would have prohibited the Jena Band and other tribes from establishing casinos off tribal land or land not contiguous to their reservations. It also would have required tribes to compensate local communities for a new casino's impact on roads, water and sewer systems and other services, including law enforcement. … The National Indian Gaming Association, which represents more than 180 tribes, strongly opposed the bill, saying it would violate tribal sovereignty."

US Busts Western Drug Ring. The AP (9/14, Frazier) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday it has shattered a drug operation that started among high school buddies in Roseburg, Ore., 30 years ago and grew over the years to become an international operation that took in more than $20 million." The AP continues, "Eleven of the 12 people named in a federal indictment are in custody after arrests Wednesday in Oregon, Washington, Colorado and Idaho. Most are from Oregon. .. .U.S. Attorney Tom Moss of Boise, Idaho, said the arrests followed a classic strategy of 'follow the money.'" The AP adds, "The 194-page indictment, handed up in Boise in June but kept sealed until Wednesday's arrests, said the operation began by growing and selling marijuana. But, the indictment said, the operation expanded to smuggling of drugs from Mexico and South America, growing large quantities of marijuana indoors and on public lands, and manufacturing methamphetamines. … The government seeks forfeiture of more than $24 million in assets including boats, planes, business interests and real estate in five states. … U.S. attorney spokeswoman Jean McNeil said more arrests could follow, and those in custody likely would be sent to Idaho after court appearances where they were arrested."

New Hampshire Drug Sweep Nets 54 Arrests. The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (9/14, Grossmith) reports, "An eight-month undercover drug investigation in the state's largest city has resulted in 54 drug dealers being arrested and the confiscation of more than 10 pounds of drugs with a street value of $450,000, authorities said yesterday." The Leader continues, "The arrests began on April 1, but since Monday, police have arrested 28 people on charges they sold crack, cocaine or heroin to undercover officers or possessed drugs. … Manchester Police Chief John Jaskolka, at a news conference yesterday afternoon, said he 'fully expects more arrests as the operation continues over the next few days and weeks.'" The Leader adds, "Manchester Mayor Frank Guinta commended all the agencies involved -- Manchester police, state police, Hillsborough County Sheriff's Department, the U.S. Marshal's Office, ATF, state Probation and Parole Department, and the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force. … He said the arrests show there is a 'renewed commitment to eradicate the criminal element in our city.' … The undercover drug investigation so far as involved the execution of 13 search warrants and the seizure or purchase of 7.9 pounds of cocaine, 2.4 pounds of crack cocaine, and 2.5 ounces of heroin by agents. Police also removed nine firearms -- eight handguns and one shotgun -- from city streets and seized $130,979 in cash. … The probe was funded with a federal grant under the Operation Streetsweeper program and involved seven different state, local, county and federal agencies. … U.S. Attorney Thomas Colantuono said nine of those arrested will be prosecuted on federal charges in U.S. District Court in Concord."

Cocaine Trafficker Sentenced. The Brunswick Times Record (9/14) reports that Phillip Whitworth of New Haven, Conn., "was sentenced Tuesday in U.S. District Court to more than 15 years in prison in connection with his role in trafficking crack cocaine." He "was arrested in March 2006 in the Topsham Fair Mall area after attempting to sell the drugs to an undercover informant working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency" as part of a "joint investigation between the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and the Topsham Police Department began in Topsham and lasted 13 months." U.S. Attorney Paula D. Silsby "praised the DEA and the Topsham Police Department for their work in the investigation," and Detective Mark Gilliam of the Topsham Police Department "also praised the DEA for the agency's help with the investigation."

DEA Says Taliban Is Responsible For Afghanistan's Large Opium Poppy Harvest. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (9/13, 10 p.m.) reported, "The DEA says the Taliban is to blame for Afghanistan's explosion in opium poppy." One of Afghanistan's "big problems" is "the booming drug trade. The opium harvest, this year, the poppy harvest, up from 49% over last year, more than 90% of the world's heroin supply from Afghanistan. … It causes so many different problems and helps the taliban, of course, because they receive money from the drug trade." The report continued, "Afghan officials eradicate opium production. A wasted mission. The official had no power, no forces to wage a drug war here. A couple of fields out of thousands were damaged. … From what we have seen in this Afghanistan's biggest poppy producing province, destruction is far from a reality. … Today's counter narcotics minister knows how bad the trade is now and says he can't stop it. Police are part of the problem." Later, the show reports that in St. Louis "officers say they do catch someone selling heroin virtually every night of the week. One recent bust netted $20 million worth of China white. … How does the heroin get from Afghanistan to St. Louis? Captain Jackson says it first goes to Nigeria and then to street gangs in Chicago. From there, it makes its way here. China white isn't an inner city back alley shoot it up type of drug. This heroin is so pure it can be smoked or snorted. This has only increased the drug's appeal among the affluent. … DEA special agent Jack Riley says besides the drugs, his agents have seized millions of dollars in cash."

DEA, Spain Announce Increase In Cooperation to Stop Drug Trafficking. The AFP (9/14) reports, "Spain and the United States announced they were increasing cooperation to stop drug trafficking, following talks between Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba and visiting US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) administrator Karen Tandy. Both announced the strengthening of 'common instruments to combat the laundering of money proceeding from drug trafficking'." In April, "Spain will…under the co-chairmanship of Tandy, host the 25th International Drug Enforcement Conference (IDEC) in Madrid."

Acapulco In Midst Of Drug Violence. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Llana) reports, "Acapulco, once known as the 'Pearl of the Pacific,' has seen its reputation - and its mayor, Félix Salgado - battered by the worst drug violence in the town's history" as "the drug war between two cartels has spread from the northern ganglands along the US-Mexican border toward the south." It is "believed to be the fallout between the Sinaloa cartel, which had dominated Acapulco, and the Gulf cartel, which has been moving into its territory," and "the recent, and growing, viciousness of the acts that has been most unsettling. Acapulco has seen grenade attacks and decapitations haunt its front pages." Also, the "unprecedented violence" is due to "growing domestic consumption and the battle for key entry points into the US."

Witness In Washington Slaying Pleads Not Guilty To Federal Gun Charge. The AP (9/14, Johnson) reports, "A Bellevue (WA) gun collector who was arrested as a material witness in the 2001 assassination of a federal prosecutor pleaded not guilty Wednesday to an unrelated charge of machine-gun possession." The AP continues, "Albert K. Kwan was arrested Friday on one count of possessing an M-14 machine gun in January 2005. His attorneys said they found the charge curious, because Kwan owns more than 100 machine guns legally, and the one that resulted in his indictment required serious modification by federal agents before it could be fired automatically." The AP adds, "Kwan was arrested in early 2005 and held for 23 days as a material witness in the October 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Crane Wales, an 18-year federal prosecutor and president of a Washington gun-control organization. Wales was shot through a window as he worked in the basement of his home on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill. The FBI has designated his assassination a 'major case' and is offering $1 million for information that helps solve it." The AP notes, "Kwan, who has not been identified as a suspect, was held because federal investigators believed he had purchased two replacement barrels for a Makarov pistol, and ballistics evidence indicated the bullets that killed Wales had traveled through such a barrel. The investigators wanted to know if Kwan had the barrels or if he had provided them to someone else. … Assistant U.S. Attorney William Redkey argued Wednesday that Kwan should be detained because he posed a danger to the community and was not forthcoming with the court regarding his assets. He also failed to disclose a passport that had been issued to him in Hong Kong."

UK Gun Crackdown Includes New Jersey Raids. WABC-TV, New York City (9/13) reports, "British police seized hundreds of firearms, including automatic weapons and shotguns, in a dawn raid involving gun-smuggling between New Jersey and London." WABC-TV continues, "Eyewitness News has learned a 55-year-old man, who answered the door wearing his boxer shorts, was arrested at a home in Dartford, England Hundreds of guns, including shotguns, semiautomatic guns and automatic weapons, were found at his house. .. .Officials say an accomplice of that man was taken into custody in New Jersey this morning, questioned and released. The raids were a joint operation between U.S. and U.K. authorities." WABC-TV adds, "The ATF, the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms agency was the lead agency on the U.S. Side of the case, called 'Operation Trident' and which British officials say has been in operation for six years. … 'For eight months, the ATF has worked with the UK in this case, and we are conducting follow up work in the United States today,' said Richard Marianos, an ATF official. … Marianos stressed that British authorities are the lead agencies in the case and they will make any extensive comments. There have been no US arrests in the case so far."

Michigan Fugitive Captured In Tennessee. The AP (9/14, Press) reports, "A convicted murderer who escaped from a Michigan psychiatric facility in 1976 was arrested Wednesday in Nashville, where he assumed a new identity and got married." The AP continues, "Thomas Ball, 76, was arrested at his Nashville home Wednesday morning by U.S. marshals, WSMV-TV reported. .. .Ball was convicted in 1964 of second-degree murder and was sent to what is now called the Southern Michigan Correction Facility in Jackson, Mich." The AP adds, "He escaped from the Center for Forensic Psychiatry in Ypsilanti, Mich., after being transferred there for treatment in 1976. … Ball was living under the name of Thomas Fry and had remarried during him time in Tennessee, although his wife died in the past year. … Justice Department officials said they believe Ball came to Tennessee shortly after his escape."

IMMIGRATION:

Son Of Former Liberian President To Plead Guilty To Passport Charge. The AP (9/14, Anderson) reports, "Charles McArthur Emmanuel, the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor, told a federal judge Wednesday that he will plead guilty to charges of lying about his father's true identity on a passport used to enter the United States." The AP continues, "Emmanuel, who is also known as 'Chuckie' Taylor, said 'Yes sir, judge' when asked by U.S. District Judge Donald Graham whether he was ready to change his plea to guilty. A second hearing was scheduled for Friday for Emmanuel to formally enter the plea." The AP adds, "Emmanuel, who headed an elite paramilitary unit for his father in Liberia, was arrested March 30 at Miami International Airport shortly after arriving on a flight from Trinidad. His arrest came the day after his father was apprehended in Africa on United Nations charges of alleged atrocities during neighboring Sierra Leone's civil war. … On his application for a U.S. passport, Emmanuel identified his father as 'Steven Daniel Smith' rather than Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. The passport fraud charge carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison. … Emmanuel's court-appointed attorney, Miguel Caridad, declined comment after Wednesday's hearing. Karen Rochlin, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, also declined comment."

House GOP Will Call Vote On Measure Requiring 700-Mile Border Fence. The New York Times (9/14, Swarns, 1.21M) reports, "House Republicans announced Wednesday that they would move swiftly to pass legislation requiring the Bush administration to build 700 miles of fencing along the Mexican border to help stem the flow of illegal immigrants and drugs into the United States." The legislation, which "is expected to go to the House floor for a vote on Thursday," would "require construction of two layers of reinforced fencing along stretches of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas that are considered among the most porous parts of the border." It would also "require officials of the Department of Homeland Security to establish 'operational control' over all American land and sea borders by using Border Patrol agents, fencing, satellites, cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles." The bill "is the first in a series of border security measures House Republicans have promised to pass before the midterm elections in November." Democrats "promptly criticized the plan as political grandstanding intended to energize conservative voters before the elections." Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, "has publicly raised doubt about the effectiveness of border fencing, particularly in remote desert areas." McClatchy (9/14, Montgomery) notes that asked if the White House supports the proposed fence, Tony Snow responded, "What the administration wants is comprehensive reform."

The Washington Times (9/14, Hurt, 88K) quotes Snow saying, "We are urging the House of Representatives and the United States Senate to work together to come up with comprehensive reform." Asked if Bush "held out hope for an immigration bill," Snow said, "You know, we've got a very limited amount of time. You draw your own conclusions."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, A1, Gaouette, 918K), under the headline "On Eve of a Vote, GOP on Both Sides of Fence," reports, "Some conservative Republicans have long supported the get-tough approach. One of them, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), responded to the new House measure by calling on Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to embrace the House approach and declare the Senate bill dead". Democrats "noted that House Republicans were introducing their bill at a time when the GOP, vulnerable in several election campaigns, needed an issue to rally voters." Sen. Harry Reid said, "It's so transparent."

House Democrats' Omission Of Immigration From Agenda Angers Hispanic Members. The Hill (9/14, Bolton) reports House Democratic leaders "passed around to colleagues Tuesday a plan they would focus on if their party wins control of the lower chamber on Election Day, but although the document was drafted to achieve consensus, it has already angered Democratic Hispanic leaders." The document lacks "any mention of immigration. While Republican candidates around the country are trying to make immigration one of the biggest issues of this fall's elections, Democrats appear to be tiptoeing around it." Some Democrats "fear that the issue will hurt them in conservative-leaning districts such as in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky that they must win in order to capture majority control this November." At a closed-door meeting "of the Democratic Steering & Policy Committee on Tuesday, New York Rep. José Serrano, the panel's vice chairman, challenged Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) over the lack of any mention of immigration reform in the caucus's new 25-page agenda document for 2007. The confrontation created a tense moment in the room, said one participant." Other Democrats "agree with Serrano that their party should make known its position on an issue important to Hispanic voters, whom many political strategists believe will be a crucial voting bloc in the future because of their surging numbers."

Immigration Advocates To Focus On Citizenship, Voter Registration Drives. After disappointing turnout at immigration rights marches over Labor Day weekend, advocates for illegal immigrants say they decided to focus on voter registration drives and citizenship drives for immigrants who qualify. The Washington Post (9/14, A3, 748K) reports, "Antonio González, president of the Los Angeles-based Southwest Voter Registration Project, said 50 voter registration drives will be launched in California, Texas, New Mexico and Colorado, states with large Latino populations. In addition, 100 voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives will kick off in October, he said. … But opponents of illegal immigration said voter and citizenship registration drives will not reignite a movement that has stalled."

Brokers, Accountants Use Internet To Provide Access To Offshore Tax Shelters. USA Today (9/14, Mccoy) reports, "A network of brokers, accountants, attorneys and other providers is increasingly promoting offshore trusts and accounts as a way to avoid lawsuits, creditors and, in some cases, federal and local taxes in the USA. Riding the rapid expansion of the Internet, some parts of the mini-industry are making tax-avoidance techniques — once mainly offered to high-net-worth individuals in private conferences — available online to average Americans. … 'This growing access to people who aren't wealthy and are willing to pay a $3,000 fee … to someone to help hide their assets offshore is getting to be a huge problem,' says Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., ranking minority member of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which in August released the latest in a series of reports on potential offshore abuses. 'Honest taxpayers get socked with the bill' as tax avoiders transfer assets offshore, Levin said. .. . That cost is high." USA adds, "Although no precise estimates are possible, as much as $1.6 trillion in North American wealth is likely held in offshore accounts, according to a 2005 report by the Tax Justice Network, an international group opposed to tax avoidance. … Americans with assets offshore probably avoid about $50 billion in taxes annually, according to an estimate by Reuven Avi-Yonah, head of the International Tax Master of Law Program at the University of Michigan Law School. … Hundreds of companies and promoters now use the Internet to guide Americans and others who transfer assets to offshore banks or trusts, according to the Senate subcommittee report. Money moves from domestic accounts to offshore tax havens such as Belize or the Bahamas, at times without any meetings between promoter and client."

IRS Claims Tyco Owes $50 Million In Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Levitz) reports, "Tyco International Ltd. still hasn't paid millions of dollars in federal income taxes from an allegedly false tax return filed by its chief tax adviser in 1999, the Internal Revenue Service said." The Journal continues, "The potential $50 million tax bill potentially looming over the giant manufacturing-and-services conglomerate came to light this week as Tyco's former vice president in charge of taxation, Raymond Scott Stevenson, was charged with filing a false tax return that failed to report more than $170 million in capital gains on Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return. Mr. Stevenson pleaded not guilty to a felony fraud charge before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla." The Journal adds, "According to the IRS, the capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill. Those taxes have not yet been paid by Tyco, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the agency's criminal division. … Ms. Michaud said that after Mr. Stevenson's expected criminal trial, the government may attempt to collect the taxes. Ms. Michaud declined to say whether the company is contesting the tax bill." The Journal notes, "Tyco, which is registered in Bermuda and operated from West Windsor, N.J., is in the midst of executing a plan to split the sprawling conglomerate into three stand-alone companies by the first quarter of 2007. … According to the U.S. Attorney Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, who was Tyco's vice president in charge of taxation until 2003, directed a 'series of transactions' designed to reduce Tyco's state liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in federal capital gains under federal tax code. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson left off the $170 million, said Ms. Michaud, adding that the investigation is continuing."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Administration Seeks Alternatives To Keep Bolton At UN. With President Bush's nomination of John Bolton to be ambassador to the UN in trouble in the Senate, the Bush Administration is looking into other ways to keep Bolton in the job after his temporary appointment expires in January. The Washington Post (9/14, A12, Bake, Linzer, 748K) reports that as recently as two weeks ago, the Administration "was confident it could finally push through Bolton's long-stalled nomination. But last week's surprise move by Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) to delay a vote convinced Republicans on Capitol Hill that the nomination may be doomed, prompting a search for alternatives." The Post adds, "Administration officials said they have not given up. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Chafee yesterday to kick off a lobbying campaign that will continue today when he returns to Washington after his hard-fought Republican primary victory in Rhode Island on Tuesday." The Post also reports, "Another failed nomination would be a stinging defeat for Bush, who defied Senate opposition last year and installed Bolton at the United Nations on an interim basis with a recess appointment."

GOP Leaders, Appropriators Remain At Odds Over Earmark Reform. Roll Call (9/14, Davis) reports with Republican leaders "and House appropriators deadlocked over the scope of earmark reform, the leadership is on course for a showdown with the spending panel as the resolution is scheduled for a potentially close floor vote today." Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield "said that another meeting of the panel on Wednesday again failed to result in an agreement on how reforms are applied to spending, tax and authorizing bills." In particular, appropriators "do not believe that the current proposal fairly applies the leadership-backed reforms to bills generated from the Ways and Means Committee as it does to appropriations bills. 'Our members are fairly unanimous,' Scofield said."

The New York Times (9/14, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports, "Nine months after Congressional leaders vowed to respond to several bribery scandals with comprehensive reforms, their pledges have come to next to nothing." House leaders "prepared to take up a rule requiring individual lawmakers to sign their names to some of the pet projects they tuck into major tax and spending bills. As an internal House rule, the requirement would be in effect only until the end of the session, just a few weeks away." While reform advocates "denounced the proposal as nearly toothless, its bite was still too sharp for many in Congress. By Wednesday night the resolution appeared to be bogged down in a three-way squabble among Republicans, Democrats and the powerful members of the House Appropriations Committee."

The Hill (9/14, Schor, O'Connor) reports House Republican appropriators "remained unwilling yesterday to publicly endorse their leadership's resolution requiring disclosure of earmark sponsors, setting up a possible rebellion by committee members that could bring down the resolution." Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) "huddled with his panel yesterday afternoon but emerged with no firm panel-wide plan to oppose the earmark-reform resolution. Many GOP appropriators believe the resolution singles out their committee's product while applying a narrow definition of tax and authorizing earmarks." Lewis said, "We are attempting to communicate with leadership that this committee feels very strongly that earmark reform is a priority, but it should apply to everybody."

Database To List Government Expenditures. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Chaddock, 58K) reports, "Coming soon to a laptop near you: how government is spending your federal tax dollars - contracts, grants, and special projects sought by lawmakers. From wartime contracts for Halliburton to earmarks for the Punxsutawney Weather Discovery Center (think 'famous groundhog') in Pennsylvania, all will be listed on a searchable database." The proposal is the "least controversial of all the reforms Congress has considered since last year's bribery and corruption scandals, and its passage will provide an effective new tool for anyone wanting to look over lawmakers' shoulders soon after they clear spending bills."

House Republicans Blocking "Interoperability" Funds. The Washington Post (9/14, A12, Hsu, 748K) reports, "House Republicans are blocking an attempt to spend $3.1 billion to help the nation's police and fire agencies communicate in emergencies as Congress debates a proposed overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. As both parties intensified the election-season rhetoric over national security, Democrats accused GOP leaders of shortchanging the well-documented need to improve communication among first responders. Republicans acknowledged that they do not want to spend billions prematurely, saying more planning and coordination are needed." Meanwhile, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "rebuffed calls for dedicated federal grants to upgrade equipment, coordinate plans, train emergency workers and adapt common technology standards," stating that the interoperability problem is not "a technology issue. This is an issue of having community leaders come to an agreement."

Obama, Coburn Push For Crackdown On FEMA No-Bid Contracts. The Hill (9/14, Schor) reports, "Having scored a high-profile victory on their bill to set up an online federal spending database, the unlikely freshman duo of Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) are hoping their fourth bid to crack down on no-bid contracting at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) will finally make it to the president's desk. … 'The closer you get to the election, the more members of Congress will want to demonstrate to the public that they are fiscally responsible,'" said Coburn spokesman John Hart. The senators "wrote to FEMA director David Paulison last month after viewing reports that the four main no-bid contracts awarded for emergency housing of residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina had bloated from $400 million to $3.4 billion. Paulison had echoed the senators' qualms about no-bid abuse during private meetings in December and May, but the four contracts — given to Bechtel Corp., Fluor, the Shaw Group and CH2M Hill — were not reopened for bidding despite the agency's initial promises to that effect."

Lawmakers Accuse NIH Of Being Soft On Ethics Violators. The Washington Post (9/14, A19, Weiss, 748K) reports that "angry" lawmakers criticized federal health officials yesterday for what they called a "pattern of being 'soft' on government scientists found to have violated ethics rules. … 'I do recognize that NIH has taken needed steps to improve its ethics program,' said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, which for years has been dogging NIH over alleged ethics violations. 'But more action is needed.'" The Post adds, "Agency officials denied that they have been less than rigorous in meting out punishment." NIH "banned all outside consulting with drug and biotech companies more than a year ago, when it became clear that a few dozen had not reported their arrangements as required. NIH Deputy Director Raynard Kington said that at the conclusion of its investigation, NIH began administrative actions against 34 scientists and referred 10 others to the Office of Inspector General for possible prosecution."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Willman, 918K) reports, "NIH officials also assured the panel that they had recommended the termination of two other senior scientists who accepted drug company money without obtaining required advance approval. 'When violations were found, NIH implemented sanctions ranging from oral admonishments to letters of reprimand to suspensions,' Kington told the subcommittee. 'In all cases where individual scientists failed to take [personal] leave to conduct outside activities, they were directed to pay back that leave to the government.'"

Democrats Fail In Effort to Oust Tomlinson. The New York Times (9/14, Labaton, 1.21M) reports, "Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, the embattled chairman of the federal board that oversees most government broadcasts to foreign countries, narrowly survived an effort to oust him on Wednesday." After "a recent report by the inspector general at the State Department that Mr. Tomlinson had used his office to run a horse-racing operation and that he had improperly put a friend on the payroll, the three Democratic members of the seven-member Broadcasting Board of Governors offered two resolutions." One resolution "called for his resignation as chairman during a continuing inquiry; the other sought to curtail his authority sharply." The Justice Department "has declined to pursue a criminal investigation but is conducting a related civil inquiry. Both resolutions "failed 3 to 3 on party-line votes. Mr. Tomlinson did not participate in the votes, people involved in the closed-door session said." Tomlinson "has denied doing anything improper and had said the investigation 'was inspired by partisan divisions inside the Broadcasting Board of Governors.'"

The Washington Times (9/14, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Republicans said Democratic board member Jeffrey Hirschberg, who called for the votes, is engaging in a partisan attack, citing his financial ties to liberal figures such as former President Bill Clinton." Since 1999, Hirschberg "has given nearly $100,000 to Democratic candidates and organizations, including the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, according to public campaign-finance records." Hirschberg's brother, Judd Blair Hirschberg, "who was convicted of mail fraud in 1991, was one of 59 persons pardoned by Mr. Clinton in December 2000, shortly before he left office."

Clyburn, Emanuel Vie For Possible Majority Whip Opening. The Hill (9/14, Hearn, Bolton) reports that with political pundits "predicting that Democrats will recapture the House this fall, Democratic lawmakers are debating who would become the majority whip: Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), moving up one step from caucus chairman, or Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the campaign wizard who would have orchestrated the victory." Although only Clyburn "has declared his interest in the position, the escalating rivalry between the two was on display this week when news broke that the Democratic National Committee (DNC) would funnel $60,000 into each of 40 House districts, breaking a stalemate between the DNC and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee." Several Democratic officials "credited Clyburn with brokering the deal. He invited DNC chief Howard Dean to his hideaway office in the Capitol July 21 in the hopes of convincing him to dip into the DNC's coffers and fund turnout efforts for House Democrats." But Emanuel allies "dispute Clyburn's influence, arguing that the agreement was engineered solely between staff."

Shadegg May Be Eyeing Another Leadership Bid. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/13, 2.03M) reported, "After losing his race for House majority leader earlier this year, Arizona Republican Rep. John Shadegg today showed his colleagues that he may be planning another run for the Republican leadership. At a closed-door meeting today of all House Republicans, Shadegg announced he had raised $625,000 for the House Republicans' campaign arm. The sum far surpassed amount he and other Republican lawmakers were asked to raise for the National Republican Congressional Committee. More importantly, it sparked talk that Shadegg may be interested in another campaign for the House leadership."

Democrats Will Unveil Legislation To Reduce Abortions. The Chicago Tribune (9/14, Dorning, 623K) reports, "Reaching out to more moderate, church-going voters with misgivings about abortion, House Democrats plan to unveil legislation on Thursday that sets a public policy goal of reducing abortions in America." The proposal, "to be announced at a news conference attended by House Democrats' national campaign chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), would not restrict access to abortion." Instead, "it promotes such preventive measures as funding for contraceptives and expanded sex education geared toward avoiding pregnancy as well as support for adoption and services to new mothers, according to several people familiar with the legislation." The legislation "targets voters who have concerns about abortion but who are not absolutely opposed to the procedure. Its introduction follows extended discussion in Democratic political circles about improving the party's image with traditionalist voters and public efforts by prominent Democrats to fashion an approach to abortion with broader appeal."

SSA Seeks Fiscal 2007 Funding Increase. The Washington Post (9/14, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Social Security Administration would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices 10 days next year if Congress does not increase its funding in fiscal 2007, the agency has told Congress." In a letter to the Senate Appropriations Committee, Social Security Commissioner Jo Anne Barnhart wrote, "Fewer resources mean fewer people to serve the public in all areas of SSA's operations," adding, "Because these budget reductions will affect all employees, they will result in major service disruptions across all workloads." The Post adds, "The agency's budget may not be resolved until after the November elections, congressional aides said."

Baucus Casts His 10,000th Senate Vote. Roll Call (9/14, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Sen. Max Baucus "cast his 10,000th Senate vote on Wednesday, becoming one of just 27 in the history of the Senate who have cast 10,000 or more votes."

Brooks Discusses Bush's Abilities As A Leader. In his New York Times column (9/14), David Brooks says, "A leader's first job is to project authority, and George Bush certainly does that. In a 90-minute interview with a few columnists in the Oval Office on Tuesday, Bush swallowed up the room, crouching forward to energetically make a point or spreading his arms wide to illustrate the scope of his ideas — always projecting confidence and intensity. … I interview politicians for a living, and every time I brush against Bush I'm reminded that this guy is different. There's none of that hunger for approval that is common to the breed. This is the most inner-directed man on the globe." The "other striking feature of his conversation is that he possesses an unusual perception of time. Washington, and modern life in general, encourages people to think in the short term. But Bush, who stands aloof, thinks in long durations." Bush was "passionate on the need for patience and steadfastness. He talked about 'inviolate' principles written upon his heart: 'People want you to change. It's tactics that shift, but the strategic vision has not, and will not, shift.'" But when Bush "is strategizing goals, he is assertiveness on stilts. When he is contemplating means, he defers to authority. And the sad truth is, there has been a gap between Bush's visions and the means his administration has devoted to realize them. And when tactics do not adjust to fit the strategy, then the strategy eventually gets diminished to fit the tactics. Or worse."

Samuelson Calls For Medicare Overhaul. Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K) that Medicare is the "monster" in America's future. Samuelson writes, "Federal spending on the elderly is plausibly projected to double from 2000 to 2030 as a share of national income. About three-quarters of that increase will be health spending -- mostly Medicare but also Medicaid (70 percent of Medicaid spending goes to the old and disabled). The projected increase in health spending exceeds all of today's discretionary domestic spending on schools, the FBI, the environment and much more." Samuelson adds, "We should overhaul Medicare, but just how is unclear. … Samuelson concludes, "Most studies of Medicare have had a narrow and technical focus, evading the truly central issue. It isn't 'What's good for Medicare beneficiaries?' Rather, it's 'What's good for America?'"

Stocks Rally, With Dow 180 Points From Record. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Lucchetti, 2.03M) reports, "The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 45.23 points, or 0.39%, to a four-month high of 11543.32. It was the average's 10th-highest close and only the 13th time it ended the day above 11500. The Dow sits 180 points from its all-time peak on Jan. 14, 2000, the record close of 11722.98." The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "gained 0.38%, or 4.96 points, to 1318.07, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite index rose 0.53%, or 11.85, to 2227.67."

Analyst Says Oil Prices Could Fall To $15 A Barrel. McClatchy (9/13, Hall) reports, "The recent sharp drop in the global price of crude oil could mark the start of a massive sell-off that returns gasoline prices to lows not seen since the late 1990s. … 'All the hurricane flags are flying' in oil markets, said Philip K. Verleger, a noted energy consultant who was a lone voice several years ago in warning that oil prices would soar. Now, he tells McClatchy Newspapers, they appear to be poised for a dramatic plunge." McClatchy notes, "Crude oil prices have fallen about $14, or roughly 17 percent, from their July 14 peak of $78.40." If "oil traders fear that this downward price spiral will get worse and run for the exits by selling off their futures contracts, said Verleger, it's not unthinkable that oil prices could return to $15 or less a barrel, at least temporarily. That could mean gasoline prices as low as $1.15 per gallon."

ABC World News (9/13, story 7, Gibson) reported "gas prices have dropped off the list of issues that most concern voters. And it's not hard to tell why. Prices have plunged to an average of $2.62 a gallon from unleaded regular from $3.04 less than a month ago." ABC (Stark) reported, "After a summer of paying $3 a gallon and more, consumers are now watching with relief, as gas prices go lower and lower." ABC added "an analyst who correctly forecast the stunning rise in prices is now predicting more price cuts to come." Jason Schenker, Energy analyst, Wachovia: "We think that, by the end of the month, we're looking at gasoline prices at the pump around $2.25 to $2.50 a gallon. During the winter months, we could see the price go down towards $2.00 a gallon nationally."

Oil Industry Aims To Debunk "Peak Oil" Theory. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A2, Bahree, Ball, 2.03M) reports, "Leading players in the petroleum industry, including Saudi Arabia and Exxon Mobil Corp., are aggressively arguing that plenty of crude oil remains for world consumption, in an effort to counter critics who contend crude output is about to plateau. That argument, known as peak-oil theory, has provided intellectual backing for the boom in crude prices and sowed doubts among some policy makers about crude's long-term reliability as an energy source." The chief executive of Saudi Aramco "argued during a speech in Vienna that the world has more than a century's worth of crude left at current production rates. His talk followed similar remarks by a senior Exxon executive this week." The Journal says, "In a sign that oil-supply concerns are gaining currency, the Department of Energy has asked the National Petroleum Council, an oil-and-gas-industry research group, to investigate peak-oil claims."

Polls Suggest Improving Picture For Republicans. The Washington Times (9/14, Dinan, 88K) reports President Bush's "series of speeches on the war on terror has boosted the issue's profile and helped recapture Republicans' lead when voters are surveyed on whom they trust to handle terrorism." On the issue of terrorism, Republicans "now lead Democrats by 48 percent to 41 percent among registered voters in a new ABC News poll, a flip from a seven-point Democrat advantage in the same poll last month, and 16 percent now choose terrorism as their top voting issue -- a gain of five percentage points." An NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll "released yesterday put Mr. Bush's job-approval rating at 42 percent -- an increase of five percentage points since June, though still below a comfortable level for a president heading into a midterm election." Both polls "still showed Democrats with a sizable advantage when people are asked which party they want to control Congress -- nine percentage points in the NBC-Journal survey and eight points in the ABC poll."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Cummings, 2.03M), in a story about Sen. Chafee's primary win, also says the midterm election "trends may be turning slightly more favorable for Republicans."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Harwood, 2.03M) reports Bush's "efforts to explain and win support for his policies on Iraq and terrorism appear to be paying some initial dividends as midterm congressional campaigns heat up." But Bush's approval increase "remains 'a modest uptick' in 'a very difficult national environment' for the president's party in midterm elections, cautions Republican pollster Bill McInturff. The president's approval rating remains weak at 42%, though it is improved from 38% in June. A 54% majority of voters continues to say the U.S. is headed in the wrong direction." Still, the poll results "suggest Mr. Bush retains some ability to shape the context of the election to his party's benefit."

On NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 6, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), Washington bureau chief and moderator of Meet the Press, Tim Russert, said, "When you look inside the poll, the number of people who are concerned about gasoline prices has declined dramatically and that seems to be giving the President a boost." Williams: "Other reasons for this [42%] number, Tim?" Russert: "The Iraq war, let's look at this. The President's approval is up 3% [at 38%]. That is a gain of three points since our last poll in July where it was 35%. A series of speeches, the commemorative events of September 11th seemed to have helped the President in a modest way." On the generic ballot, "the Democrats still have a nine-point spread [48%-39%], but we are still eight weeks away."

Stephanopoulos Says Poll Shows Republicans "Coming Back." On ABC World News (9/13, story 6, 2:15, Gibson), George Stephanopoulos was asked whether ABC polling shows "Republicans coming back." Stephanopoulos said, "It does. The President's been graining his approval rating. Republicans have been gaining on Democrats. And it shows that the President's campaign on terrorism is working. Remember last week? Terrorism was number five on people's list of concerns. Now, it's moved up to three. And probably the best news for the White House -- gas prices just dropped out of the top five." ABC (Gibson) noted, "Gas prices are off the list. There were on it last week." Stephanopoulos: "Can it continue through November?" Gibson: "That's the key question."

Rothenberg Says 2006 Will Be An "Anti-Bush Election." Stuart Rothenberg, in a Roll Call column (9/14) titled "An Anti-Incumbent Election? This Year? Of Course Not," writes, "Over the past year or so, I've heard more than a few people talking about 2006 as an anti-incumbent election. Well, those people are wrong. We are not going to have an anti-incumbent election in November. We are going to have an anti-Bush election. … While it is true that voters are not particularly impressed with Congress in general or either of the two major parties, the midterm elections have developed into a referendum on the president. Republicans may well succeed in minimizing the damage in November by localizing elections and re-electing incumbents, but there is no indication that voters will send a message of dissatisfaction with all incumbents in the fall." That "means that all but a handful of Democratic House incumbents can rest easy."

Primary Analyses Focus On Chafee Victory, Upset Wins By Anti-War Democrats. The AP (9/14, Espo) reports, "All politics is national in the 2006 midterm elections, with both parties willing to put aside deeply held views over war, taxes and more in the surpassing struggle for control of the House and Senate. Which explains why a conservative Republican Party rejoiced Wednesday at the primary victory of Rhode Island's incorrigibly independent GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee, and struggled with the defeat of the more moderate of two leading contenders for a House seat in Arizona." Or "why Democrats, whose leaders call daily for a timetable for a troop withdrawal from Iraq, were less than thrilled to find vigorously anti-war contenders winning nominations for House seats in New Hampshire and New York."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Feldmann, 58K) reports on Chafee's win, and says, "In the end, the most-watched race of the Sept. 12 primaries became the dog that didn't bark. … A loss by Senator Chafee would have been nearly without precedent in modern times -- the second senator to lose in the primaries, following Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman's defeat in Connecticut last month. Headlines would have screamed about voters clamoring for change, and about ideological purges in both parties." The outcome "suggests that the national Republican Party did indeed need to pull out all the stops, as it did, to ensure that the conservative was not the nominee and a near-certain loser in November."

The New York Times (9/14, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "In New Hampshire, Jim Craig, a moderate Democrat who had been backed by his party in the primary to take on Representative Jeb Bradley in the Manchester area, lost to the antiwar candidate Carol Shea-Porter. 'Obviously, that is embarrassing for Democrats,' said Representative Charles Bass, the Republican who represents New Hampshire's other House district, predicting that Mr. Bradley would now be re-elected." The Democratic Party's "choice in the 19th Congressional District of New York, represented by Sue W. Kelly, a Republican, also lost on Tuesday. Ms. Kelly will now face the singer-songwriter John Hall, who has attracted celebrity backing from the music community."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Antiwar Democrats…made themselves heard again. They won in New Hampshire, lifting Carol Shea-Porter, who called for withdrawal from Iraq, over Jim Craig, who heavily outspent her and was backed by the party establishment. They lost in Maryland, but not before putting a scare into Representative Al Wynn, who voted for the war and has voted with the GOP on campaign finance issues and some tax cuts. He won 50%-46%." Both "were electoral surprises likely to push the Congressional Democrats further left on the war. Whether that will help them in November is another story, since Ned Lamont's victory last month over Connecticut Senator Joe Lieberman seems to be helping the GOP retain its three vulnerable House seats in that state. You know it's a volatile political year when the GOP is counting on victories by a pro-war Democrat and an antiwar Republican (Mr. Chafee) to keep control of Congress."

David Broder, in the Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K), writes that "the lesson from Tuesday's round of primaries in nine states and the District of Columbia was simple and reassuring. Credentials count. Experience counts. And so does the willingness to engage some serious issues. For the most part, the candidates nominated for Congress and governor come from the mainstream establishments of their parties."

National GOP Strategy Seen As Risking Depressed Turnout In November. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "The Republican Party leadership won the primary battle in Rhode Island, getting their preferred candidate, incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee, past a conservative challenger. But at what cost?" National support for the incumbent "angered" challenger Steve Laffey's "supporters and could deter them from voting in November when Mr. Chafee squares off with Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former attorney general whose campaign is flush with cash." The Journal adds, "Just as trends may be turning slightly more favorable for Republicans, Tuesday's back-to-back clashes between the Republican Party machine and its base in Rhode Island as well as in Arizona could diminish turnout among conservative voters in November. Turnout by that voting bloc carried the president in 2000 and 2004." The Journal adds, "In Arizona, the battle was for the seat of retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe. Conservatives supported state Rep. Randy Graf, whose get-tough immigration platform fit with a House bill passed earlier this year. Pro-Graf forces were startled when, in the final weeks of the campaign, Speaker Dennis Hastert and other House leaders poured cash into the race of moderate Steve Huffman, who embraced a Senate immigration bill that would have created a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the US."

An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (9/14, 918K) the GOP's split over immigration "is threatening to cost Republicans at least one seat in the House of Representatives." Graf "may be further to the right than the national GOP, but on issues such as taxes, same-sex marriage and abortion, he's right in line with the Bush administration. Nevertheless, the National Republican Congressional Committee was so worried about his ability to win this marginally Republican district in November that it threw more than $250,000 worth of advertising behind one of Graf's primary opponents, Steve Huffman."

Successful GOTV Effort For Chafee Seen As Good Sign For GOP. The Washington Post (9/14, A23, VandeHei, Cillizza, 748K), meanwhile, says "the turnout campaign that Republican operatives used to help pull…Chafee to victory in the Rhode Island primary was a potent demonstration of how money and manpower can transform a race even in an unfavorable political environment -- and a preview of the strategy that national party officials say they plan to replicate in the most competitive House and Senate races over the next 55 days." The Post adds, "In the past two national elections, in 2002 and 2004, Republicans outperformed Democrats in bringing their backers to the polls, but many Democrats and independent analysts have suggested that the competition may be different this year, in part because of slumping morale among GOP activists. But Chafee's performance -- combined with reports of late-starting organization and internal bickering on the Democratic side -- suggest that the Republican advantage on turnout may remain intact even as many other trends are favoring the opposition."

Ickes Looks To Organize 527 Group To Boost Congressional Democrats. The New York Times (9/14, Broder, 1.21M) reports, "Sensing both political danger and opportunity," Democratic operative Harold Ickes "and a group of major party donors have banded together to deliver a barrage of late advertising and on-the-ground action to secure Democratic victories in November." Ickes and "a group of allies are soliciting money for a new organization called the September Fund. They hope to raise and spend as much as $25 million to influence not only crucial Congressional races but also other campaigns and ballot initiatives at the federal and state level." Ickes was "among the chief organizers of several groups that raised more than $200 million from wealthy liberals and labor unions in 2004 to try to defeat President Bush." After months "in which Democrats have fretted about how much support they would get from those sources this time around, Mr. Ickes is turning to many of the same donors in hopes that a surge of spending in the fall campaign's final weeks will cement Democratic gains against a president and a Republican-led Congress whose approval ratings are sagging." Ickes "has already contacted George Soros, the billionaire financier who gave Democratic committees more than $25 million in 2004. Among others on the fund's list of potential donors are Steve Bing, a Hollywood producer; Linda Pritzker, a member of the family that owns Hyatt hotels; Herb and Marion Sandler, owners of a California savings and loan; and Ted Waitt, founder of the computer company Gateway. All gave multimillion-dollar gifts to the funds Mr. Ickes directed in 2004."

Allen Camp Blasts Webb For 1979 Article On Women In Combat. The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports in a front page story that the Virginia's Senate race "turned nasty Wednesday as Republican Sen. George Allen launched a character attack on his Democratic opponent's past views toward women in combat, signaling the start of a two-month barrage of negative campaigning in what has become a close race." Allen "organized a news conference with five female U.S. Naval Academy graduates who said an article written 27 years ago by Allen's opponent, James Webb, prompted harassment by male midshipmen at the academy." In the Washingtonian magazine article, "Women Can't Fight," Webb "wrote of the brutal conditions during the Vietnam War and argued against letting women into combat. Allen's campaign zeroed in on passages in which Webb described one of the academy's coed dorms as 'a horny woman's dream' and said that he had never met a woman he 'would trust to provide . . . combat leadership.'" Webb, "a Naval Academy graduate who was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan, issued a statement saying he was sorry 'to the extent that my writing subjected women at the Academy or the active Armed Forces to undue hardship.' But his campaign also responded aggressively, accusing Allen of opposing the admission of women to the Virginia Military Institute and of once having accepted membership into an exclusive club while he was governor."

The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot/AP (9/14, Lewis) reports five female US Naval Academy graduates said Webb "fostered an air of hostility and harassment for them with a magazine article he wrote in 1979. The women, who attended the academy in the late 1970s and early '80s, said the column in Washingtonian magazine emboldened male midshipmen to humiliate them continuously, and some even wore 'Jim Webb Fan Club' T-shirts." Meanwhile, an "independent political action committee of Iraq war veterans announced the first television attack ad of the race, accusing Allen of voting in the Senate not to fund lifesaving modern body armor for combat troops. VoteVets.org is not endorsing Webb, just opposing Allen."

Carter Says Lieberman Should Not Be Reelected. Former President Jimmy Carter said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/13), "I think Joe Lieberman is a good man. He's been strongly in favor of the Iraqi war from the very beginning. He was one of the originators of public statements that misled the American people into believing that the Iraqi war was justified. He's been an undeviating supporter of the war from the very beginning and still is. He's joined in with the Republican spokespersons by saying that Democrats who disagree are really supporting terrorism. So for all these reasons I've lost my confidence in Joe Lieberman and don't wish to see him re-elected."

Cardin, Steele Doff Gloves As General Election Campaign Begins. The Baltimore Sun (9/14, Brown, 262K) reports Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "launched their general election campaigns for Maryland's open seat in the U.S. Senate, a contest that already is drawing national attention -- and money." Cardin "came out firing Wednesday, linking Steele with President Bush while invoking what he described as government failures in Iraq and the Gulf Coast." Steele, "speaking later in the day, rejected attempts to link him to the president." Said Steele, "If Congressman Cardin wants to run against George Bush, then he should have run for president." The Sun adds the "tone of the exchange differed markedly from that of the primary races, when Cardin and Mfume had presided over an amicable contest for the Democratic nomination, and Steele faced no serious opposition for the Republican nomination."

The Washington Times (9/14, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports the "general election showdown" will "hinge on racial issues and draw attention from across the country." Cardin is "actively cultivating support among black voters, who make up as much as 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland." Still, "Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the most closely watched campaigns in the country and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties."

Roll Call (9/14, Kurtz, Yehle) reports Steele's "strategy for victory is hardly subtle. Even before the primary, Steele began airing a statewide ad aimed at black voters — an ad that his campaign spokesman said is scheduled to run indefinitely." Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, a Baltimore native, said, "I think Michael Steele has a real ability to win over voters who don't usually vote Republican." Roll Call adds Cardin "starts out as the favorite over Steele. So in a state that is so strongly Democratic, Steele's only path to victory may be doubling — or even tripling — the 10 percent to 12 percent of the black vote that Maryland Republicans generally attract in statewide elections."

Minnesota Democrat Likely To Become First Muslim Elected To Congress. USA Today (9/14, Stone, 2.27M) reports the Minnesota Democrat "who is likely to become the first Muslim elected to Congress says he wants to 'promote the idea that America needs friends around the world, not more enemies.'" Keith Ellison, "an African-American state legislator from Minneapolis, won Tuesday's Democratic primary to replace Rep. Martin Olav Sabo." Ellison "beat three other Democrats, including Sabo's former chief of staff and ex-party chairman, Mike Erlandson." Although Ellison "will face Republican business consultant Alan Fine in November, his election is all but guaranteed, says University of Minnesota political scientist Larry Jacobs." Ellison's victory "marks a turning point for American Muslims, according to community leaders such as Ali Khan of the American Muslim Council." Ellison has "called for an immediate troop withdrawal from Iraq, universal health care and the impeachment of President Bush."

William Schneider said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "It's likely this year will see the first Muslim elected to Congress. He's Keith Ellison who just won the Democratic nomination in Minnesota's Fifth Congressional District. … Ellison regards himself as a staunch progressive in the tradition of Paul Wellstone, his personal hero. Republicans are calling attention to divisive positions Ellison took in the past and his association with Louis Farrakhan's Nation of Islam. … Republicans have little hope of defeating Ellison in a district that voted 71 percent for Democrat John Kerry in the last presidential election. They are trying to use Ellison's past associations to taint Minnesota Democrats as too extreme."

Ellison said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/13), "I haven't put the emphasis on my own personal identity. The emphasis for me is on the people, how to mobilize the people, how to persuade them to vote in their own best interests, how to talk about peace as being the guiding principal of our nation, how to argue that we have to fix this broken health care system that we have. I mean, these are the things that we need to talk about, how we all come together around serious problems that are not being addressed by the Bush administration."

Gingrich Says He'll Decide On 2008 Presidential Race In December 2007. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (9/13) if he is going to run for president in 2008. Gingrich said, "I will decide that in December 2007."

Ann Richards Dies. The Houston Chronicle (9/14, Ratcliffe, Kilday, 535K) reports Ann Richards, "who shed the role of homemaker to rise through Texas politics to become the state's 45th governor and a national celebrity," died yesterday "after a six-month battle with cancer. She was 73. Richards was diagnosed with esophageal cancer in March." Richards "was the quintessential Texas woman, with a sassy homespun charm, sharp wit and tough pioneer spirit. With bright silver hair, a weathered face and an affinity for cobalt blue suits and pearls, Richards was instantly recognizable to national television audiences." Polls "showed Richards was the most personally popular governor in 30 years. But a liberal image kept her job approval rating beneath 50 percent, and she lost her 1994 re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush, the future president."

The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M), Washington Post (9/14, B8, 748K) and Washington Times (9/14, 88K), among other newspapers, run an AP story on Richards' death, reporting the "silver-haired, silver-tongued Richards said she entered politics to help others -- especially women and minorities who were often ignored by Texas' male-dominated establishment." Richards "sealed her partisan reputation with a blast at George H. Bush, a fellow Texan who was vice president at the time: 'Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth.'" The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Kennedy, Silverstein, 918K), in a similar story, also notes the late governor's quip about Bush.

Economists Call For Overhaul Of Unemployment Insurance System. The New York Times (9/14, Eckholm, 1.21M) reports the nation's unemployment insurance system, "which has hardly changed since its inception in 1935, should be revamped to aid more workers displaced by a transforming economy, economists said this week as they released overhaul proposals." Because of "tight state eligibility requirements and because a growing number of workers do not have long-term, full-time jobs, unemployment insurance is paid to just over a third of those who are laid off, government data show, and coverage is less likely among the lower-income workers who most need it." Dr. Lori Kletzer and Howard Rosen of the Institute for International Economics in Washington "are the authors of one of two proposals for revamping the system that were released on Tuesday by the Brookings Institution in Washington." Because of "globalization and changes in the economic structure, more workers are forced to change industries and a significant minority take jobs paying less than before, indicating a trend 'from temporary layoff to permanent displacement,' according to the paper by Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen."

States Allow Tax Deductions For Out Of State 529 Contributions. A growing number of states are allowing residents to take state tax deductions for contributions they make to other states' 529 college savings plans. USA Today (9/14, Chu, 2.27M) reports, "Pennsylvania, Maine and Kansas have approved such tax breaks, and a handful of other states are considering similar measures. … The states' move toward tax parity for all 529 contributions is likely to make it simpler and more appealing for residents to save for their children's college educations. A new law that makes permanent the 529s' federal tax benefits has also helped spark more interest in these plans."

Group Seeks To Increase Number Of Visitors To US Each Year. The Washington Post (9/14, A19, Sarasohn, 748K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "A coalition of high-powered business executives has formed the Discover America Partnership, a multimillion-dollar advocacy campaign designed to boost the number of visitors -- by 10 million a year -- to the United States. Their aim is to help improve America's image abroad and bolster national security by introducing more people from other countries to us." Geoff Freeman, executive director of Discover America, "said the campaign intends to educate lawmakers and other policymakers about the need to attract foreign visitors, and it will work to smooth out visa and airport policies that may discourage travel. But he said the group 'by no means' wants to lessen security standards."

Wal-Mart CEO Seeks To Improve Company's Image. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 7, 4:00, Mason, 7.66M) interviewed Wal-Mart CEO Lee Scott. Asked what responsibility his company has to pay a living wage, Scott said, "I don't know what specifically a living wage is. Average wage is over $10 an hour." Mason: "In the past year, after a study showed nearly half the children of Wal-Mart workers were uninsured or on Medicaid, the company expanded its health care plan, and last month, raised wages 6% at many stores. Implicit isn't that, it, a suggestion you weren't paying enough and your benefits weren't good enough?" Scott: "I guess if you wanted to make that case. I'd prefer to look at it as we have been raising wages and improving benefits for years." Mason: "But the CEO concedes criticism has influenced one sweeping change -- the greening of Wal-Mart. … Scott has committed to cutting Wal-Mart's energy use by 30%, a first step using display cases with light-emitting diodes that give off much less heat. So it's cheaper for you to cool this. … But Wal-Mart's skeptics still doubt the company's commitment. They're suggesting you're just trying to green-wash your image. You're laughing." Scott: "I am. The one thing I have really found at Wal-Mart is trying to be overly sophisticated and manipulative is not our strength." Mason: "But the company that made its name cutting costs is smart enough to know that improving its image could also improve its bottom line."

Will Says Liberals' Campaign Against Wal-Mart Is "Condescension." George Will writes in the Washington Post (9/14, A21, 748K), "The big-hearted progressives on Chicago's City Council, evidently unconcerned that the city gets zero sales tax revenue from a half-billion dollars that Chicago residents spend in the 42 suburban Wal-Marts, have passed a bill that, by dictating wages and benefits, would keep Wal-Marts from locating in the city. Richard Daley, a bread-and-butter Democrat, used his first veto in 17 years as mayor to swat it away." Will adds, "Liberals think their campaign against Wal-Mart is a way of introducing the subject of class into America's political argument, and they are more correct than they understand. Their campaign is liberalism as condescension. It is a philosophic repugnance toward markets, because consumer sovereignty results in the masses making messes."

NYTimes Says More Money Is Needed To Fight Tuberculosis. The New York Times (9/14, 1.21M) editorializes, "Tuberculosis is outrunning us. … Airborne and deadly, extensively drug-resistant TB is a nightmare disease. It has been found worldwide, including in the United States." The Times adds, "A group called the Global Alliance for TB Drug Development has six compounds in the pipeline, but a treatment for extremely resistant TB is not likely before 2012. Money for clinical trials would speed things. … The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation are big donors, but much more is needed. Stinginess created this problem. Generosity is needed to fix it."

Bush, Roh To Downplay Differences Over North Korea In Meeting Today. President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun will meet at the White House today. According to McClatchy (9/14, Douglas), when they meet, the two leaders "will try to downplay the strains between their countries over how to deal with the North Korean nuclear standoff." The Bush Administration "is pushing a hard line in trying to get the strident North Korean government to return to six-party talks designed to halt its nuclear program. South Korea, which has sought to engage North Korea since 1998, is seeking a softer diplomatic approach toward its reclusive communist neighbor." McClatchy adds, "To complicate Thursday's meeting further, it comes amid reports that North Korea is preparing for an underground nuclear test, which some US intelligence officials think may come before the end of the year."

The New York Times (9/14, Sanger, 1.21M) reports that the two leaders "have rarely been further apart on the central issue that long ago turned their relationship so frosty. Mr. Bush is determined to squeeze North Korea with every financial sanction possible until it gives up its nuclear capacity and other illicit activities, or, some believe, until it collapses. Mr. Roh insists the only course is to coax the country out of its isolation." The Times adds that Roh "will receive treatment that contrasts sharply with the warm embrace extended in June to Japan's prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi. Mr. Koizumi got long meetings, a glittering dinner and a trip to Graceland; Mr. Roh, leader of the other major United States ally in Asia, is getting an hour in the Oval Office and a quick lunch."

Roh Says South Korea Will Continue To Support War On Terrorism. The AP (9/14, Klug) reports that Roh said yesterday his country's alliance with US is changing, but Seoul will "continue to support the US-led fight against terrorism. The South Korea-US 'alliance will in part change according to the times,' Roh said through an interpreter. 'But the very fundamental basis of this alliance will not change.'"

South Korea Backs UN Condemnation Of North. The Washington Times (9/14, Sands, 88K) reports , "South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon yesterday said Seoul strongly supports the United Nations' condemnation of North Korea for its recent missile tests, and denied that South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun was trying to play down the missile tests when he described them recently as tests carried out by the communist North for political, not military effect." Ban said the US-South Korean alliance "remained fundamentally healthy and that public opinion in South Korea toward the United States had improved in recent years."

Opposition Leader Says North Still Threatens South's Security. Jin Ha Hwang, chairman of the International Relations Committee of the Grand National Party, South Korea's largest opposition party, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/14, 2.03M), "North Korea is no longer a threat to South Korea. The wartime operational control (OP-CON) of 680,000 Korean troops will be transferred back to South Korea by 2009, and the U.S.-Republic of Korea Combined Forces Command (CFC) will be consequently dismantled. At least that is what the presidents of the U.S. and South Korea think will happen in the next three years. But they would be making a grave mistake. … Even as politics may have changed on the Korean peninsula, the security situation, in terms of the need for deterrence, has not changed one bit. North Korea's asymmetric threats still pose a grave danger to South Korea's security, as well as to countless US economic and political interests." Hwang adds, "The US-ROK Combined Forces Command is a mechanism designed to deter war, and also to fight and win a war should deterrence fail. It is a military structure that has functioned admirably for the benefit of both South Korea and the United States. Should we let it go because of domestic political interests? Who has the last laugh then?"

Solana-Larjani Talks Break Down. The AP (9/14, Jahn) reports EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larjani "abruptly postponed talks on easing tensions over the refusal of the Tehran regime to suspend uranium enrichment." Solana's office "did not say what prompted the decision to downgrade Thursday's meeting in Paris to the level of aides… But the decision of the two principals to stay away from what would have been their third meeting in a week suggested snags had developed from their direct contacts over the weekend." The AP says the "absence" of the two figures "was bound to dampen high expectations for the meeting. Their two sessions in Vienna had been described by both men as making progress toward solving the impasse over Tehran's defiance." The AP continues, "Different interpretations of what was achieved at the weekend talks were reflected earlier in the day. In moderate language, Britain, France and Germany only alluded to the threat of [UNSC] sanctions…and called on the Tehran regime to negotiate the dispute with the international community. The United States, in contrast, said it was time for the council 'to back international diplomacy with sanctions.'" Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his country's nuclear standoff with the West can be solved through dialogue, and called for unspecified 'new conditions' in negotiations."

Rice Says Western Powers Will Meet At General Assembly To Discuss Sanctions. AFP (9/14) reports Secretary Rice said "foreign ministers from the six major powers involved in the nuclear standoff with Iran will meet soon in New York to discuss imposing sanctions." She "will travel to New York next week for talks on the sidelines of the [UN General Assembly meetings next week] and she said this would be the opportunity to press ahead with the sanctions if Iran continues to reject demands it freeze its suspected nuclear weapons program." Speaking after meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Rice "said the way forward for Iran was clear, it can either suspend its uranium enrichment as a prelude to broader negotiations on improving economic and diplomatic ties with the international community, or face new" sanctions resolutions.

IAEA Pans US House Report On Iranian Nuclear Capabilities. The Washington Post (9/14, A17, Linzer, 748K) says IAEA inspectors "angrily complained to the Bush administration and to a Republican congressman yesterday about a recent House committee report on Iran's capabilities, calling parts of the document 'outrageous and dishonest' and offering evidence to refute its central claims." Their letter claims that "the report contained some 'erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated statements.' The letter, signed by a senior director at the [IAEA], was addressed to Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, which issued the report. A copy was hand-delivered to" Ambassador Greg Schulte. The Post continues, "The IAEA openly clashed with the Bush administration on pre-war assessments of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Relations all but collapsed when the agency revealed that the White House had based some allegations about an Iraqi nuclear program on forged documents." The Post says the letter is "the first time the IAEA has publicly disputed U.S. allegations about its Iran investigation. The agency noted five major errors in the committee's 29-page report, which said Iran's nuclear capabilities are more advanced than either the IAEA or U.S. intelligence has shown."

Poor Domestic Refining Capabilities Make Iran Dependent Of Gasoline Imports. USA Today (9/14, Lynch, 2.27M) reports low domestic gasoline prices suggest "an abundance that couldn't be further removed from the grinding reality of Iran's oil industry. From wellhead to gas pump, Iran's fabulously endowed petroleum industry confronts debilitating political and technological headwinds." US sanctions have "starved" Iranian companies of newer technologies, and "pervasive political uncertainty" has discouraged foreign investment, creating a "shortage of domestic refining capacity" that forces Iran to import forty percent of its gasoline. USA Today says "that dependence" leaves Iran "vulnerable" to nuclear-related sanctions, but notes that any reciprocal slowdown in petroleum exports from Iran "could be a catastrophe for the global economy." While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has dismissed the danger," USA Today says "others aren't so sanguine," believing Tehran would risk a confrontation to stem outside interference. In additional, "domestic political jockeying has further complicated Iran's oil field management," with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Parliament having disagreed on who should manage Iran's oil industry. USA Today adds, however, "it's not all bad news. Thanks to high oil prices, government coffers are bulging: Oil export revenue for the 12 months ending in March is expected to total $49.7 billion vs. $19.4 billion four years ago," which the IMF estimates will allow Tehran to pay its $5.8 billion gasoline import bill and maintain "subsidies" on food and fertilizer.

Rice, Livni Skeptical Of Palestinian Unity Government. The Washington Post (9/14, A17, Kessler, 748K) reports Secretary Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni "reacted skeptically yesterday to a proposed unity Palestinian government that would include Hamas, saying the militant group must first renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist before restrictions on international aid can be lifted." The Hamas-led Palestinian Authority "has teetered near collapse since foreign governments largely cut off aid after" Hamas' January election victory. President Mahmoud Abbas "this week reached a deal with Hamas to form a government that would empower him to negotiate with Israel -- in effect sidestepping Hamas' pledge to destroy the Jewish state. The Palestinian cabinet resigned yesterday to clear the way for a new unity government." While some world leaders "greeted the announcement as a possible breakthrough," Rice and Livni "reiterated that the new government must meet conditions that were set by the United States and its allies after the Hamas victory. 'The outcome of the process is not clear,' Rice said. 'It goes without saying that it's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist. It goes without saying that it's hard to have a process for peace if you do not renounce violence.'" Livni "said that Israel is still committed to helping create a Palestinian state on territory occupied by Israel. 'Stagnation is not the Israeli government policy,' she said. But she added that it is up to the Palestinians 'to meet these requirements fully and completely, and we believe that these requirements are not negotiable.'"

The New York Times (9/14, Myre, 1.21M) notes, "Palestinian cabinet members submitted their resignations Wednesday night to allow for the creation of a national unity government that is expected to include a broad range of factions." The Hamas-Fatah government "may not be in place for weeks, and it is not clear whether Western countries will be prepared to restore assistance that was halted when the militant Islamic movement Hamas came to power earlier this year." Abbas "says he plans to dismiss the government formally in the coming days, though he intends to ask Mr. Haniya to form the new government." He also said "that he would send a delegation to the United Nations General Assembly next week in an effort to restart a dialogue with Israel."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Corkery, 2.03M) adds Hamas and Fatah "appear headed for a shotgun wedding that has the potential to breathe life back into a peace process. But tensions being played out in towns and neighborhoods continue to smolder." The Journal says the way in which "conflicts" such as the teachers' strike "are resolved could determine whether the new unity government succeeds or fails, with major implications for Israel and the West." The Journal calls the new government "the first glimmer of progress in the Palestinian situation in months."

The AP (9/14, Gearan) notes US and Israeli "diplomats warned on Wednesday that Palestinian leaders cannot assume their proposed unity government will gain international acceptance unless they renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist." Rice and Livni "responded cautiously to Palestinian efforts to resolve an eight-month political standoff that has frozen foreign aid vital to the Palestinians." Rice is quoted saying Abbas "is someone with whom we can work and with whom we are working," and reiterating, "It's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist." Livni "offered assurances that Israel wants to make headway on the stalled plan to make peace with an eventual independent Palestinian state, despite the disarray in the Palestinian territories since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January."

Economic "Collapse" In Gaza Increasing Poverty, Malnutrition. The New York Times (9/14, Erlanger, 1.21M) details individual Palestinians' efforts to survive "the economic collapse of Gaza" since January. The Palestinian Authority "has paid most of its 73,000 employees here, nearly 40 percent of Gaza's work force, only 1.5 months' salary, resulting in a severe economic depression and growing signs of malnutrition, especially among the poorest children." That "situation has worsened since Palestinian gunmen, including those from Hamas, killed two Israeli soldiers and captured a third on June 25." Many "Gazans now get only 7 to 12 hours a day of electricity, at unpredictable hours, with running water largely dependent on electric pumps," because of an Israeli airstrike on a key power station. UN Undersecretary for Humanitarian Affairs Jan Egeland "said that Gaza was 'a ticking time bomb.'" One UN group "warned Tuesday that the economy could shrink next year to the level of 15 years ago, and unemployment could rise to over 50 percent. The World Bank expects gross domestic product to decline by 27 percent this year."

Israeli Military Seeks Lessons Learned From Hezbollah's "Strategic Victory." USA Today (9/14, For, 2.27M) reports, "Israel's military has ordered a series of investigations to examine why its armed forces were unable to crush Hezbollah militants during a month of fighting in Lebanon." Hezbollah "proved a resilient foe for Israel's vaunted military," and Israeli leaders were "surprised by [their] capabilities." One analyst says the movement "achieved a strategic victory by appearing to stand up to Israel," and its leader Hassan Nasrallah "emerged as a hero in the Arab world." Now, the Israeli military "is studying the conduct of its air force, navy and ground forces to learn from possible mistakes," especially Hezbollah's "success" against Israel's "armored forces" including the Merkava tank. USA Today says Hezbollah was "equipped with Kornet and Metis anti-tank missiles supplied by Iran and Syria. The weapons don't produce a large dust ball — or 'signature' — when fired, making it hard for tank crews to see who is firing at them." More broadly, some analysts believe Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's "decision to send the ground troops into Lebanon came too late into the war." Also, an intelligence expert said "the orders the forces received from their commanders in Israel were confusing, and were sometimes changed on an hourly basis. In some cases, brigades on the ground in Lebanon were told to begin advancing and then as they did they received orders telling them to stop."

Fourth Damascus Embassy Attacker Dies From Wounds. The New York Times (9/14, Smith, 1.21M) reports, "The sole survivor of the four-man team that attacked the American embassy here Tuesday died of his wounds without being questioned." Syrian media said his "death left Syrian authorities with only the physical evidence to piece together the origins and motivations of the attack. The country said all four men were Syrian citizens. It gave no other details and both the Syrian government and the United States embassy [in Damascus] declined to comment on the investigation." Syrian claims that the assailant died before speaking to authorities "appeared to contradict comments from the State Department late Tuesday, which said that the man was cooperating with Syrian authorities." The Times says Damascus "was quick to emphasize its security forces' role in foiling the assault before the attackers could break into the embassy compound. The country appeared eager to use the incident as an opening for improving Syria's already poor relations with the United States." The AP (9/14, Mroue) adds, "The bold attack on the U.S. Embassy has thrown new light on what President Bashar Assad calls the growing threat in Syria from Islamic extremists. But some critics say the regime is exaggerating the problem for its own political gain."

Rebel Commanders May Abandon Darfur Pact. The Washington Post (9/14, A14, Timberg, 748K) reports commanders "from the only rebel group that signed a peace accord in May for Sudan's Darfur region are prepared to resume fighting if African Union peacekeeping troops leave as scheduled at month's end and are not replaced by a United Nations force, according to more than a dozen senior rebel officials interviewed Wednesday. Rebel commanders predicted that such a resumption of combat would spell the end of Darfur's tattered peace agreement and quickly escalate fighting to an intensity not seen since the early days of the conflict in 2003 and 2004."

LATimes Urges Schwarzenegger To Sign Pension Divestment Bill. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, 918K) editorializes, "The goons who run Sudan have proved deaf to appeals from the Western world that they stop slaughtering tribespeople in Darfur. … The best response, short of intervention, is to hit them harder in a place that will really hurt: their wallets. The state of California is poised to do just that. On Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk is a bill patterned on a divestment program approved this year by the University of California. It directs the boards of the two large state retirement funds to identify companies in their investment portfolios that do significant business with the government of Sudan or sell it the weapons used to cut a bloody swath through Darfur. The boards then must notify these companies that they have 90 days to end their involvement with Sudan. If they don't, or fail to respond, the pension funds must divest. … That might be enough to make Khartoum, and the Chinese interests that do business there, stand up and take notice."

Paulson Calls On China To Implement Economic Reforms. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has called on China to implement a range of economic reforms. The AP (9/14, Crutsinger) reports that Paulson "let it be known that the Bush administration would firmly oppose any efforts by Congress to erect trade barriers in response to America's large and growing trade deficit with China, which last year hit a record $202 billion. 'Protectionist policies do not work and the collateral damage from these policies is high,' he said Wednesday in a speech in Treasury's ornate Cash Room. 'We will not heed the siren songs of protectionism and isolationism.'" The AP adds that Paulson "sought to lower expectations that he will achieve any major breakthroughs when he visits Beijing for two days of talks with Chinese officials next week."

The New York Times (9/14, Weisman, 1.21M) reports that Paulson issued "the Administration's toughest warning yet to China on economic issues," saying that Chinese leaders "were imperiling their nation's future by engaging in policies that Americans and others see as unfair."

The Washington Post (9/14, D1, Blustein, 748K) reports that Paulson said Beijing "must take steps to combat piracy of patented products, shift its economy away from dependence on exports and toward greater consumer spending, and open its financial system to foreign competition. As for the currency issue, he called it one of 'several critical, immediate challenges' that China faces."

USA Today (9/14, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that Paulson "gave a forceful defense of the benefits of trade even as he issued a tough warning to China…that it faced 'peril' unless it enacted further economic reforms." USA adds that "in a passage that won quick praise from China's critics, he warned Beijing that keeping its currency virtually fixed in value against the US dollar invites a political backlash." USA also reports, "Much of Paulson's address Wednesday could only have been welcomed by the Chinese, who explain their failure to more quickly adjust currency policy by citing the danger of undermining job growth."

In an interview with the Financial Times (9/14, Guha), Paulson said he wanted "to 'strike a balance' between tackling pressing short-term issues while maintaining a strategic perspective on China's emergence as a leading player in the global economy. 'We have a common interest,' he said, arguing that many of the steps the US wanted China to take were in its own best interest." Paulson added that the US "looked to China to be its 'co-operative partner' in reviving the Doha trade talks. Officials said Mr Paulson would push hard on Doha in meetings with world finance ministers in Singapore later this week."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Solomon, 2.03M) reports that Paulson also expressed concern about China's "energy consumption and its environmental record." Paulson "devoted several minutes to China's 'severe environmental hazards' and the need for that country, along with the US, to reduce dependence on foreign oil from unstable regions. 'China's severe environmental hazards not only are harming the health of its people and ecosystems, they are also harming China's long-term economic potential,' he said, a week before heading to China. 'Economic development without regard for environmental protection is not sustainable.'"

Bombings Fail To Spark Hindu-Muslim Riots In India. The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Sappenfield, 58K) reports that immediately after last week's bombings outside a mosque in Malegaon, India, the city's Muslim leaders gathered to discuss what to do. The Monitor says that before police arrived to investigate the bombings, "the imams had made a choice. They used the loudspeakers of their mosques to spread a blanket of audible calm over the frayed city, imploring patience and forbearance. And for the second time in two months, a bombing apparently designed to ignite Hindu-Muslim riots failed. For a nation whose past has lurched from one riot to another, the response to this summer's bombings in Malegaon and Mumbai (Bombay) is no small shift, suggesting that - at least for the moment - the forces of calm are eclipsing those that would sow chaos."

Blair Criticizes Anti-American "Madness" In Europe. British Prime Minister criticized European leaders for their "anti-American 'madness'" and urged a rethinking of strategy to defeat terrorism. AFP (9/14) reports that in a 37-page document, Blair argued that none of the world's most pressing problems "could be fixed 'or even contemplated' without US involvement." Blair "urged the international community to unite around a shared set of values, tackling climate change and trade justice as well as extremist terrorism in the pamphlet 'A Global Alliance For Global Values' for the Foreign Policy Centre, a Blairite think tank."

Ros-Lehtinen Says US Must Not Waiver In Its Mission To Overcome Fanatics. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, who serves as co-chair of the Congressional United Kingdom Caucus, writes in the Washington Times (9/14, 88K) that that during her administration, former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and President Ronald Reagan "led the free world to vanquish the tyranny of our Cold War enemies. Establishment of the [Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom] in the US is an outstanding occasion to reflect on how together the United States, Britain and our freedom-loving allies defeated a common enemy." In doing so, "we can gain a better understanding of the nature of the threat we face today and the commitment that is necessary in our current struggle against Islamic fascism." Ros-Lehtinen adds, "Lady Thatcher recently said in a statement released during her visit accompanying President Bush and the first lady at the September 11 remembrance ceremony: 'That heinous attack on America was an attack on us all.' … We must be encouraged by and continue to learn from the successes with which we have collaboratively thwarted events like the foiled air plot, and must not waiver in our collective mission to overcome the fanatics. Our very survival depends on it."

Wolfowitz's Anti-Corruption Drive Sparks Backlash At World Bank. World Bank President Paul Wolfowtiz has made the fight against corruption in poor countries a hallmark issue during the first 15 months of his presidency. The New York Times (9/14, Weisman, 1.21M) reports that Wolfowitz has waged "an aggressive campaign that has led to the suspension of hundreds of millions of dollars in loans and contracts to nations including India, Chad, Kenya, Congo, Ethiopia and Bangladesh." The Times adds, "In recent months, however, his campaign has run into a host of critics, both at the bank and among financial officials outside the United States, who say that developing countries are being threatened with arbitrary punishment in a way that jeopardizes the bank's longtime mission to reduce poverty. Few here at the World Bank dispute the idea that corruption is a serious problem, but the rift over Mr. Wolfowitz's approach has grown deep and bitter, according to more than a dozen bank officials interviewed recently. The backlash at the bank against Mr. Wolfowitz's approach centers not on his intentions or goals, but on a widespread fear that countries will be categorized in the future as corrupt or not corrupt, and that lending will be shut off in a selective way."

Philanthropists Pledge $250 Million to Fight Poverty In Africa. ABC World News (9/13, story 8, 2:35, Gibson) reported, "Three philanthropists announced some extraordinary gifts today to fight extreme poverty in Africa. The Rockefeller and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundations pledged $150 million to improve farming. And George Soros has pledged $100 million to help Africa's most-desperate communities. What is so striking is how much the money can do and how far it can go."

Kondracke Says Rice, Hughes Making Headway In Fight For Overseas Opinion. In his column in Roll Call (9/14), Morton Kondracke says Clinton Administration perceptions of "ideological struggle" as "passé" led to the "folding" of the United States Information Agency into the State Department, "where public diplomacy was a backwater." However, a "spirit" of public diplomacy "is back in the person of Karen Hughes." Critics "are laughing at the idea of a presidential crony, an alleged foreign policy naïf, trying to combat an international adversary with images — in this case, fighting terrorists by visiting with Muslim women and getting the president to talk respectfully about Islam." Hughes "has the president's ear. She has energy. She understands that what people overseas think is a vital part of foreign policy. She's TV-savvy, and she's launched a stream of initiatives designed to improve America's position in what Bush calls 'the great ideological struggle of the 21st century.'" Kondracke notes, "In a controversial move within the administration, Hughes and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice seem to have persuaded Bush -- temporarily, at least -- to drop the label 'Islamic-fascism' from his speeches; diplomats say that Muslims hear it as an attack on their religion, thereby validating the extremists' false charge that the U.S. is at war with Islam." He says she "is serving as the nation's top propagandist at a time when enemy ideology is ascendant in the world." When Kondracke "asked Hughes whether she thought the US was losing the ideological war, she said, 'I'm an optimistic person. I think we have a long way to go. We have a lot more to do.'"

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House, Senators Bicker Over How To Try Terror Suspects (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush and trio of influential Republican senators appeared headed for a showdown Thursday as they suspended talks on legislation outlining how to try suspected terrorists.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., announced that his panel will meet behind closed doors Thursday to consider legislation that he's sponsoring along with Sens. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and John McCain, R-Ariz. It is opposed by the White House and favored by most Senate Democrats.

Their bill aims to set new rules for military commissions that try detainees; the Bush administration's current approach was invalidated by a June Supreme Court ruling. The administration prefers a competing proposal much like the one the court struck down that's moving through the House of Representatives and is supported by some Senate Republicans.

The biggest point in dispute centers on how to meet U.S. obligations for humane treatment of detainees under the international Geneva Conventions, so that military personnel and intelligence agents who handle detainees will not face potential prosecution for war crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0062768

The administration version would give near-blanket legal protection to U.S. officials. The senators insist on setting specific standards governing treatment of detainees to make U.S. law consistent with international law governing treatment of prisoners.

The senators say that the White House proposal gives the impression that the United States is retreating from its treaty commitments, gives the CIA too broad an immunity and sends a message to other nations at war that they can make their own rules.

At an afternoon news conference with Warner and McCain, Graham denounced the White House version in no uncertain terms.

"This whole thing has been just one mess after another," he said. "It started with Abu Ghraib. How many more times do we need to create legislation that's defective, that's going to confuse people, that's got not a snowball's chance in hell of passing Supreme Court muster?" said Graham, a military lawyer.

"Now are we going to start being the first country in the world that changes the Geneva Conventions so the secret police programs of those nations will be OK? I mean, look how that would unravel.

"Every senator and congressman should understand, this is not about November 2006, this is not about your reelection. It's about those who take risks to defend America," said Graham.

Two hours later, in an unusual move that signaled the high stakes at play, intelligence czar John Negroponte held an evening telephone conference call with invited reporters, saying that the senators' legislation would bring his operation to its knees.

"This will not allow for the CIA's high-value terrorist detention program . . . to go forward," Negroponte said. While President Bush said earlier this month that all captives held under the program have been transferred to military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, he also made clear that his administration believes the CIA detainee program is essential to the war on terror and they want license to continue it.

He said the senators' bill fails to clarify U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which he said have vague standards about "cruel, inhumane or degrading" treatment of detainees in U.S. custody.

"Regrettably, the draft legislation that is before the Senate Armed Services Committee at the moment doesn't offer the kind of clarity and clarification that we believe is necessary with regard to these international obligations of ours," Negroponte said.

A senior intelligence official speaking on condition of anonymity said the Bush administration is concerned about protecting CIA interrogators from criminal or civil lawsuits.

"You're putting an additional burden on these people who should be worried about getting critical intelligence to protect America," the official said.

The developments Wednesday followed days of unsuccessful efforts to find middle ground, although both sides have said they thought compromises were within reach on terms of sharing evidence with the accused and on admissibility of hearsay evidence before military tribunals, two early sticking points. Last week top military lawyers, breaking with the administration, said it was imperative defendants hear evidence brought against them.

Warner said he still hopes an agreement can be reached.

Panel In Senate Backs Bush Plan For Eavesdropping (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — The White House took a critical step on Wednesday in its effort to get Congressional blessing for President Bush's domestic eavesdropping program, but it ran into increasingly fierce resistance from leading Republicans over its plan to try terror suspects being held in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The mixed results signaled the tough road the White House faces in trying to sell the two key planks in its national security agenda to sometimes skeptical Congressional Republicans less than two months before the midterm elections.

Democrats have allowed Republicans to fight among themselves over the issues, and appear willing to allow the issues to come to a vote rather than risk charges of political obstructionism in an election season.

DOJ_NMG_0062769

The White House has turned its focus to Capitol Hill as part of a broad push to shift the public debate toward national security and away from Iraq. After kicking off the campaign in a series of recent speeches, Mr. Bush is scheduled to visit Capitol Hill on Thursday morning to rally support for his proposals.

On the domestic eavesdropping program, strong White House lobbying began to pay dividends on Wednesday as the Senate Judiciary Committee approved on a party-line vote two legislative approaches favored by the White House, along with a third the Bush administration opposes. The program would allow the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without a warrant on the international phone calls and e-mail of people in the United States.

But negotiations between Capitol Hill and the White House broke down as three Republican senators crucial to passage of the legislation hardened their stance against a White House plan that would reinterpret a main provision of the Geneva Conventions.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said the committee would vote Thursday in a closed session on an alternative that he and his two chief allies — Senators Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona — have championed, even if the White House refuses to go along with them. The senators have said changes to the American interpretation of the provision of the Geneva Conventions, known as Common Article 3, would undermine the nation's international credibility and open the way for other countries to treat captured American troops at their whim.

"This is not about November 2006. It is not about your election. It is about those who take risks to defend America," Mr. Graham said.

The administration pushed back, convening a conference call in which John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, described the Senate alternative as unacceptable. Mr. Negroponte said the plan would impose intolerable limits on any interrogation methods American intelligence officers might use against future terror suspects held by the Central Intelligence Agency in secret overseas prisons.

Dan Bartlett, a senior aide to Mr. Bush, said the dispute with the Senate Republicans "may require us to go our different ways for now and try to come back in conference."

The House appears on track to endorse the White House proposal, with the House Armed Services Committee voting overwhelmingly on Wednesday in favor of a bill that looks much like the president's.

The White House political strategy in the past week has been twofold: first, putting Mr. Bush in the public spotlight with a string of national security speeches, and now, trying to put Democrats in a box by forcing them to take a stand and vote on Mr. Bush's authority to run two of his most controversial antiterror programs.

But Senators Warner, McCain and Graham appeared to be providing cover for the Democrats, allowing them to stay on the sidelines while the three senators, respected Republicans with distinguished military records, take on the White House.

"We think that this is a sincere effort, based on principle, by Senators Warner, McCain and Graham, to come up with the best legislation they can," said Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island and a member of the Armed Services Committee.

Asked whether Democrats were worried that the Republicans might yield to the White House, Mr. Reed said: "I haven't seen any evidence of that yet. What I've seen is that they're approaching this looking at the substance, not just over weeks and months, but what's in the best interests of the United States, what's in the best interests of American military personnel who might years from now be held."

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, has been pushing the administration's point of view, and Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, has said he may bring the president's legislation to the floor, rather than the one backed by the three senators.

Mr. Warner and his allies have warned that if that happens, they will introduce amendments to make the president's legislation look like theirs. The senators have military leaders on their side, and in a letter sent to the Armed Services Committee on Thursday, 27 retired military leaders urged Congress to reject the White House proposal to reinterpret the definition of Common Article 3.

The letter said the proposal "poses a grave threat to American service members, now and in future wars," noting that American troops are now deployed in areas where the article is their only source of protection if they are captured.

"If degradation, humiliation, physical and mental brutalization of prisoners is decriminalized or considered permissible under a restrictive interpretation of Common Article 3,'' the letter warned, "we will forfeit all credible objections should such barbaric practices be inflicted upon American prisoners."

The administration had also faced resistance over the N.S.A. wiretapping program. The Democrats had bottled up the administration's proposals, saying Congress was being forced to legislate "in the dark" about a secret program that few members had been briefed on. They have repeatedly used procedural maneuvers to block the proposals from coming to a vote in the Judiciary Committee, drawing accusations of obstructionism from Republicans.

But Democrats, who appeared to realize the risk of being accused of thwarting debate on national security matters, did not stand in the way of the committee vote on Wednesday.

With Republicans united in support, the panel approved on a 10-to-8 vote a hotly debated plan drawn in negotiations with the White House by Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the committee chairman. The plan would allow a secret court to rule on the constitutionality of the wiretapping program. It would also implicitly recognize the president's constitutional authority to gather foreign intelligence, a concession Democrats and civil rights advocates contend would expand the president's authority to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant.

The panel also approved a proposal by Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, that would require the administration to notify Congress when it conducted wiretaps without a warrant.

Democrats claimed a partial victory on the wiretapping issue when they won Judiciary Committee approval of another measure that could effectively ban the security agency's eavesdropping program.

That plan, drafted by Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, would affirm that the foreign intelligence law passed by Congress in 1978, requiring court approval for eavesdropping, as the "exclusive" means of authorizing wiretaps in the United States against suspected terrorists and spies.

Democrats succeeded in getting two Republican moderates, Mr. Specter and Mr. Graham, both of whom had voiced concerns over the legal aspects of the wiretapping program, to vote in favor of the proposal and send it to the full Senate.

That set the stage for the unusual spectacle of the Judiciary Committee — and its chairman — supporting two proposals that many lawmakers said would effectively nullify each other if passed.

Negotiations On Terror Bill Snag (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 13, 2006

The White House and three powerful GOP senators reached an impasse Wednesday over a Bush administration plan to allow tough CIA interrogations, underscoring election-season divisions among Republicans on the high profile issue of security.

In a direct challenge to President Bush, Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said his panel would meet Thursday to finalize an alternative to the White House plan to prosecute terror suspects and redefine acts that constitute war crimes. Warner, R-Va., said the administration proposal would lower the standard for the treatment of prisoners, potentially putting U.S. troops at risk should other countries retaliate.

The White House said Warner's proposal would undermine the nation's ability to interrogate prisoners and arranged an extraordinary conference call with reporters in which the nation's top intelligence official criticized Warner's plan.

"If this draft legislation were passed in its present form, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency has told me that he did not believe that the (interrogation) program could go forward," National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said.

GOP In Standoff On Gitmo Rights (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Senate Republicans appear hopelessly deadlocked over President Bush's proposal for handling terrorism suspects detained at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Three Republicans -- Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- remain holed up with Democrats, who are adamant that the prisoners be given broader civil rights than are included in the administration's proposed bill. Most Senate Republicans support the administration's view that the requested changes would limit intelligence gathering and expose classified information to terrorists.

The Senate Armed Services Committee, which is chaired by Mr. Warner and includes Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham, will take up the bill behind closed doors today and likely make the modifications that Mr. Bush and other Republicans find unacceptable.

Late yesterday, White House officials began calling Republicans on Capitol Hill to say that they have offered to negotiate about as far as they can. The White House is expected to issue some sort of official statement sometime today on where it stands.

If the committee alters the original bill today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is expected to bypass the committee and introduce the administration's proposed bill in the coming days and move it directly to the floor. There, amendments will be offered and public votes recorded.

In addition to advancing their campaign against terrorism, Republicans had expected the legislation to create political headaches for Democrats, who could be tarred in the final 7½ weeks before November's elections as soft on terrorism for wanting to grant terror suspects greater civil rights. But Mr. Warner, Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham have muddied the issue, and Democrats have largely stayed out of the fight.

The trio also has aided Democrats in another of the year's biggest political fights, over illegal immigration.

But for a handful of Republicans -- led by Mr. McCain and including Mr. Warner and Mr. Graham -- the Republican Congress would likely have long ago approved tough border-security legislation over the objections of most Democrats. This would have been a tremendous boon to Republicans since illegal immigration has proved to be among their most effective campaign issues.

Instead, the Republican Senate approved a bill that would create a path to citizenship for some 10 million illegal aliens and authorize hundreds of thousands of new foreign laborers through a new guest-worker program. The Republican House, meanwhile, has approved tough border-security legislation. And since neither side has budged, the Republican-controlled Congress has failed to enact tough legislation against illegal immigration.

Senators To Challenge Bush Plan For Terror Trials (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And David Jackson

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A trio of influential Republican senators today plans to challenge President Bush's proposal to put terror suspects on trial, a day after a House panel approved the administrative initiative.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said Wednesday his panel will consider legislation to provide more legal rights for detainees than the White House proposal. He and his allies contend that denying those rights will put U.S. troops at risk if they are captured overseas and diminish the nation's moral authority.

“I have lost friends in this war. I do want to bring these people to justice,” Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., told USA TODAY and Gannett News Service reporters. “But I can't say it enough. If we start acting like our enemy, we're going to lose.”

Warner's announcement that his panel would begin drafting a rival bill came after marathon talks between the GOP senators and the White House produced no deal. Warner said he still hopes to avoid a confrontation on the Senate floor. “I still think we can work it through,” he said. “I do not think negotiations have broken down.”

The senator's decision to go forward puts the president at odds with key members of his party. They are Warner, a former Navy secretary; Graham, a military lawyer and Air Force reservist; and Sen. John McCain, an ex-naval aviator who spent nearly six years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam.

The House Armed Services Committee approved Bush's plan Wednesday and rejected a proposal similar to Warner's on a party-line vote. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has scheduled a House vote for next week.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino expressed hope that “we'll be able to reach resolution” with Bush's Senate critics.

At issue is the timing and procedure for trials of terror suspects, including 14 “high-value” detainees such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind behind the 9/11 attacks. Mohammed and other 9/11 suspects are being held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Bush confirmed last week that they had been interrogated by the CIA at secret prisons.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that an earlier administration plan did not give defendants the legal protections required by the U.S. military code and international law.

The three “problem areas,” Graham said, are proposals to deny defendants' access to classified information, a proposal that would permit the use of evidence obtained through coercion or other methods, and setting rules for CIA interrogations consistent with international law.

Graham and other critics said the Bush plan would weaken international treaties protecting the rights of military prisoners. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte said the senators' plan would prevent the CIA from interrogating terror suspects.

The debate is dividing Republicans. “The American people are not going to provide terrorists with the same kinds of access to justice that American citizens are provided,” Boehner said.

Graham argued Bush's plan would send a defendant to death row with the declaration, “we can't tell you what you did, but trust us, it was bad.”

Senate-Panel Republicans Break With Bush Over A Tribunal Bill (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Breaking with the White House, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner will move ahead with military-tribunal legislation that denies President Bush's request to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

The director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, said the proposal would force the Central Intelligence Agency to halt its "high value" detainee program focused on collecting intelligence from captured al Qaeda leaders. But Mr. Warner predicted his panel will report the bill today, posing a serious challenge to Mr. Bush's pre-election national-security agenda.

The action came as the House Armed Services Committee voted to approve a tribunal bill more to the liking of the CIA. But on a second front, warrantless wiretapping, the administration faced difficulties in both chambers. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.) abruptly postponed a markup until next week; the Senate Judiciary Committee approved not just a Bush-backed bill, but two separate and sometimes contradictory, proposals.

Mr. Bush comes to Capitol Hill today to meet with Republicans on his agenda, and a new Wall Street Journal/NBC poll suggests his rhetoric has succeeded in lifting voters' preference for Republicans over Democrats on handling terrorism. (See the story1.) But having raised the bar, his party must now deliver legislation or risk the perception that, as with a proposed overhaul of immigration laws, it isn't effective in power.

The dispute over military tribunals follows the Supreme Court's June ruling striking down Bush administration rules to prosecute suspected terrorists without granting them traditional rights found in courts-martial. The court said the tribunals violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and Geneva Conventions, and lawmakers are clearly troubled by what exemptions they should permit, now that the White House has come to Congress asking for the legal authority to proceed.

Chairman Warner, supported by Sens. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), said it was crucial to avoid a second adverse court ruling that would hurt the "credibility of this country." He has begun to reach out to the State Department in an apparent effort to soften the opposition from CIA Director Michael Hayden. And Mr. Graham said Congress must view the legislation as "a chance to start over and reassert ourselves as a rule-of-law nation in the eyes of the world."

Mr. Negroponte said the administration's only goal was to clarify U.S. obligations under the Geneva prisoner-protection accords. Mr. Graham said the language sought by the White House "goes too far" and would be seen by other countries as "reneging" on treaty obligations and thereby endangering U.S. personnel who may be held prisoner overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0062773

"If they prevail, we could end up with a decent bill," said Senate Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois, who is sympathetic with Mr. Warner and his Republican allies. But Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) is sure to use his floor powers to make passage harder -- and potentially meld the tribunal issue with a grant of broad wiretapping authority.

That would put Senate Democrats back in an awkward spot, forced to either filibuster or accept the package to avoid political blame before the election. "There's our Faustian choice," Mr. Durbin says.

But for Republicans, too, the warrantless-wiretapping issue is thorny, as seen yesterday in the House. Responding to the White House, Rep. Heather Wilson (R., N.M.), a chief sponsor, said she was prepared to give the administration more latitude to carry out wiretaps if there should be a threat of "imminent attack." But yesterday, it was the more libertarian conservatives on the Judiciary Committee who were most restless, saying the bill already goes too far.

"You have to have a balance here," Ms. Wilson said. "You can't just say the executive will take care of us. You have to set what the parameters are."

Warrantless Wiretapping Bill Stalls In House (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Judiciary Committee, with one eye on the midterm elections, abruptly canceled a session today to enact a bill giving President Bush board authority for his warrantless domestic wiretapping program — even as Republicans in the Senate pushed a similar eavesdropping bill toward a vote on the floor.

Bush plans a personal and rare visit to the Hill on Thursday to confer with House Republicans, who are feeling political pressure to distance themselves from an unpopular president and an unpopular war in Iraq.

Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), one of the GOP incumbents facing stiff opposition from an antiwar challenger, is sponsoring a bill that would require the president to wait until an attack has occurred to initiate wiretapping without warrants — a provision the Bush administration argues would hamper the government's ability to thwart terrorist attacks.

The argument between the president and his beleaguered fellow Republicans in the House comes less than two months before the midterm elections, when many observers believe that Democrats have a chance to topple House Republicans from power for the first time in 12 years.

"We need to use our intelligence tools to listen to our enemies," said Wilson, whose bill has been endorsed by House GOP leaders. "We also need to make sure checks are in place to prevent those tools from being used inappropriately against Americans."

With politicians in both parties eager not to appear to be giving the president a blank check, behind-the-scenes negotiations remain intense.

In the Senate Judiciary Committee today, several amendments were offered to curb a president's powers, including a one-year expiration date on the bill and a demand that the National Security Agency report more often to Congress on how and why it selects domestic surveillance targets.

The White House argues that warrantless wiretaps are needed to stay one step ahead of terrorists, who have become more sophisticated about using disposable cellphones and other technologies that defy detection.

"If Al Qaeda is calling somebody in America, we need to know why, in order to stop attacks," Bush said in a speech this week.

But administration officials parading to the Hill this week have encountered resistance from politically vulnerable Republicans under pressure from war-weary voters to put limits on domestic surveillance without court warrants.

"It is popular to have bills that are not White House bills," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee that today passed a version of the president's proposal without amendments.

Reflecting how members are hedging their bets, the Judiciary Committee approved three FISA-related bills, including the one that Specter worked out with the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0062774

A competing bill sponsored by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) — and also sponsored by Specter — was endorsed by the committee. It would largely keep the 1978 law creating the FISA court intact, but give the administration more time to prepare emergency warrants.

"We just don't want to see Americans' rights abused for the next 50 or 60 years because of an oversight on our part," Feinstein said.

The bills are expected to come to the Senate floor next week.

A Self-Inflicted Defeat (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

President Bush did a public service last week by finally explaining the importance of interrogation as an intelligence tool against terrorists. But we also wish he would have been more candid with Americans about the restrictions that have been put on interrogating even the very worst terrorists.

A major reason is an amendment pushed through Congress last year by John McCain. The Senator's amendment, which Mr. Bush agreed to over Vice President Dick Cheney's objections, established the Army Field Manual as the first and last word on Defense Department interrogations; it also banned "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment." We appreciate Mr. McCain's moral authority on the subject, and this policy may sound innocuous.

But it was based on false premises amid the firestorm over Abu Ghraib, and it may well harm our ability to break the next Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. The central falsehood was the assertion that detainee abuses at Abu Ghraib resulted from "confusion" about the rules of interrogation -- never mind that nine courts martial and multiple investigations found the abuses weren't related to interrogations at all.

Equally erroneous was the suggestion that internal Administration debates on handling high-level al Qaeda detainees like KSM contributed to the alleged confusion. The idea, apparently, was that U.S. officials and commanders were too dense to distinguish -- as the Geneva Conventions do -- between legitimate prisoners of war (who may not be aggressively interrogated) and unlawful combatants (who can be). So the only way to prevent "torture" was to establish uniform rules for all. * * *

A year later we're sorry to report that the McCain Amendment is creating obstacles to getting actionable intelligence via interrogation. The Army has released a new version of its Field Manual, which is available on the Internet for all to see. And the Manual makes it plain that Iraqi and Afghan insurgents can expect gentler treatment than common criminals get from American police.

In only one respect does the Field Manual recognize any difference between lawful and unlawful combatants: The latter may be separated from their compatriots. Otherwise, terrorists who have violated the rules of war by targeting civilians and fighting out of uniform are to be treated exactly like POWs and considered honorable fighters who have a right to keep their secrets.

So Iraqi and Afghan insurgents won't even face the prospect of your average good cop/bad cop routine. The manual allows for a watered down version called "Mutt and Jeff" in which interrogators can affect different personalities. But the Manual admonishes strongly that the intelligence "collector must be extremely careful that he does not threaten or coerce a source. Conveying a threat may be a violation of the UCMJ [Uniform Code of Military Justice]." We kid you not. "Mutt and Jeff" is the worst that Abu Musab al Zarqawi could have expected from the Pentagon had he been captured alive.

And what if he had been turned over to the CIA? The permissible methods for the spy agency remain classified, and on a visit to our offices last week Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would say only that the CIA would engage in no conduct that "shocks the conscience." He added that this concept was context-dependent, since the "shock" threshold may be higher with the likes of KSM -- who planned 9/11 -- than for ordinary detainees. At least we hope it is.

In theory, this means there's still room to employ some of the aggressive techniques -- such as stress positions, sleep deprivation, temperature extremes -- that have been used successfully against al Qaeda bigwigs. But in practice we fear those approaches are a thing of the past. Reports that CIA interrogators have been buying legal insurance in the expectation of future prosecution are another way of saying that they will no longer use aggressive methods that could be second-guessed on Capitol Hill. (See John Kerry's revealing letter nearby.)

DOJ_NMG_0062775

Like any careful bureaucracy, the CIA will also now be asking for constant legal guidance from the Justice Department. Few Justice attorneys will be eager to offer robust advice after watching a fine lawyer like John Yoo run out of polite society for authoring the so-called "torture memos" that allowed us to break KSM.

All of this has to be counted a severe setback for the war effort if Mr. Bush is right that interrogations have played a key role in the antiterror fight and that "tough" methods are sometimes necessary. Last year ABC news reported that 11 top al Qaeda figures broke only after "waterboarding," which induces a feeling of suffocation and is the most controversial of the known techniques employed.

There's a legitimate debate to be had over waterboarding and other tactics. But part of our problem with the McCain Amendment was that Congressmen refused to engage in an honest debate lest they be accused of approving "torture," which no one sanctions but is a word used to slur anyone who wants aggressive interrogation.

The result was legislation that may have made everyone feel better after Abu Ghraib, but that also probably undermines our ability to get vital information from the next KSM we capture. That ability will be further damaged if the Administration's interrogation flexibility is again limited during current negotiations on Capitol Hill over the treatment of detainees. We hope the next "9/11" commission doesn't have to explain why the U.S. stopped employing interrogation methods that were both lawful and successful.

A Crucial Choice (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The Senate must decide whether to ratify the president's abuse of human rights law -- or restore decency.

IN DECIDING BETWEEN the two main proposals for handling and trying accused terrorists, the Senate confronts a fateful choice: Will it send President Bush, as he demands, legislation that would authorize the CIA to engage in interrogation tactics the world understands as torture, rewrite America's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, and authorize trials whose fairness many people at home and abroad will question? Or will the Senate approve a bill that ensures justice for foreign detainees and ends the CIA's secret detentions and harsh interrogations? The White House is pulling out all the stops to get the former. The question now is whether the group of Republicans who have courageously pushed a competing bill -- John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John W. Warner (Va.) -- will be able to team up with other moderate Republicans and Democrats to stop the excesses that have so damaged America's standing in the world.

The senators' latest draft has changed a bit over the past several days -- in some respects for the better, in one big respect for the worse. It now includes a provision stripping the federal courts of jurisdiction over lawsuits -- including pending suits -- involving detainees. This is a bad measure that would reduce badly needed oversight and judicial review of detentions and trials. But any backsliding in the Senate bill pales in comparison with what Mr. Bush is seeking. The Senate's bill would still require compliance with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions -- which prohibits cruel and degrading treatment of detainees and, as the administration has acknowledged, cannot be reconciled with holding inmates in secret prisons and interrogating them using techniques that cause severe pain or extreme fear and humiliation. The senators would also require military trials to proceed under rules that preserve rights democracies have recognized for centuries -- such as the ability of defendants to be present at trial and to know and confront the evidence against them.

By contrast, the administration is still seeking a bill that would define Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions in such a way as to permit the CIA to continue abusive practices that in the past have included induced hypothermia and "waterboarding," or simulated drowning. The administration bill would also authorize commission trials in which the defendant, under certain circumstances, might not see evidence on which his life may depend and could be convicted by statements extracted in highly coercive interrogations.

It is essential that this not pass. For Congress to "interpret" the Geneva Conventions in such a way as to authorize something they clearly forbid would be to invite other countries to do the same -- to American troops. To authorize trials that needlessly depart from international norms will only invite skepticism about the convictions they deliver, further degrade the United States in the eyes of the world, and make martyrs of those condemned to prison or death. Cooperation with allies, vital to stopping future terrorist attacks, will be seriously impeded.

DOJ_NMG_0062776

Having finally been forced by the Supreme Court to take responsibility for writing law to govern the war on terrorism, Congress will now decide whether it simply means to sign off on the administration's past abuses, or reaffirm fundamental American values.

The Stranger In The Mirror (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

We had elections in New York and around the country on Tuesday. But it seems to me that the biggest issue of our time is getting very short shrift from the politicians, and that's the fact that the very character of the United States is changing, and not for the better.

One of the things that stands out in my mind amid the memories of the carnage and chaos of Sept. 11, 2001, is the eerie quiet — an almost prayerful quiet — that hovered over a scene on the western edge of Manhattan that afternoon.

I stood for a long time outside the triage center that had been set up at the Chelsea Piers sports and entertainment complex. Sunlight glistened off the roofs of ambulances lined up in military fashion on the West Side Highway. Doctors, nurses and other medical personnel were standing by, waiting for what they thought would be the arrival of legions of seriously wounded victims in need of emergency care.

There seemed to be very little talking. As I recall, most of the people maintained a kind of stunned, awed silence.

The expected onslaught of victims never came. As the afternoon faded, I headed east, along with others, toward the morgue at Bellevue Hospital.

What I thought was the greatest expression of the American character in my lifetime occurred in the immediate aftermath of those catastrophic attacks. The country came together in the kind of resolute unity that I imagined was similar to the feeling most Americans felt after Pearl Harbor. We soon knew who the enemy was, and there was remarkable agreement on what needed to be done. Americans were united and the world was with us.

For a brief moment.

The invasion of Iraq marked the beginning of the change in the American character. During the Cuban missile crisis, when the hawks were hot for bombing — or an invasion — Robert Kennedy counseled against a U.S. first strike. That's not something the U.S. would do, he said.

Fast-forward 40 years or so and not only does the U.S. launch an unprovoked invasion and occupation of a small nation — Iraq — but it does so in response to an attack inside the U.S. that the small nation had nothing to do with.

Who are we?

Another example: There was a time, I thought, when there was general agreement among Americans that torture was beyond the pale. But when people are frightened enough, nothing is beyond the pale. And we're in an era in which the highest leaders in the land stoke — rather than attempt to allay — the fears of ordinary citizens. Islamic terrorists are equated with Nazi Germany. We're told that we're in a clash of civilizations.

If, as President Bush says, we're engaged in "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century," why isn't the entire nation mobilizing to meet this dire threat?

The president put us on this path away from the better angels of our nature, and he has shown no inclination to turn back. Lately he has touted legislation to try terror suspects in a way that would make a mockery of the American ideals of justice and fairness. To get a sense of just how far out the administration's approach has been, consider the comments of Brig. Gen. James Walker, the top uniformed lawyer for the Marines. Speaking at a Congressional hearing last week, he said no civilized country denies defendants the right to see the evidence against them. The United States, he said, "should not be the first."

And Senator Lindsey Graham, a conservative South Carolina Republican who is a former military judge, said, "It would be unacceptable, legally, in my opinion, to give someone the death penalty in a trial where they never heard the evidence against them."

How weird is it that this possibility could even be considered?

DOJ_NMG_0062777

The character of the U.S. has changed. We're in danger of being completely ruled by fear. Most Americans have not shared the burden of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Very few Americans are aware, as the Center for Constitutional Rights tells us, that of the hundreds of men held by the U.S. in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, many "have never been charged and will never be charged because there is no evidence justifying their detention."

Even fewer care.

We could benefit from looking in a mirror, and absorbing the shock of not recognizing what we've become.

GOP Leaders Back Bush On Wiretapping, Tribunals (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Congress's Republican leadership yesterday threw its weight behind two of President Bush's most controversial national security programs, warrantless wiretapping and extrajudicial military tribunals.

But the party leaders are having trouble getting all their members on board, including the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. And by backing the president's legislative demands, the leadership risks being labeled by Democrats as a rubber stamp for an unpopular president.

With prodding from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10 to 8 along party lines to approve a bill negotiated with the White House to allow -- but not require -- Bush to submit the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program to a secret court for constitutional review.

That bill, which could come before the Senate next week, is considered by many to be a ratification of the administration's current surveillance program, which monitors the overseas phone calls and e-mails of some Americans when one party is suspected of links to terrorism. The program has been attacked by Democrats and civil liberties advocates as an excessive encroachment on Americans' privacy.

"The committee took the important step of acknowledging the president's constitutional authority to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), an ardent Bush ally.

At the same time, the House Armed Services Committee voted 52 to 8 to ratify the White House's version of legislation creating military commissions for trying terrorism suspects. The measure would give Bush the authority he seeks to withhold classified evidence from defendants, admit testimony that defendants might maintain was coerced, and protect U.S. intelligence agents from legal action over their interrogation methods. House Republican leaders plan to bring the tribunal bill to a vote next week.

Committee action and the scheduling of floor time represented tangible progress for the administration and turned what had been essentially a heated policy debate into a legislative showdown. But if GOP leaders intended to use the bills to distinguish Republicans from Democrats on the conduct of the fight against terrorism, they had their share of problems.

Frist and other GOP leaders remain at odds with many of their rank-and-file members over their military commission bill.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) are holding firm against the White House and Frist in their support of an alternative tribunal bill that would limit the use of classified evidence and coerced testimony in terrorism prosecutions while maintaining broader protections for detainees against cruel and inhumane treatment. They said they will press ahead with their bill, despite the political sensitivity of the controversy in a key election year.

"Every senator and congressman should understand this is not about November 2006. This is not about your reelection," Graham said. "This is about those who take risks to defend America."

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, in an unusual conference call with reporters yesterday evening to express opposition to the dissident Senate bill, said the CIA had told him that, if that bill passes, the agency will not be able to continue its "high-value terrorist detention program."

The existence of that program, known unofficially as the CIA's secret prison system, was confirmed last week by Bush, but all its prisoners were transferred to military custody. Negroponte said that under the Senate's proposed rules, the program's effectiveness would be so curtailed that continuing it would not make sense.

McCain expressed bewilderment at an administration stand that he said would tamper with interpretations of the Geneva Conventions on the conduct of war. That stand is firmly opposed by top military lawyers. "The overwhelming majority of retired military people are weighing in on this issue and saying, 'Don't amend Common Article 3 [of the Geneva Conventions] because then you are allowing other nations' " to conclude that they, too, can change the conventions, McCain said.

McCain and his allies were unable to persuade White House negotiators to agree that an alleged enemy combatant could not be convicted on the basis of classified information that is not shared in some form with the defendant. "We're still gridlocked on that," McCain said. "They want to turn 200 years of criminal procedure on its head."

In the House, the Judiciary Committee was forced to scrap a planned drafting of a warrantless surveillance bill, in part because nearly half a dozen Republican conservatives were in open rebellion against GOP leaders' efforts to weaken controls on the eavesdropping program.

"There are enough Republicans with concerns," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who was pushing bipartisan legislation that would all but scuttle the warrantless surveillance program. "Once you basically give the president this authority, it's very difficult to pull it back. That's very shortsighted just to point out the differences between Republicans and Democrats."

Such internal dissension did not sit well with an orchestrated push to elevate the profile of the national security debate ahead of the Nov. 7 midterm elections. GOP leaders seized on week-old comments by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that suggested that the capture of Osama bin Laden would not "make us safer." Republicans launched a blizzard of e-mailed statements condemning the comments, culminating in a news conference yesterday.

Democrats noted that Pelosi's comments mirrored sentiments expressed by Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and even Vice President Cheney last weekend, when he told Tim Russert on NBC's "Meet the Press": "He's not the only source of the problem, obviously, Tim. If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda."

The second GOP track is to label military commissions "terrorist tribunals" and attack Democrats for opposing them. House Republican leadership aides acknowledged that the biggest roadblock to the president's military commissions is coming from Senate Republicans.

Democrats used the GOP's allegiance to the Bush security agenda to redouble efforts to tie vulnerable Republicans to the president.

"The role of Congress is to bring to bear its own independent judgment, to represent the American people and to forge policy, not to simply be a complacent rubber stamp for the president of the United States," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

NSA Court Review Bill Is Sent To Full Senate (USAT)

USA Today, September 14, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved President Bush's proposal to enable a secret court created in 1978 to review a program in which the National Security Agency conducts warrantless surveillance of international calls and e-mails of people in the USA when one party to the conversation may be linked to terrorists. All 10 Republicans voted to send the bill to the full Senate; all eight Democrats opposed it.

Republicans defeated Democratic amendments to insert a one-year expiration date and require the NSA to report more often to Congress on the program.

Port security bill advances in Senate

The Senate rejected a Democratic attempt to attach dozens of provisions to legislation intended to protect seaports from terrorist attack. The proposals are part of a Democratic security plan that includes improving safeguards on trains and buses and at chemical plants.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, called them a “hodgepodge of provisions that are irrelevant” to port security. The additions could have stalled the overall port security bill, which would install monitors at the 22 largest ports. The devices are designed to detect materials used in nuclear arms or dirty bombs, which use conventional explosives to strew radioactive waste.

Bill to curb Indian casinos fails in House

DOJ_NMG_0062779

A Republican proposal to curb the growth of Indian gambling operations failed in the House. The bill would prohibit tribes from building casinos away from their reservations. The vote was 247-171 in favor of the measure, but the expedited rules under which it was considered require a two-thirds majority for passage.

Gambling operations by the nation's nearly 225 casino-operating tribes have become a $22 billion-a-year industry, richer than Nevada casinos.

U.S. and Europe disagree on Iran

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Iran's cancellation of a meeting planned for today with European officials shows that it is not serious about suspending its nuclear program. At the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, the United States said it's time for the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran for continuing its banned enrichment of uranium. European countries favored more diplomacy. Chief British delegate John McGregor delivered a joint statement with France and Germany that asks Iran to comply with its obligations and negotiate an end to the dispute. Enriched uranium can be used to make nuclear weapons or to fuel power plants. Iran says its program is only for electricity.

Plame sues former No. 2 at State Dept.

Former CIA officer Valerie Plame added former deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage as a defendant in her lawsuit accusing Bush administration officials of blowing her cover as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence. Plame and her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, filed the original suit against Vice President Cheney, his former chief of staff, I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby, and White House aide Karl Rove. The new filing says Armitage's disclosure, which he says was inadvertent, was independent of the alleged conspiracy. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has said no one would be charged with knowingly identifying a covert CIA officer, but Libby is charged with lying to Fitzgerald's federal investigators.

Senate Panel Clears Terror Surveillance Legislation (Update2) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, September 14, 2006

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- A Senate panel approved legislation on a party-line vote authorizing President George W. Bush's domestic eavesdropping program with court review.

The measure, approved by a 10-8 vote in the Republican- controlled Senate Judiciary Committee, now goes to the full Senate, where Republican leaders plan to hold a vote before lawmakers leave next month to campaign for the November elections.

The measure would authorize a secret court to rule on the legality of the National Security Agency's program to listen to the international calls between al-Qaeda operatives overseas and their suspected confederates in the U.S. without court warrants.

``There has been no one who has asked for the National Security Agency to stop the surveillance of the international terrorists," said Texas Senator John Cornyn, one of 10 Republicans who supported the legislation.

Bush agreed to the measure's wording in negotiations with Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the panel. By a series of 10-8 votes, the Republican-controlled committee defeated efforts by Democrats to change it.

The panel did approve a competing proposal, backed by Democrats, that would streamline existing law to allow the eavesdropping with warrants. Specter, who voted to send the Democratic proposal to the Senate, predicted that the Republican-backed version he negotiated with the president would win final approval.

Separately, the House Judiciary Committee postponed a vote on a measure sponsored by Representative Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican, that would be in conflict with the Senate legislation.

Secret Court

Specter's legislation wouldn't require Bush to submit the NSA program to a secret court for review. Still, the president agreed to do so if Congress passes the measure in the form approved today in the committee. The president wouldn't have to stop the eavesdropping program even if the court objects.

The measure would also provide for appeals of the secret court's ruling to the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0062780

Democrats such as Wisconsin Senator Russell Feingold voted against the measure, arguing it would legalize Bush's flouting of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires the president to seek court approved warrants to wiretap suspected spies and terrorists.

``We are confronted by a president who is breaking the law," Feingold said. ``What we would be doing by this legislation is institutionalizing and legislating the putting into law of the land the president walking all over us," he said.

Democrats also complained that Bush has refused to give lawmakers sufficient information about the program. Bush's refusal forces Congress to legislate ``almost in complete darkness" on the issue, Feingold said.

Inherent Authority

The Bush administration contends that the Constitution gives the president inherent authority as commander of the armed forces to conduct the eavesdropping program without judicial review.

Bush's surveillance program, ordered after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, is merely an exercise of military power to ``conduct intelligence activities and surveillance that has existed in the country since George Washington," Cornyn said.

Specter called his legislation an effort ``to find a way to have judicial review" of the program.

He and South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham joined the panel's eight Democrats in voting to send to the Senate the competing measure that would require the president to seek individual warrants for the surveillance.

Emergency Wiretaps

The measure, sponsored by Senator Dianne Feinstein, would allow the president to conduct emergency wiretaps without warrants for up to seven days before seeking court permission. Current law allows the attorney general to order emergency wiretapping for up to three days.

Feinstein, who has been briefed on the NSA program as a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, argued that the eavesdropping could be conducted within the legal structure Congress set up in 1978 to authorize wiretapping to gather information on enemy agents and spies.

Her measure would streamline the procedures by giving the attorney general authority to empower intelligence officials to initiate emergency wiretapping without warrants. Current law requires the attorney general or his designate to order such eavesdropping.

Preserve

It would also preserve a clause of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act stating that that law is the exclusive authority for such wiretapping.

Congress enacted the law to correct abuses of wiretapping in the 1960s and 1970s uncovered by congressional investigations that found the Federal Bureau of Investigation spied on activists protesting the Vietnam War and other political dissidents who posed no threat to security.

Feinstein said her measure was designed to protect the privacy of Americans' phone calls and e-mails. ``We don't want to see Americans rights abused for the next 50 to 60 years," Feinstein said.

The language Specter negotiated with Bush would repeal that provision and legalize any warrantless wiretapping ordered by a president since Congress enacted the surveillance law 28 years ago.

The committee also approved a measure sponsored by Ohio Republican Mike DeWine that would require the president to explain to Congress why he was continuing to wiretap suspected terrorists without warrants.

DeWine described his measure as ``complementary, not contradictory" to the language Bush negotiated with Specter. Under the measure, the president would be allowed to conduct the surveillance before obtaining evidence sufficient to get warrants.

Trial For 2 Men In Terror Case Begins (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- A defense attorney attacked the credibility of an FBI informant who posed as an arms dealer in a fictitious plot to kill a Pakistani diplomat, as the trial of two men accused of supporting terrorism began Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0062781

Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner, and Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque where Hossain is a member, are accused of supporting terrorism through a series of financial transactions from 2003-04.

The informant told the suspects he was an arms dealer and asked Hossain to launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that would be used to kill the diplomat in New York City, according to the federal complaint.

"He's a convicted felon. He's a con man. He's a failed businessman himself," attorney Kevin Luibrand said of the informant. "They got somebody that lied to the FBI completely and continuously about what was happening."

Specific information on the informant's background was not immediately available to The Associated Press.

Luibrand said the secretly taped meetings will show that his client Hossain, a 51-year-old naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh, was shown a missile in November 2003 by the informant, and that the loan transactions began two months later.

But another tape, which the prosecution didn't mention, will show the informant assured Hossain in the interim that he wasn't dealing in weapons or doing anything illegal, Luibrand said.

Attorney Kent Sprotbery said Aref, 36, imam at Masjid as-Salam, was asked by Hossain to witness the loan. Islam prohibits charging or receiving interest, so Muslims often loan money to each other, and clerics serve as witnesses, he said.

Both defendants insisted on writing receipts, showing they had nothing to hide, defense lawyers said.

Aref was never shown any shoulder-fired missile, and testimony will show all three men thought the talk about attacking the diplomat was "a joke," Sprotbery said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said the audiotapes and videotapes will show the informant impersonated an arms dealer in conversations with both Hossain and later Aref, that he told them the $50,000 came from the sale of the missile.

The informant gave them cash, got checks back in return, and those transactions constitute most of the charges.

"A sting is simply a crime of opportunity, where the opportunity was provided by the government," Pericek said.

Prosecutors Weave Tale Of Zeal Gone Wrong (ALBANYTU)

Federal trial of former Albany imam and pizza shop owner opens

ALBANY -- Federal prosecutors began laying out their case Wednesday against two Albany men ensnared in an FBI counterterrorism sting as their attorneys portrayed them as deeply religious Muslims who fell victim to an overzealous government informant.

The first day of testimony was at times disjointed and, in one instance, confusing as prosecutors called a Bangladeshi immigrant to the stand whose English was so poor, numerous court observers said they could not understand what he was saying.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William C. Pericak, who gave the first of three opening statements, outlined an investigation that began in early 2003. It culminated more than a year later with the indictment of an Albany imam and his friend, a pizza shop owner, on charges they took part in a fictitious plot to make money off the sale of shoulder-fired missiles to terrorists.

"A sting is simply a crime of opportunity, where the opportunity is presented by the government," Pericak told the panel. "Belief and intent are critically important ... and turn it into a very, very serious crime."

Yassin M. Aref, 36, the jailed spiritual leader of a Central Avenue mosque, and Mohammed M. Hossain, 51, a city pizza shop owner, face the possibility of life in prison if convicted. Both men have denied knowingly taking part in anything illegal and contend the FBI's informant, former Loudonville businessman Shahed "Malik" Hussain, misled them about the legality of his business dealings.

"We're here to talk to you about a sequence of events that can be viewed in different ways," said Kent B. Sprotbery, who is Aref's co-counsel along with attorney Terence L. Kindlon. "You need to keep in mind that language plays a very important part in this case."

Hossain's attorney, Kevin A. Luibrand, assailed the FBI's informant as a "convict" and "con man" whom he contends misled FBI agents about the context of secretly recorded conversations the men had in Arabic and Urdu.

DOJ_NMG_0062782

"He's called an informant," Luibrand said. "I have a few other words for him. ... Malik was giving a different message back to his (FBI) handlers than what was taking place in the room."

Luibrand said one of the most important conversations between his client and the informant took place in early December 2003, when the informant allegedly told Hossain that his business dealings were legal.

Prosecutors had not intended to play that taped conversation for the jury. The defense does, and Luibrand said it shows Hossain believed the money he was getting came from lawful transactions.

But prosecutors wasted no time showing jurors what was at the heart of the scheme.

Their first witness, a Department of Defense official from Alabama, gave the panel a crash course on the destructive capabilities of a 5-foot long, Russian-made missile launcher that he hoisted atop his shoulder.

The weapon was the same device the informant pulled out during a meeting with Hossain on Nov. 20, 2003, after they had met more than seven times. The informant said he'd been importing the weapons from China for about five years and that it was "for destroying airplanes."

Aref was never shown the weapon, although he did see its metal triggering device at a later meeting.

Prosecutors contend the missile launcher shown to Hossain bolsters their allegation that he knew what they were doing was illegal and involved terrorism.

Over several months, Hossain and Aref allegedly accepted $50,000 in cash transactions from the informant. Hossain then wrote checks through his business to the informant, keeping small amounts for himself, according to the charges.

"The process goes on again and again," Pericak said in his opening statement. "It's the checks that come back that are the money laundering ... they complete the washing cycle."

Aref was brought in as a witness to the transactions, under Muslim tradition, and is not accused of profiting from the scheme.

His attorneys contend Aref never knew the money came from the sale of missile launchers, and that Hossain believed the informant was dealing arms legally.

To counter those claims, prosecutors said they intend to play a series of taped conversations in which the informant allegedly warned the pair in January 2004 that the missile launcher was going to be used in a planned terrorist attack in New York City against the visiting Pakistani president.

Five witnesses testified Wednesday, including Abul Kashem, a Bangladeshi immigrant who runs a restaurant next door to Hossain's Central Avenue pizza shop.

Kashem recounted talking to Hossain about Osama bin Laden several years ago, but his account of the conversation was garbled and difficult to understand. At one point, the court reporter put her hands on her head in apparent frustration as Kashem spoke, and several jurors appeared confused by the testimony.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Battles Over 9/11 Resolution (AP-Y)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP, September 13, 2006

House Republicans and Democrats traded accusations of improper politicking Wednesday as they sparred over a resolution commemorating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Democrats criticized the GOP-drafted resolution for praising controversial legislation, including the USA Patriot Act and a border security bill. Some faulted it for stating "the nation is safer than it was on Sept. 11, 2001."

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the resolution "self-congratulatory."

"It praises Congress for some reason. Instead of having the focus on the innocent victims of 9/11, it talked about the accomplishments of this Congress. I can't even imagine why they thought that was a good idea," she said.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., called the criticism "cheap demagoguery."

Republicans defended the inclusion of the GOP-crafted security laws and bills. Without them, said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., "we would not be here today without having suffered another attack on our soil."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., disputed the idea that terrorism dangers had grown. "Five years after 9/11, America is safer and much more alert to the dangers that lurk in the darker corners of our world," he said.

Despite the rhetorical battle, the resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks passed 395-22.

The intensifying quarrel between Republicans and Democrats over national security comes weeks before this fall's midterm elections, which will determine which party controls the House and Senate.

Democrats, flanked by foreign policy experts from Democratic administrations past, argued that President Bush's failures call for a change in congressional leadership. They outlined plans to withdraw some troops from Iraq by the end of this year and improve the security of trains, ports, subways and planes.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who supports an immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq, said officials sitting on their "fat backsides in the Oval Office" and elsewhere in Washington should stop making excuses for poor planning in Iraq. He called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, while acknowledging a resolution to remove him would probably never get a vote.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, owed Democrats an apology for questioning Tuesday whether Democrats "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., called on Senate Republicans to distance themselves from the statement.

Republicans took issue with something Pelosi told reporters last week about al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden. "He has done more damage the longer he has been out there. But, in fact, the damage that he has done is done. And even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer," she said.

A Pelosi spokesman said her words were no different from those made by some Republicans, who have said that if bin Laden were captured or killed, it wouldn't remove the threat posed by the al-Qaida terrorist network.

Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., said the statements are different. "That quote clearly indicates a misunderstanding of how important and what a symbol Osama bin Laden is," he said.

"I actually thought that the Democrats would pursue a policy of national security almost identical to what the president's proposing of taking the war to the enemy," he said. "But now I understand ... that indeed they would, I believe, cut and run. I believe that they would appease."

House Approves Praise Of 9/11 Measures (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The House of Representatives, despite objections by Democrats, yesterday approved a resolution recognizing those killed in the September 11 terrorist attacks and praising the USA Patriot Act and other Republican-crafted security measures implemented since.

A sharp debate, which raged on most of the day, highlighted the contrast between the two parties over the war on terrorism less than two months before elections that will decide congressional control. Still, the resolution passed 395-22, with just 21 Democrats and Republican Rep. Ron Paul of Texas dissenting.

"To me, and I think to most Americans, after five years of security and success, a lapse in our resolve is unthinkable," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. "Victory is not yet assured, and victory without resolve is impossible."

The Illinois Republican said the resolution sends a signal to America's enemies: "We will never forget, and we will never surrender."

Democratic leaders complained that references to the Patriot Act and the tough 2005 border-security bill did not belong in such a resolution.

Democrats supported previous resolutions since September 11 that affirm Congress will "take whatever actions necessary to identify, intercept and disrupt terrorists and their activities." Those resolutions, passed overwhelmingly in 2002, 2003, 2004 and 2005, and didn't mention any of the nine measures included in this election-year version.

DOJ_NMG_0062784

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California urged her Democratic colleagues to vote for the measure in spite of the objections. In her floor speech, she asked Mr. Hastert to bring legislation to the floor that would fully implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and criticized the resolution, saying "instead of having the focus on the innocent victims of 9/11," it "praises Congress for some reason."

Mr. Hastert said the measures demonstrate swift congressional action to protect the American people.

"Five years after 9/11, America is safer and much more alert to the dangers that lurk in the darker corners of our world," Mr. Hastert said.

While many Democrats characterized the Patriot Act as a violation of civil liberties, Republicans said it has broken up terrorist cells.

"It is absolutely essential that those keeping us safe have every tool necessary to do so," said Rep. David Dreier, California Republican. "Our homeland has not been attacked again. That seems to be so often forgotten."

Democrats argued the war in Iraq has shifted the focus from terrorists in Afghanistan and has emboldened U.S. enemies.

"Five years later, we are still making promises and America is still not as safe as it should be," said Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee.

Mr. Thompson said Republicans only support "security on the cheap" and said the resolution suggests Congress wants to "pat itself on the back about a few past deeds when we've left the bulk of the work of homeland security unfinished."

"Shame on you for using the memory of 9/11 during a charged political season as a cover-up for Congress' do-nothing approach to homeland security," Mr. Thompson said.

The Democrats said the Republicans should have written something in the spirit of the Senate resolution -- adopted unanimously Monday -- which praises September 11 heroes and "condemns in the strongest possible terms the attacks, the terrorists who perpetrated them and their sponsors."

Both parties agree that terrorists should be the common enemy. The previous resolutions identify al Qaeda as responsible for September 11 and condemn terrorist attacks in Bali, Madrid and London.

The objectionable clauses in yesterday's resolution included a port-security bill, which passed 421-2 and the creation of the Homeland Security department, which passed by a large margin.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican who is chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, noted that Republicans could have included praise of the Bush administration's surveillance program or the CIA program that examines financial records to track terrorist activities.

Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, criticized the resolution's mentioning the House border-security bill, which he called "a bill that couldn't even pass the Republican Senate and a bill that President Bush doesn't even support."

Rep. Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence panel, said the measure is disingenuous.

"The sad, unalterable fact is that five years after 9/11, we have not made as much progress as this resolution claims," she said. "We have not plugged some gaping holes in our homeland defense."

In 2002, lawmakers unanimously passed a resolution lauding "numerous laws providing additional resources for the overseas effort against terrorism, as well as additional tools," and in 2004, the House voted 406-16 to pass a resolution that championed "innovative programs" that have secured the nation and applauded the capture of Saddam Hussein.

Democrats Rebut Soft-on-terror Rap (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Capitol Hill Democrats said yesterday they will not be "swift-boated" by Republicans who accuse them of being soft on national security and coddling terrorists.

"Democrats stand ready to protect and defend the American people," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said. "We will not be swift-boated on the issue of security, and that is what the Republicans are trying to do."

Mrs. Pelosi was referring to the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which was highly critical of John Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0062785

Part of national security, said the House's top Democrat, is protecting the environment.

"We are advancing tough and smart national security policies to keep the American people safe," said Mrs. Pelosi, adding that Democrats' national security agenda aims "to fight terrorism and defeat it, stop the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, to stop global warming and any other threats to the safety and security of the American people."

Kevin Madden, spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, said the remark reflects a broader national security weakness by Democrats.

"The American people want a strong posture against the global scourge of terrorism and all Democrats can offer is Nancy Pelosi's babble putting that fight on par with global warming," he said.

Republicans continued their assault on Mrs. Pelosi and her fellow Democrats for opposing the efforts they say are crucial to winning the war against terrorism.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, for instance, opposed legislation yesterday that would authorize President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program aimed at collecting communications by foreign terrorists. Democrats, along with a handful of Senate Republicans, also have urged that suspected terrorists held at Guantanamo Bay be granted greater civil rights in their trials.

Such positions prompted Mr. Boehner earlier this week to wonder whether Democrats "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

This brought Mr. Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, to the Senate floor yesterday to scold Mr. Boehner.

"His statement was very clear and equally despicable," Mr. Kerry said.

Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat, also condemned Mr. Boehner's remarks.

"I come from the state of Joe McCarthy," he said of the infamous anti-Communist. "I know a first-rate McCarthy when I see one and I also know a third-rate McCarthy when I see one, and we saw one yesterday."

Also yesterday, Rep. John P. Murtha introduced a bill formally calling for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to be fired "for the good of the country." He said Mr. Rumsfeld has harmed military readiness and was wrong in his estimates about the cost and length of the Iraq war.

Mr. Murtha said he is sure Republicans won't allow a floor vote on the measure. But he will introduce it anyway, "just for the effect it might have on the secretary leaving."

Republicans Seek To Sow Seeds Of Doubt On Security (FT)

By Holly Yeager And Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 14, 2006

John Boehner, the Republican majority leader in the House of Representatives, may have given the game away this week when he said, “I wonder if they’re [the Democrats] more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people.”

America’s mid-term congressional elections, which take place on 7 November, are shaping up as one of the most bitter campaigns in recent US history. Although George W. Bush is not expected to play a prominent role on the campaign trail over the next seven weeks, the president has given a series of speeches in the past 10 days that have helped crystalise his party’s att-empts to paint the Democrats as weak on national security.

In a broadcast interview last Sunday, Dick Cheney, the vice-president, was more blunt in suggesting a connection between Democratic criticism of the Iraq war and being soft on terrorism. “Suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw US forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion [and] validate the strategy of the terrorists,” he said.

While viewed by many as below-the-belt, such pugilism could be a small foretaste of what is to come. Opinion polls suggest that the Democrats are on course to regain the House of Representatives in November for the first time since 1994, which could severely complicate life for Mr Bush in the two remaining years of his second term. The opposition needs to add just 15 seats to its tally in the 435-seat house to regain control. There is also an outside chance the Democrats could recapture the Senate, where 33 seats are being contested: they need to boost their seats by six.

DOJ_NMG_0062786

"The national mood remains bleak for Republicans," said Stuart Rothenberg, the publisher of the Rothenberg political report. "President George W. Bush's job performance ratings are terrible and the public still gives Congress low marks. A majority of Americans continue to tell pollsters that the country is headed in the wrong direction.

"There is no reason to believe that things will change dramatically between now and election day to improve Republican prospects."

However, it remains far from clear whether the Democrats can translate widespread voter dissatisfaction into significant gains on the ground. In addition to focusing on national security, the Republicans have sought to reduce the November elections to a series of local contests by focusing on the record of their incumbents or the perceived foibles of their opponents. Even stalwart Republican allies of Mr Bush have asked him to keep a low profile.

The Democrats, meanwhile, are trying to build a unified national campaign that will tap voter disaffection with Mr Bush.

"Essentially, the Republicans are trying to localise this election and the Democrats are trying to nationalise it," said John Green, a political scientist at the Bliss Institute of Applied Politics in Ohio. "History suggests that the Democrats will find it an uphill struggle to turn 435 local races into a national wave."

The Democrats, whose leadership is bitterly divided between Howard Dean, the former presidential hopeful and chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and party leaders in Congress over electoral strategy, also face tough questions on their continuing inability to produce coherent policies. That is particularly difficult over Iraq and the economy.

On the unpopular war in Iraq, the Democrats continue to be divided on whether and how quickly to recommend a US military withdrawal. And on the economy, where there is broad-based voter anxiety, the Dem-ocratic platform amounts to little more than proposing an increase in the minimum wage, stuck at $5.15 (€4.05, £2.74) an hour since 1997, and a reversal of some of the tax cuts Mr Bush has pushed through in the past six years.

The opinion poll gap has begun to narrow sharply. Last month Gallup showed the Democrats' lead over Republicans narrowing to just two percentage points, down from a 15-point lead in April. Although voters remain deeply dissatisfied with the performance of a Republican Congress, their views change when it comes to assessing their local representative.

In what is a frequent peculiarity of American politics, more than half of voters approve of their local representative while fewer than a quarter approve of Congress's performance as a whole.

"The bottom line is that there is still everything to play for," said Mr Green. "The national mood favours the Democrats. But winning the election is still going to prove very tough for them."

Senate Rejects Democratic Plan For Ports (AP)

The AP, September 13, 2006

Senate Republicans on Wednesday rejected a Democratic attempt to attach dozens of national security programs to legislation intended to protect seaports.

The Democrats' proposal had threatened the overall ports security bill, which would install monitors at the 22 largest ports. These devices would screen for materials used to make radiological bombs or nuclear weapons.

The ports bill could come to a final vote on Thursday.

The plan by Democratic leader Harry Reid would have put Republicans in the awkward position of opposing security measures that many people in the United States believe are long overdue. Examples include improving safeguards on trains and buses and at chemical plants.

"Politics won't protect the American people," Reid, D-Nev., said after the GOP-controlled Senate defeated his plan.

Democratic Sens. Bill Nelson of Florida, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Mark Pryor of Arkansas voted against Reid's proposal.

"It is an interesting hodgepodge of provisions that are irrelevant to the underlying bill," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. "What it does not include are provisions that have to do with port security."

Port Security Won't Bankrupt Us (NYT)

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062787

Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, seems determined to outdo his commander in chief in ratcheting up fears of Al Qaeda whenever he wants to score political points. This week, he raised the specter that if the government starts too many expensive antiterrorism programs it could further a plot by Osama bin Laden to "drive us crazy, into bankruptcy" through overspending on homeland defense.

It was particularly ironic that Mr. Chertoff spun this theory while he was fighting off a measure, up for a vote today, that would help protect our ports against the threat that he himself deems most worrisome — a nuclear explosion within our borders — without government spending.

In testifying before a Senate committee on Tuesday, Mr. Chertoff flailed away at straw men of his own concoction. He warned darkly about the dangers of trying to protect the country from "every conceivable threat" — an idea no one has ever espoused. The issue has always been the need to set priorities, and in that respect, Mr. Chertoff's department has become a laughingstock. It compiled one list of possible targets that included a petting zoo and a popcorn factory while the government provided only a pittance for our vulnerable subways.

The White House has been warning that Osama bin Laden enunciated a policy in 2004 of "bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy." But there's no reason to think the terrorist was hatching a plot to force his enemies to buy too many metal detectors or bomb-sniffing dogs. He actually seemed to be gloating about the economic harm wrought by attacks like the one on the World Trade Center, and the costs imposed on America by military adventures. So far, we have not heard anyone from the administration warning that the invasion of Iraq is going to drive us crazy, into bankruptcy.

When it comes to prioritizing our antiterrorism spending, it's hard to understand what Mr. Chertoff dislikes about a measure, introduced by Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, that would require that all cargo containers headed for the United States be scanned at foreign ports to search for a possible nuclear weapon. Mr. Chertoff, after all, put a nuclear bomb at the top of his list of things to worry about, followed by a biological or serious radiological attack. He also agreed that eventually, every container should be screened abroad for radioactive material before it can be loaded into a ship headed for this country.

But he balked at doing it now on the flimsy grounds that some ports might not have enough room to install scanning devices without slowing the flow of traffic and that some foreign governments might not cooperate.

Those sound like the rationalizations of a bureaucrat unwilling to push hard or buck a strong lobbying effort by shippers who don't want any additional hassles or costs. Terminal operators in Hong Kong have been using such scanners effectively and inexpensively without disrupting traffic. The cost of such scanning might reach $20 a container, a small surcharge on shipping costs measured in hundreds if not thousands of dollars.

When it comes to homeland security, the Bush administration has repeatedly allowed corporate profits to trump safety. That seems to be the problem here, just as it has been when it came to the chemical industry's resistance to reforms that would help protect against toxic disasters if terrorists ever attacked their plants. Right now, a port security bill is pending in the Senate that would establish three pilot programs overseas to test the feasibility of scanning all containers. But Mr. Schumer is surely right that delay is dangerous and unnecessary. Virtually all containers destined for the United States should be scanned for nuclear or radiological weapons within the next four years. It is not enough to scan the containers after their arrival here, the current administration policy. That could be too late.

Terror Informant Seeks Sen. Clinton Help (AP-Y)

By Tom Hays

AP, September 13, 2006

An unusual exchange of letters between an undercover informant and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's office has apparently angered authorities and may have complicated the case of a man convicted of plotting to bomb a busy subway station.

Osama Eldawoody — a paid New York Police Department informant who was instrumental in exposing the 2004 subway scheme — told The Associated Press that he wrote to Clinton last month, complaining that his law enforcement handlers misled him with false promises of a better life and asking her to intervene on his behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0062788

A written response from Clinton, shared with the AP by Eldawoody, said she had "requested a review of this matter and a written response" from federal prosecutors in Brooklyn. The letter also suggests Eldawoody seek help from Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, where he now lives.

Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines confirmed that her office had received the letter from Eldawoody, but said the senator was not personally involved in the written exchange and was unaware of the issue. He said caseworkers "simply forwarded it to the U.S. Attorney's office, which we informed him of with a standard letter, as we routinely do with any constituent casework."

Eldawoody said in a telephone interview last week that he was summoned to a meeting with investigators and a federal prosecutor and was reprimanded for contacting Clinton and told not to do it again.

"Everybody was mad at me," he said.

Eldawoody, 50, was a key prosecution witness in the federal government's case against Shahawar Matin Siraj, who was convicted in May of plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in Manhattan. Authorities have touted the case as a success story for the NYPD's heightened counterterrorism effort.

U.S. attorney's office spokesman Robert Nardoza would not discuss Eldawoody, but Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly praised his work as an informant.

"He's a hero who did a great service for the people of New York," Kelly said in statement. "We will continue our dedicated efforts to assure the safety and well being of him and his family."

Attorneys for Siraj, arguing for a new trial in court papers filed last week, said prosecutors had turned over a letter "from a witness addressed to a high public official." The letter was not made public but the defense papers said it contained information that could undermine the government's case.

"It's a piece of new evidence we didn't know about," said Martin Stolar, an attorney for Siraj. He would not elaborate.

The NYPD recruited Eldawoody, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Egypt, to monitor radical Muslims at mosques and elsewhere following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He testified that he met Siraj at an Islamic bookstore and secretly recorded conversations over the next several months as his anti-American rants evolved into a plot to bomb the subway station.

Since Siraj's trial, Eldawoody and his family have struggled to get by on a government stipend of $3,200 a month while living in seclusion in rural Pennsylvania, he said.

He said he complained to Clinton in his letter that police promised him "the best quality of life and security ... and all their promises were gone after the arrest" of Siraj.

Eldawoody claimed that authorities also broke a promise to protect his identity. Once his name came out at the trial and was published in news accounts, he was told by friends that he was marked man in some Muslim communities.

Red Tape Undermines State Disaster Preparedness (LAT)

By Evan Halper

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A new state audit warns that California's efforts to prepare for a terrorist attack or natural disaster are being undermined by a morass of red tape.

State Auditor Elaine M. Howle said in the report that the administration of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has let tens of millions of dollars in federal emergency preparedness grants languish unspent and has not adequately tested the ability of California's medical facilities to handle mass casualties.

"We believe the state's organizational structure for ensuring emergency preparedness is not streamlined or well-defined," Howle wrote in a study released Tuesday for the nonpartisan watchdog agency. "If it remains unchanged, this labyrinthine structure could adversely affect emergency response."

By the end of June, the state had spent less than half of the $954 million of federal homeland security grants it had been awarded since 2001, the report said.

That money is supposed to be used to reimburse local governments for equipment purchases, training and other expenses related to disaster preparedness. The state can be so slow in reimbursing these expenses, according to the report, that some cities cannot afford to continue participating in the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0062789

"A commander with the city of Santa Ana's Police Department told us the city often runs a deficit from $1.5 million to $4 million because it has not received reimbursements for its homeland security purchases," the report said. "The commander said that, at a certain point, the city will no longer allow the deficits to increase, preventing additional purchases."

Chris Bertelli, a spokesman for the state Office of Homeland Security, said the administration is working with local governments to speed up the process and during the last year has significantly reduced the time it takes to cut checks.

Howle's report further cautions that exercises simulating various threats "have not exerted sufficient stress on medical and health systems to determine how well they can respond to emergencies."

Though there would be as many as 10,000 casualties in a moderate emergency, the report said the exercise the state conducted last year simulated only 550 casualties "and lacked sufficient realism."

Bertelli said the administration would work on improving the exercises. Although officials agree that there are problems with some drills, he said the report overlooks many other "comprehensive and robust" preparedness exercises held in California each year.

Traveler Charged In Disrupting Flight To Va. (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

A professional jujitsu fighter from Brazil sat in a Loudoun County jail yesterday on a felony charge that he tried to open the cabin door of a Dulles-bound airliner as it cruised at 30,000 feet over Tennessee.

Carlos Alberto de Oliveira, 43, missed his appearance in court yesterday morning because he fought with sheriff's deputies who came to escort him, Loudoun authorities said. He is expected to be arraigned today on a state charge of interfering with an aircraft's operations.

Federal and state authorities outlined a potentially terrifying scenario in which de Oliveira walked up and down the aisle of United Airlines Flight 890 from Los Angeles on Tuesday night. He then allegedly yanked the handle of the cabin door before passengers swarmed him and federal air marshals took him into custody. The flight landed at Dulles International Airport at 8:30 p.m.

Although de Oliveira's motivations were unclear, federal officials have ruled out terrorism and concluded after interviewing him that he did not intend any harm.

"He didn't threaten anyone, he didn't hurt anyone. He wasn't intending to open the door, he didn't kick it," said Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office. "He just pulled a stupid stunt."

A lawyer had not been appointed for de Oliveira, who was being held at the Loudoun County Adult Detention Center. If convicted, he would face up to five years in prison.

Weierman said de Oliveira is a professional jujitsu competitor, and he listed his occupation on his booking sheet as "professional fighter." Brazilian jujitsu is a form of the ancient martial art that has been gaining popularity in Northern Virginia in recent years.

The United flight took off with 138 passengers and six crew members, said Megan McCarthy, a United spokeswoman. About 3 1/2 hours into the flight, she said, "a passenger, for whatever reason, did attempt to open an exit door" at the rear of the aircraft.

Passenger Ken Wolfenbarger said he noticed a man fiddling with gadgets stashed in his pocket while he stood in the aisle. He then whipped out a long black belt with two metal hooks on either end and wrapped them around his fists, Wolfenbarger said.

Wolfenbarger said the man was dressed in a heavy camouflage jacket, fatigues and dark wraparound glasses, but FBI officials said de Oliveira was not wearing camouflage when he was interviewed.

Suddenly, Wolfenbarger said, the man turned down the aisle toward the plane's rear galley. "I heard a ruckus, and then the airline stewardess started yelling, 'Please help us! Help us! Help us!' " said Wolfenbarger, 44, of Whittier, Calif. "As soon as I heard that, I climbed over the other seat to the aisle. I knew the plane was in trouble, and I said, 'I am not going to die on this flight.' "

Weierman said the door would not open because the cabin is pressurized. Officials concurred that de Oliveira had been acting in an odd manner before the incident, walking up and down the aisle.

"He was strutting his stuff, just sort of checking everyone out," said one law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is ongoing.

Law enforcement officials said de Oliveira at one point walked toward the beverage cart, which was in front of the cockpit door when the door was briefly opened. A flight attendant told him to return to his seat, and he did, law enforcement officials said.

Weierman said de Oliveira "did not mean to harm anyone, and there was no nexis to terrorism. It was just a mindless act with not a lot of thought behind it."

She declined to say whether the FBI supported the passengers' actions but added that "heightened awareness on the part of passengers" during the week of the five-year anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks may have played a role.

"It's a sign of the times that we live in," she said.

De Oliveira was arrested by the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority Police Department, whose officers met the plane at Dulles.

Loudoun Commonwealth's Attorney James E. Plowman's office took over the case after the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria declined to prosecute. Officials said state charges were more appropriate because federal law requires proving that someone interfered with the flight crew, which did not occur in this case.

The state charge, authorities said, is broader because it requires proving only that someone interfered with the overall operations of an aircraft.

Cost May Kill Travel Program (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A government proposal that would force air travelers to pay up to $200 a year for a fast pass through airport security could kill the program, advocates and lawmakers said Wednesday.

That price — double what was expected — would "severely threaten" the long-delayed Registered Traveler program, said Steven Brill, a Manhattan entrepreneur planning to launch the idea at four airports this year.

Eagerly awaited by travelers and recently touted by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Registered Traveler offers fee-paying fliers expedited airport screening. Travelers in the program would have to pass a background check to rule out ties to terrorism and would get an ID card to speed them through checkpoints.

The Transportation Security Administration said last year that it expected to charge about $30 for a terrorism check. Now it wants to charge another $70 to pay for TSA screeners at Registered Traveler checkpoints, TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said. It also may charge an additional $20 for a criminal background check. Those costs are in addition to yearly fees of up to $80 that fliers would pay to companies operating the program.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., whose committee oversees Registered Traveler, said $200 "far exceeds anything that's ever been entertained. …You don't know if it's going to succeed now."

Larry Zmuda, head of homeland security for Pennsylvania-based Unisys, which also wants to run Registered Traveler, said the heftier price tag "would be a huge blow." It could deter millions from signing up and make Registered Traveler unprofitable at some airports, he said.

The program would operate only at airports that choose to apply and are approved by TSA. About 20 have applied so far.

The TSA says it wants to avoid spending taxpayer dollars on Registered Traveler. "It's a private-sector program, and it's designed to have Registered Traveler customers pay for use of the lane," Howe said.

The agency revealed the $100 fee on its website Monday with no publicity. The fee is based on "preliminary calculations" that could change later, the TSA says.

Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., chairman of a subcommittee overseeing TSA, said the agency "is certainly going to have to justify that ($100) to me."

Registered Traveler advocates are lobbying the TSA against the $70 charge for screeners. Brill said the TSA doesn't have to hire extra screeners to run Registered Traveler checkpoints.

DOJ_NMG_0062791

Brill's company, Verified Identity Pass, has said that charging more than $80 creates "significant barriers" to getting enough people to join and make the program a success.

Thompson, the congressman, said a $200 fee might deter travelers who already get shorter security lines through elite flier clubs.

Frequent travelers had mixed views.

Cleveland businessman Mark Taft said $200 is "on the outer edge of what I would pay."

Charlie Massoglia said paying $200 "doesn't make a difference to anyone who travels frequently."

Democrats Ask For Investigation Of Former EPA Director On 9/11 Health Issues (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz, Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON – Democrats from New York and New Jersey asked on Wednesday for an investigation that could lead to criminal charges against former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christie Whitman for breathing problems suffered by thousands after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Whitman told The Associated Press that she and the EPA "agreed then and I reiterate now that the air on the WTC site was not clean – the consequence of millions of tons of burned debris from the most horrific attack in our nation's history.

"We were emphatic that workers needed to wear respirators, a message I repeated frequently."

At hearings last week in New York, Whitman was the most frequent target of lawmakers who charged that ground zero workers were not protected as they worked to clear the pile of toxic debris.

Whitman, a former Republican governor of New Jersey, declared in the days after Sept. 11 that the air in lower Manhattan was safe for workers and residents. But she has said she and the EPA always differentiated between the air quality in lower Manhattan and at ground zero.

Former Sept. 11 Commission chairman Thomas Kean, also a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said it was troubling that the Democratic congressmen "would misuse the heroic service of thousands for their political gain in an election season."

The congressmen – New York Reps. Jerrold Nadler and Anthony Weiner and New Jersey Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. – said the health of their constituents, and not politics, was their concern.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the trio accused Whitman of "endangering the lives of thousands of people."

Weiner said, "Only with the appointment of a special prosecutor with subpoena power can an independent investigation occur and, if necessary, criminal charges be brought against those responsible."

Pascrell said it was "morally incumbent" upon Gonzales to appoint a special counsel. The Democrats want the investigation to look at other government officials as well, but did not specify anyone other than Whitman.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency had not yet received the letter.

Separately, Whitman and the EPA are being sued by residents, workers and others over health issues. Last week, Mount Sinai Medical Center released the results of a study showing nearly seven of every 10 ground zero responders suffered lung problems.

Law Enforcement, American Style (NYT)

By John Miller

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

Washington

WITH the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks coming shortly after British authorities disrupted the plot to bomb airliners over the Atlantic, we are seeing another round of calls to break up the F.B.I. or to create a domestic intelligence agency separate from the F.B.I. with no police powers, similar to Britain's MI5.

DOJ_NMG_0062792

But these critics, who have been joined by the prominent federal appeals court judge Richard Posner, seem to be unaware of two critical things. One is how far the F.B.I. has come in transforming itself into an intelligence-driven organization in the last five years; the other is how many attacks we have prevented in that span.

Using intelligence and technology — and our authority to make arrests — the F.B.I. has stopped five terrorist plots in progress in roughly the last year alone:

• On Aug. 31, 2005, in Los Angeles, we arrested four members of a group of radicals that had grown out of the prison system and was planning to attack military recruiting centers and synagogues.

• In February, in Toledo, Ohio, we arrested three men who had conspired to travel to Iraq and attack American forces there.

• In a case out of Atlanta, indictments were handed down in March and July against two men who had traveled to Washington to videotape possible targets near the Capitol and then met with other extremists in Canada to compare notes.

• In Miami in June, seven extremists were arrested after being recorded on F.B.I. surveillance tapes swearing allegiance to Al Qaeda and making plans to attack targets in Miami and Chicago, including the Sears Tower.

• In July a plot to attack subways in New York was disrupted with the arrest of the mastermind in Lebanon.

In addition, we worked closely with our law enforcement partners in Canada and Britain to help uncover plots in those countries that made headlines worldwide this summer. This recent record suggests two things: that the operational tempo of Al Qaeda's followers is still high, and that the F.B.I. is doing a good job.

So why tear apart the bureau now and start a new agency? How long would it take this new agency to get rolling? A year? Two? What would it use for a database? How would it address privacy and civil liberties? How long would it take the officers of this new agency to develop trusting relationships with America's 18,000 local law enforcement agencies?

There is a more fundamental question for the "domestic intelligence agency" proponents: Who says the other system is better? When we visit our colleagues at domestic intelligence agencies abroad to compare systems, those without police powers tell us they wish they could make arrests.

Israel and Britain have domestic intelligence agencies staffed by some of the finest operators in the world. Since 9/11, both countries have suffered terrorist attacks on home soil while we have not. That doesn't mean their systems don't work best for them; it simply proves that the domestic-intelligence model is not a magic bullet against our enemies.

The proponents of creating a new agency assume the F.B.I. always makes arrests at the first opportunity, scooping up the little fish while the masterminds get away. They seem unaware of the existence of our intelligence directorate, or the 56 field intelligence groups spread throughout the nation. The critics don't understand how intelligence is leveraged in each investigation.

At any moment, we are involved in joint operations with American and foreign intelligence agencies that go on for months or even years, gathering intelligence and disrupting plots by means other than high-profile arrests. These operations allow the F.B.I. and our partners to continue to follow the thread of intelligence until we have learned the identities of all the players or found the last safe house. In those cases no one takes a bow or holds a press conference, but the work gets done quietly and effectively. When we do make arrests, it is because making arrests was the most effective way to disrupt a plot.

The bureau's director, Robert Mueller, has made a priority of merging our longtime strength of being a premier investigative agency with the new goal of being an intelligence-led agency. We have started a national security branch, with special agents and talented analysts, to control our counterterrorism, intelligence and counterespionage efforts. This branch is now home to about 40 percent of the bureau's employees.

We have added a directorate that handles investigations involving weapons of mass destruction and also conducts research to stay on the cutting edge of terrorist capacities.

We have expanded our partnerships with local law enforcement by increasing the number of joint terrorist task forces to 101 today from 33 before 9/11.

In those squads in cities across the country, local police detectives, our agents and analysts and investigators from other federal agencies work side by side, sharing information and running down leads.

We have also developed a database, called the Investigative Data Warehouse, that can search more than 700 million records from more than a dozen agencies and match them against our own investigative records.

DOJ_NMG_0062793

As we break down the structure of Al Qaeda, we see the very shape of the terrorist threat changing and adapting. Our approach has to continually evolve to keep up. Starting over from scratch will only set us back and make America less safe.

Insure CIA Agents Against A Reckless Administration (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Your Sept. 12 editorial "Jack Bauer Insurance" was a disservice not to me or to fictional characters like Jack Bauer, but to the very real CIA agents whose commitment to the truth didn't fit the administration's neoconservative agenda on Iraq, and to agents endangered by reckless administration policies.

It's been reported that CIA officers refused to be trained in the administration's controversial interrogation techniques, and in at least one instance these techniques yielded questionable information aimed at pleasing the interrogators. The Supreme Court, not Democrats, ruled administration detainee policies out of bounds, and it was the outrage of Republican senators that forced the administration to apply the Geneva Convention to enemy prisoners in order to best protect captured Americans.

Iraq has been an endless abuse of the CIA. CIA operative Tyler Drumheller said top White House officials simply brushed off the warning that "reliable intelligence" suggested Saddam Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction, saying they were "no longer interested" in intelligence. Former CIA operative Paul Pillar wrote that "intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions already made."

Former CIA case officer Jim Marcinkowski argued the Valerie Plame leak hurt "the credibility of our case officers when they try to convince an overseas contact that their safety is of primary importance." Former CIA agent Larry Johnson, a registered Republican, said it "speaks volumes" that President Bush held no one accountable for the leak of an agent's identity. Forgotten is President George H.W. Bush's admonition that those who expose our agents are "the most insidious of traitors." CIA officers don't need Jack Bauer insurance -- they need insurance against the recklessness of this administration.

"These People Want To Kill Us" (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The Washington Times, in a special section commemorating the first anniversary of September 11, profiled three men and two women who survived the attack on the Pentagon. They agreed to update their stories for a series, After the Fire, this week marking the fifth anniversary.

Fourth of five parts

A small white box tucked neatly in the cubbyhole of Pentagon police Officer George E. Clodfelter III's desk contains a dozen or so photographs of things that happened that day.

They look like snapshots from a nightmare.

There's one of a melted telephone. Another shows a clock with brown burn marks, the hands frozen at 9:37, the exact time a hijacked airplane slammed into the Pentagon on September 11, 2001.

The next shot shows Master Patrol Officer Clodfelter standing in the sun giving orders to two persons whose backs are to the camera. There's a dark red splotch on his white uniform shirt.

"That blood," he begins to say, but then stops as if someone has punched him in the throat.

A moment later, he adds: "She died in my arms, and that's her blood."

Five years have passed since Officer Clodfelter and 13 fellow members of the Pentagon Force Protection Agency plunged into the black smoke and flaming debris to save dozens -- some burned beyond recognition -- from the rubble in the moments after the attack.

Four years ago, when The Washington Times first profiled him on the first anniversary of September 11, Officer Clodfelter spoke graphically of pulling bloodied victims from the wreckage where 184 died.

He spoke of the many hours he spent with his wife of 33 years, Linda, at their kitchen table in the aftermath -- talking, crying and trying to cope with the misery of what he and others endured that day.

DOJ_NMG_0062794

"I call it the tape," Officer Clodfelter said in 2002. "It runs in my mind. I don't consciously run it."

He described going through phases of fear, remorse and denial, and said at the time -- one year after the attacks -- that he was "in the anger phase."

During follow-up interviews with The Times over the past month, Officer Clodfelter, 52, reflected on his remarks, saying those were phases he went through "in the beginning."

"It levels out over time," he says. "Time heals all wounds to a certain degree."

While the passage of five years brought perspective, Officer Clodfelter says, certain things trigger a rush of painful emotions and memories.

"It's like it happened yesterday when I go toward that side of the building. I can still smell it and the tape runs," he says. "It smells like death."

When asked to elaborate, Officer Clodfelter becomes quiet, then adds: "Those people that have smelled death know what it smells like. Leave it at that."

Seeking peace

The biggest change for the Clodfelters since September 11 was their move in 2002 from their town house in the Washington suburb of Lake Ridge, Va., to a quaint gated community about 60 miles south in Ruther Glen, Va.

The bucolic road leading to their modest two-story home is manned by uniformed security guards who check every vehicle coming in to the subdivision.

"Our decision to move here was a direct response to 9/11," Officer Clodfelter says. "I resigned myself to the fact that I didn't want [Linda] to get caught up in it if there was another catastrophe up there."

Despite the relative peace they have found in their new home, Mrs. Clodfelter says that she and her husband still keep a "bug-out bag" packed with items such as canned goods and gas masks in case a catastrophe should occur.

Memories of September 11 line the underbelly of other aspects of their lives. A wall inside the home carries mementos that Officer Clodfelter neatly arranged during the past few years: A framed Medal for Valor from the Defense Department. A Cu Chullian award for dedication and valor, presented by the Irish Center of Washington, D.C. A limited-edition commemorative September 11 rifle.

But more personal and more graphic mementos, such as his box of photographs, remain hidden away.

"I've got a lot of it around here in boxes, and I just haven't gotten around to sorting most of it because it's still so painful," Officer Clodfelter says.

He keeps another memento closer to his heart.

With memories fresh on the first anniversary of the attacks, he got a tattoo on his chest bearing the numerals 09-11-01 and depicting a bald eagle, wings spread as an American flag.

"It's right above my heart," Officer Clodfelter says, explaining that September 11 "is my Pearl Harbor" and the tattoo "is my devotion to the memory."

His wife interjects: "I'd say it's your own personal memorial."

Passion, politics

A line from a speech by President Bush, written in elaborate calligraphy, is framed and mounted on a wall in the Clodfelters' basement. The quote, from Oct. 7, 2001, when the president announced U.S. air strikes on Afghanistan, reads: "We will not waver; we will not tire; we will not falter; and we will not fail. Peace and freedom will prevail."

Conversations with Officer Clodfelter four years ago centered on pain and memories; they now veer more easily toward politics.

"I'm very bitter about this," he says, lighting a cigarette -- a pack-a-day habit that hasn't gone away since September 11.

"We're in a time of war and the liberals are not supporting the nation and the troops," Officer Clodfelter says. "George W. Bush has maintained his focus and he's taken the fight to the enemy. What would the non-supporters and liberals be saying now if they're going to their corner cafe to get their lattes and the corner blows up? Or the bus? Or the train? Or the Metro?

"These people want to kill us," he says. "It's not happening here because our people are doing their job."

DOJ_NMG_0062795

Pausing to stub out the cigarette in a small ashtray, Officer Clodfelter adds that he's "very bitter about people like Hillary Clinton and this extreme left that has emerged with people like Cindy Sheehan," the anti-war activist whose son was killed in Iraq.

"George W. Bush was gracious enough to meet with her and yet she kept on pounding on it after the left got ahold of her," he says. "I understand a parent grieving and all, the pain of that, but her son signed on the dotted line. He volunteered to go into the military."

'Short memory'

Officer Clodfelter says his own two sons not only served in the military but were deployed to the Persian Gulf.

Navy Chief Petty Officer Michael Clodfelter, 34, served in the first Gulf war. In the aftermath of September 11, he was deployed to Iraq as a Seabee.

"I wouldn't say I was worried," Officer Clodfelter says. "But I was concerned. Any parent would be with their child going to a combat zone."

His younger son, Alec, is a retired Army staff sergeant now working as a military contractor at Fort Bliss in El Paso, Texas.

Officer Clodfelter says he is more politically conservative today than he was four years ago, partially because "that just happens when you get older."

He also becomes more frustrated with the public -- conservatives and liberals alike -- for not taking civic responsibilities seriously.

"We, as an American people, have a short memory," Officer Clodfelter says. "Half the people don't even know who their state senator is."

He voiced similar sentiments four years ago, when he said "they should run that tape of the Pentagon and the World Trade Center on television channels every day before they go off the air."

He says that view hasn't changed.

"It should be six times a day now, because it's going to happen again. You should put that in bold letters," he says. "I blame the failed foreign policy of appeasement. This is why we're here today. I also blame the terrorists."

Closer to God

When asked whether he forgives the September 11 terrorists, Officer Clodfelter thinks for a long moment before responding: "I forgive them all, but that doesn't mean I like it.

"I have pity for these people. Outright, unadulterated pity because they could be so blind to commit these acts and fall into their Islamic fascist rhetoric," he says. "If you knew anything about the Koran, it says you shall not kill."

During the past four years, Officer Clodfelter adds, he has thought more about religion and a relationship with God. While he doesn't belong to a church, he speaks of an increased sense of faith.

"I don't go to any organized religious environment," Officer Clodfelter says. "I'm in touch with God in my own way. I pray and talk with God every day."

Before September 11, he prayed irregularly. "I was lukewarm," he says.

The years since have brought what Officer Clodfelter describes as intense reflection on morality and the afterlife.

"I think God tailor-makes heaven for each individual," he says. "Now I talk to God every day for an hour on the drive to work. It is my belief that the only thing you need to follow is the Ten Commandments, and that all religions are on the right path."

WAR NEWS:

Discovery Of 65 Bodies In Baghdad Is A Setback For Security Efforts (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick, Huda Ahmed

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Authorities found at least 65 bodies dumped throughout Baghdad on Wednesday, and at least 25 people died in other violence in a setback to the U.S. military's efforts to reduce sectarian violence in Iraq's capital city.

The hands of most of the dumped victims were bound, and they were blindfolded. Most of the dead appeared to have been shot to death, and many showed signs of having been tortured.

DOJ_NMG_0062796

The apparent resurgence in execution-style murders, which are often associated with sectarian violence and death squads, came as U.S. and Iraqi patrols have been sweeping Baghdad neighborhoods in search of insurgents and sectarian militiamen.

Since Operation Forward Together began on Aug. 7, U.S. officials have boasted that such killings in Baghdad declined by more than 50 percent in August, compared with July. U.S. officials wouldn't provide specific numbers, however, and have said that their comparison doesn't include victims of car bombings, mortar attacks and other so-called mass-casualty violence.

Statistics released by the Baghdad morgue suggest that the decline in violence from July to August was less than 18 percent, with 1,529 violent deaths in August and 1,855 in July.

Wednesday's deaths, however, clearly fall into the category that the U.S. military is tracking.

The daily total was the highest since the security sweeps began and the second highest so far this year. The most executions - 80 - occurred on Feb. 23, the day after a Shiite mosque was bombed in Samarra, setting off the current round of violence.

The bodies were dumped throughout the city. Ten were found in the Shula neighborhood in western Baghdad and another 10 were found in Sadr City in the east, both Shiite Muslim strongholds of anti-American cleric Muqtada al Sadr. Forty-five of the victims were discovered in predominantly Sunni Arab parts of western Baghdad, including five in the Dora neighborhood, which had already been swept by U.S. and Iraqi forces, police said. Most of the victims were found in groups of four or five.

U.S. officials said they hadn't been able to verify the reports of the bodies.

Police said they'd been unable to determine a pattern in where the bodies were dropped. None was near police or military checkpoints, police said. Shiite Muslim militias have been accused of infiltrating Iraqi police and army units.

An officer from the police station in the Amel neighborhood in north central Baghdad, speaking on the condition that he not be named, said that many of the incidents appeared to involve day laborers, drivers or police officers who may have been abducted as they began their workdays and then were killed shortly afterward. In most cases, police found no identification on the bodies, which were photographed and taken to the morgue.

Such execution-style killings have become more frequent since the Samarra mosque bombing, although bodies bearing signs of torture have turned up almost daily since 2005.

But the spike in executions may signal that U.S. and Iraqi troops have been unable to quell the activities of death squads as operations begin to slow in anticipation of Ramadan, the month that Muslims devote to fasting. Ramadan begins Sept. 24.

Other violence in Baghdad on Wednesday targeted police convoys or stations. At least 14 people were killed and 67 wounded after a car bomb and an improvised explosive device went off near Al Shaab Stadium in east Baghdad at around 10 a.m. The blast appeared to be targeting a police convoy.

Two hours later, a bomb in a parked car exploded near a police patrol from the Zayona police station in east Baghdad. Eight police officers were killed and 19 civilians were wounded.

Two mortar shells landed on al Rashad police station in southeastern Baghdad, killing a policeman and wounding two others, police said. Two more policemen were killed when two mortar rounds landed near their station in Baghdad's eastern neighborhood of Mashtal. Three others were injured.

Nearly 100 Killed In Baghdad Over 24 Brutal Hours (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, K.I. Ibrahim

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 13 -- Nearly 100 people were killed or found dead in the Iraqi capital over the past 24 hours, authorities said Wednesday, continuing a wave of sectarian violence that has defied American efforts to thwart the carnage.

Sixty-two bullet-riddled corpses -- some of them beheaded and all bearing signs of torture -- had been found dumped in streets throughout the city since Tuesday night, said Brig. Gen. Abdullah Mahmood of the Interior Ministry. Bombings and mortar attacks targeting Iraqi police killed an additional 26 people Wednesday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0062797

In the deadliest attack, a car bomb exploded at 9 a.m. near an indoor stadium in Baghdad, killing 12 traffic policemen and wounding 13, Mahmood said. As a crowd swarmed the scene to aid the wounded, another bomb went off, killing seven civilians and injuring 47.

Mortar shells slammed into a police station in the Mashtal area of eastern Baghdad and a security forces recruiting center near an airfield in the central part of the capital, the Interior Ministry said. Seven people were killed, and 19 were wounded.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of two soldiers, one killed south of Baghdad on Tuesday night when his vehicle was struck by a bomb and the other on Monday during combat in Anbar province.

As the violence flared, leaders of the country's main political parties met to seek agreement on a politically explosive plan to carve the country into a federation of three autonomous regions. The federalism plan would create a Shiite Muslim region in southern Iraq much like the autonomous zone in the north controlled by the Kurds. Sunni Arabs would be left with vast swaths of desert in the middle of the country, an area that lacks the oil reserves in the other regions.

Khalaf Olayan, leader of the Iraqi National Dialogue Front, a Sunni group, said the meeting "focused on the question of time limitations and how we could delay the matter for the time being."

"We believe that a majority of our people do not understand federalism and some believe that if approved, it would lead to the division of the country," he said. "Besides, people now need services first and want things that will help them in their daily lives."

The leaders of all the political blocs will meet again on Saturday to try to resolve the issue, he said.

In Tehran, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki continued his first state visit to Iran by meeting with the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who called on the American military to withdraw from Iraq.

"Once the foreign forces leave Iraq, many of its problems will be solved," Khamenei said, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

At the United Nations, Secretary General Kofi Annan said Wednesday that Middle East leaders told him during a recent tour of the region that the U.S. invasion of Iraq has "been a real disaster for them. They believe that it has destabilized the region."

Annan said there were sharp divisions over an extended U.S. military presence in Iraq. He said that while regional leaders want American troops to remain until security improves, Iran has pressed for a swift U.S. withdrawal.

"The U.S. has found itself in the position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave," he said. "I believe that if it has to leave, the timing has to be optimum, and it has to be arranged in such a way that it does not lead to even greater disruption or violence in the region."

Meanwhile, prosecutors demanded that the chief judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial step down, saying he has shown too much sympathy for the defendants in the case. Chief prosecutor Minqith al-Faroon said the judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, had "allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum."

Hussein, charged with trying to annihilate the country's Kurdish minority during the 1980s Anfal campaign, has sprinkled the court hearings with outbursts accusing various people of being "Zionists" and "agents of Iran." But although the prosecutors criticized the judge, the defendants praised him.

"I swear by Allah, I saw that you were very patient today and listened to what we had to say," one of Hussein's co-defendants, Ali Hassan al-Majeed, known as "Chemical Ali," told the judge Wednesday. "I was pleased that you represent this court."

Kurdish witnesses testified Wednesday about horrific suffering in their villages during the Anfal campaign, in which prosecutors said 182,000 people were killed. The witnesses described an almost visceral urge to tell of the suffering their families and friends endured.

"I am sitting here in this court, with the blind eyes and the burned body, to provide it with scientific and medical evidence," said Omer Othman Mohammed, 42, a former guerrilla fighter from Sulaymaniyah. At one point, he brusquely brushed off a question from the judge and said he needed to tell his story without interruption.

Salah Gader Mohammad Ameen, a 31-year-old Kurd, said his mother, father and two brothers disappeared during the Anfal campaign. He testified that they were discovered only two years ago, when their bodies were found in a mass grave.

"May God have revenge on you!" Ameen shouted at Hussein. "Because of you, I have been deprived of my father."

Death Toll Soars In Baghdad (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD — On a day in which nearly 100 bodies attested to Iraq's unbridled violence, Democrats stepped up their response to President Bush's policies, with former national security advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski calling the war "unwinnable."

Iraqi officials announced they had found the bodies of 60 men, some of whom had been shot in the head after being tortured, over the previous 24 hours. They said there was no single massacre or mass execution. Rather, the slaughter in two Baghdad neighborhoods was probably the result of multiple roving assassination teams, they said.

In addition to the apparent executions, a pair of car bombs and other violence took at least 35 lives and left scores injured Wednesday, officials said. U.S. authorities reported the deaths of two more American soldiers, one killed by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad and the other killed in action in Al Anbar province, the hotbed of the Sunni Arab insurgency in western Iraq.

In his televised speech to the nation Monday, Bush said that U.S. security "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," setting a theme that Republicans hope will sustain support for the war and their candidates between now and November's elections.

Democrats, who have been divided in their own policy toward the war, offered a two-pronged response Wednesday. Brzezinski, the national security advisor under President Carter, accused the administration of committing the country to an unachievable goal. The Bush administration's aim of creating "a secular, stable, democratic Iraq" is "simply unreal," Brzezinski said during an appearance on Capitol Hill with retired Gen. Wesley Clark, the commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization under President Clinton.

Meantime, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a conservative Democrat and former Marine who has become an outspoken critic of the war, said that Iraq had become a crushing burden on the U.S. Army. The war has created equipment shortages and badly strained soldiers as well as Marines, Murtha said.

Army officials responded in a statement that "we are an Army at war and there is a cost to war."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan seemed to join the debate, saying at a news conference in New York that many leaders he had met with on a recent trip to the Middle East felt that the invasion of Iraq "has been a real disaster" that has destabilized the region. But they were divided on whether a departure of U.S. forces would make matters better or worse, he said.

"In a way, the U.S. has found itself in the position where it cannot stay, and it cannot leave," Annan said.

With the war shaping up as the dominant issue in the fall election, the administration and its critics have sought to shape public perception of what the U.S. ambassador here, Zalmay Khalilzad, has labeled the Battle of Baghdad.

The administration's efforts were notable Wednesday, as U.S. and Iraqi authorities disputed each other's accounts of the day's high death toll.

A U.S. military spokesman said the body count for the 24-hour period in question was actually about half of that reported by Iraqi officials. The dispute underscored how statistics on killings here have become hotly contested, particularly since the U.S. military launched a highly publicized security effort earlier in the summer. The security plan included the deployment of 8,000 additional U.S. troops to patrol with Iraqi forces in an effort to bring order to the capital.

"We remain confident that these joint operations continue to be effective in reducing the violence in Baghdad," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman here.

On the Iraqi side, Muayed Matrood, an official at the besieged Baghdad morgue, said Wednesday's body count showed that "the phenomenon of a large number of unidentified and tortured corpses has returned back to Baghdad."

The morgue is due to receive two new refrigeration facilities to help handle the onslaught of corpses. "This is the first time in weeks that a number as large as this has been found within a day," Matrood said.

The Baghdad morgue had reported receiving about 17% fewer bodies in August than in July. That figure had created expectations that a downward trend could continue into this month. But violence increased markedly in the last few days of August and has continued unabated since then, sapping hope that the wanton killings would abate.

The large toll caused hardly a ripple in a capital that seems anesthetized to grim tidings. People went about their business, the government convened meetings, and the discovered corpses didn't amount to major news.

DOJ_NMG_0062799

The 60 bodies were found scattered in two separate neighborhoods, Karkh, a mostly Sunni Muslim area in western Baghdad, where 43 were discovered, and Rusafa, a mostly Shiite Muslim area in eastern Baghdad, where 17 were found.

Most of the victims had gunshot wounds to the head. Some of the bodies were handcuffed and blindfolded and showed signs of torture.

Death squads stalk the streets of this once-tolerant capital, authorities say, targeting victims because of their sect. Many Iraqis fear leaving their neighborhoods, which are increasingly guarded by sectarian militias.

Shiite militiamen are widely regarded as the capital's principal executioners, evoking deep fear among terrorized Sunni Arabs. Other groups, mostly Sunni, have continued their campaign of bombings and other attacks on government officials, most of whom are Shiite.

On Wednesday, a pair of car bombs apparently targeting police killed at least 19 people and wounded 76 in Baghdad, authorities said. One car bomb detonated in a large square near the main headquarters of Baghdad's traffic police department, and the other exploded near a police patrol in the Zayona district.

More than a dozen other people were reported killed by small-arms fire and mortar rounds in Baghdad and its environs.

Among those killed was Safaa Ismael Enad, 31, a freelance photographer who was accosted by two gunmen in a photo studio. The gunmen asked for him by name, a colleague said, before they opened fire.

In all, 79 journalists and 28 media support workers have been killed in Iraq since the war began, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists, a New York-based advocacy group.

On Another Grim Day, Bodies Lie Everywhere In Baghdad (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 13 — Nearly 90 Iraqis were killed or found dead here on Tuesday and Wednesday, an Interior Ministry official said, making for a particularly grim day even amid the intense sectarian violence.

At least 60 bodies were found throughout Baghdad between 6 a.m. Tuesday and 6 a.m. Wednesday, the ministry official said. Forty victims were unknown; 20 were identified.

Nearly all were shot in the head, had clear signs of torture, or were blindfolded, bound or gagged, and most were discovered in neighborhoods of western Baghdad with heavy Sunni Arab populations, he said. The other deaths reported by the ministry were in bombings and other attacks on Wednesday.

American military officials, who have been more aggressive in challenging body counts if they consider them inaccurate, disputed the number found, saying the actual number was roughly half what the ministry had reported.

According to the Baghdad morgue, whose statistics often prove to be higher than figures reported by news services or the Interior Ministry, the bodies of 1,535 victims of violent deaths, an average of 50 a day, were received in August. In July, the average was 60 a day. A recent study of civilian deaths by the United Nations found that by June, Iraqis across the country were being killed at a rate of more than 100 a day.

As the Iraqi police gathered up the bodies, several car bombs rocked Baghdad, killing or wounding dozens more. Among the attacks was a bomb that detonated shortly after 9 a.m. in southern Baghdad, killing 15 people, including 7 Iraqi police officers, and wounding 25 police officers and civilians, an American military spokeswoman said.

The Interior Ministry also said a bomb planted in an unattended car near a police station in eastern Baghdad exploded about 11:30 a.m., killing eight policemen and wounding 19 civilians.

The United States military also said two American soldiers had been killed. One died Monday from wounds sustained in fighting in Anbar Province, the largely insurgent-controlled region west of Baghdad. Another was killed Tuesday south of Baghdad when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb.

In the capital's heavily fortified Green Zone, a prosecutor in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein demanded Wednesday that the judge be removed for showing bias toward the former dictator and for letting him harangue witnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0062800

Mr. Hussein is on trial for his role in the so-called Anfal military campaign in 1988 against Kurdish villages in northeastern Iraq. He and his co-defendants are accused of genocide in the killing at least 50,000 Kurds, including many in chemical weapon strikes.

He was tried earlier this year in the killing of 148 men and boys in 1982 in a Shiite village, Dujail, but that verdict is not expected for another month or two.

During the court session on Tuesday, Mr. Hussein called the Kurdish witnesses who had described atrocities at the hands of Mr. Hussein's military "agents of Iran and Zionism." And he warned witnesses that he would "crush your heads," according to an account by The Associated Press.

As the trial resumed Wednesday morning, a prosecutor, Munqith al-Faroon, accused the judge of letting "the defendants to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words," according to a pool report filed by a reporter for The Daily Telegraph of London. Mr. Faroon said the judge had allowed defendants to "treat the chamber as a political forum."

The judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, who was a judge during Mr. Hussein's rule, responded coolly, not raising his voice. "The judge coordinates and makes peace among the people in his presence," he said.

The court heard a powerful and graphic account from Omer Othman Mohammed, who said he was a member of the Kurdish pesh merga militia who was caught in a chemical-weapon strike by Iraqi jets in April 1988 that left him badly burned from his chest to his legs.

"It was so fast, we were shocked," Mr. Mohammed testified, according to The Daily Telegraph's pool report. "The rockets did not explode, but they just broke. One hit close to me. When it broke, the chemical inside, it covered me. It was a liquid, not a gas. I was shocked. I was in pain.

"There was severe pain as if there was a high pressure on me or as if I was touching an electric current, or as if boiling water was being poured on my body. There are feelings you cannot describe to the people around you, even your loved ones."

Mr. Mohammed said he got up after the attack and saw that pieces of the rockets had sliced through some of his comrades.

"I saw people without their heads, I saw legs and arms," he said. "I saw parts of the body of my beloved friends. I called to a friend of mine and he came to me. I asked him for a mirror and asked him to bring me a first aid kit. I looked at my eyes and they were terribly red. I was suffering from terrible pain."

65 Tortured Bodies Found Around Baghdad (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 13, 2006

The leader of Iraq's biggest Sunni Arab group demanded Wednesday that the beleaguered Shiite-led government take steps to disarm militias after police said the bodies of 65 tortured men were dumped in and around Baghdad.

On a violent day even by the standards of Baghdad, car bombs, mortars and other attacks also killed at least 39 people and wounded dozens. Two U.S. soldiers also were killed, one in enemy action in restive Anbar province on Monday and the other in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad on Tuesday, the U.S. military command said.

The attacks have been unrelenting despite a security crackdown around the capital by 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops. The more than 1,500 violent deaths last month at the height of the joint operation speak to the difficulties in restoring any semblance of security to this sprawling city of 6 million people.

Although Sunni Arabs operate some death squads, the vast majority are run by Shiite militias and gangs.

Shiite political groups, including those in power, claim that armed militias have nothing to do with them and that their own military wings were disarmed months ago and turned into social and humanitarian groups. They claim that armed groups and militias are "rogue" elements beyond their control, but many Sunni Arabs contend that they are in fact controlled by Shiite politicians and clerics.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a Sunni who heads the Iraqi Accordance Front political party, called on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, to take a first step by honoring a pledge to disband militias.

"We hope the government carries out what it pledged and disbands militias and considers them terrorist organizations," al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press. His party is Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc and holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament.

"Their presence is deteriorating the situation and bringing more troubles to the political atmosphere," al-Dulaimi said of militias. "We call upon all religious authorities to raise their voices and demand militias be disarmed."

Police said 60 of the bodies were found overnight around Baghdad, with the majority dumped in predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhoods.

All the bodies were bound, bore signs of torture and had been shot, police said. Such killings are usually the work of death squads who kidnap people and usually torture them with power drills, or beat them, before shooting them execution-style with a bullet to the head.

The U.S. military said it could not confirm all the executions and that their body count so far was lower than that reported by police.

"It is looking like about a 50 percent discrepancy on execution-style killings so far," said Maj. Josslyn Aberle, chief of the media relations division for the Multi-National Corps-Iraq.

The reason for the difference was not immediately clear. The confusion over numbers underscores the difficulty of obtaining accurate death tolls in Iraq, which lacks the reporting and tracking systems of most modern nations. Also, counts by the U.S. military often lag behind those of the police.

According to Iraqi police, 45 of the bodies were discovered in predominantly Sunni Arab parts of western Baghdad. Fifteen were found in predominantly Shiite areas of eastern Baghdad. And five were found floating down the Tigris river in Suwayrah, just south of Baghdad.

In the two bloodiest attacks in the capital, a car bombing killed at least 19 people and wounded more than 62 in a large square used mostly as a parking lot near the main headquarters of Baghdad's traffic police department.

In eastern Baghdad, a parked car bomb exploded next to an Iraqi police patrol in the Zayona neighborhood, killing at least 12 people and wounding 34.

It is believed that some Shiite parties with militias accused of involvement in sectarian killings have support from neighboring Iran. Those parties are also allied with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

Al-Maliki, on a visit to Iran on Wednesday, pressed Tehran to stop interference that is having a "negative" impact on his country's security, his spokesman said in an unusual criticism of an ally with which Baghdad's ties are getting closer.

As al-Maliki met with Iranian leaders for a second day, no public mention was made on the issue of interference. Instead, the Iraqi prime minister and Iranian officials exchanged warm vows of growing friendship.

In Baghdad, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said al-Maliki underlined that "we want the best of relations with Iran and we don't want interference in our internal affairs."

Al-Dabbagh suggested that funding was coming from Iran to groups in Iraq, which he did not identify.

"There is interference coming from neighboring countries and it has negative implications for the situation in Iraq," he told the AP in a telephone interview. "We want to bar financing for certain parties."

"Iran has shown it will help, and we want to see implementation of that," he said.

Sunni Arabs fear more sectarian violence will break out if the largest Shiite political bloc in parliament moves to establish autonomous regions as part of a federal Iraq.

Iraq's parliament speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, urged that a bill drafted by the dominant Shiite United Iraqi Alliance not be submitted until parliament amends the country's new constitution, a process that could drag on for months.

American, British and U.N. officials were also said to be urging a postponement.

Sunni Arabs vehemently oppose the bill, saying it could split the country into three distinct sectarian and ethnic regions that would deprive them of the country's oil wealth.

Federalism is already part of Iraq's new constitution and there is an autonomous Kurdish region in the north. However, special legislation and a referendum would be needed to turn Iraq into a full federation.

DOJ_NMG_0062802

Shiite leaders of the United Iraqi Alliance were sending delegations to Najaf to meet with radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and other prominent Shiites who do not fully support the legislation — but for different reasons than the Sunnis'. Al-Sadr, for example, wants the issue to be discussed only after U.S. troops leave Iraq.

Iran Says U.S. Departure Would Calm Iraq (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, September 13, 2006

Supreme Iranian leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told the visiting Iraqi prime minister Wednesday that the way to end instability in Iraq is for U.S. forces to withdraw.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was on the second day of his first visit to Iran since he taking office in May, looking to a close ally of his Shiite-led government for help in calming the violence tearing apart Iraq and in developing Iraq's troubled oil industry.

He told Khamenei the Iranian governments must stop outside influences that are having a "negative" impact on Iraq's security, the Iraqi leader's spokesman said.

With Iraq torn by sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Muslims, as well as a Sunni-led insurgency, the United States has frequently accused the Iranian regime of interfering in Iraqi politics and allowing insurgents to cross the border. Tehran denies that.

Khamenei told al-Maliki that Iran "considers it an obligation to support the Iraqi government in practical ways," Iran's state news agency said.

But Khamenei — who holds the final word in all political matters in Iran — made clear Iran wants to see the withdrawal of U.S. troops, which he blamed in part for the turmoil plaguing Iraq.

"Part of (Iraq's) sufferings have been due to the actions of the former regime and part is due to the presence of occupiers in Iraq," Khamenei told al-Maliki, according to the Iranian state news agency and state television.

"We hope a day will come when the Iraqi people reach the stage they deserve and that, by cutting the hands of the foreigners, its wealth will come to serve the Iraqi people," Khamenei said.

State TV quoted al-Maliki as saying instability was Iraq's biggest challenge and he blamed the violence mainly on supporters of Saddam's old regime.

No public mention was made of outside meddling in Iraqi affairs. In Baghdad, however, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said al-Maliki underlined that Iraq wants good relations with Iran, but also that "we don't want interference in our internal affairs."

Al-Dabbagh suggested money was flowing from elements in Iran to groups in Iraq, which he did not identify.

It is believed some Shiite parties with militias accused of involvement in sectarian killings have support from groups in Iran, a predominantly Shiite nation. Those parties are also allied to al-Maliki's government, which has struggled to rein in the militias.

"There is interference coming from neighboring countries and it has negative implications for the situation in Iraq," al-Dabbagh told The Associated Press in a telephone interview from Baghdad. "We want to bar financing for certain parties."

"Iran has shown it will help, and we want to see implementation of that," he added.

The comments reflect the complex relationship between Iran and Iraq, which is backed by the United States — Tehran's top enemy. Al-Maliki's Dawa Party is closely allied with Iran as are other Shiite parties in his government, and al-Maliki lived in Iran for part of his long exile during Saddam's rule.

In a meeting with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, al-Maliki thanked Iran for giving haven to Iraqi leaders opposed to Saddam's rule.

"Iraq is Iran's natural ally," state TV quoted Larijani as telling al-Maliki.

In the latest sign of increasing cooperation, the two countries reached a deal for jointly developing oil fields straddling their border, and eventually Iraq will send crude oil to refineries in Iran for processing, Iraq's Oil Ministry said Wednesday.

Iran is also helping Iraq in its chronic shortages of petroleum products. Under a deal reached last month, Iraq will sell crude oil to its neighbor, which will sell back kerosene, and an Iranian-Turkish company will deliver gasoline, Iraqi Oil Ministry spokesman Assem Jihad told AP.

Middle East Riven Over U.S., Annan Says (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

NEW YORK -- Washington's options in Iraq are constrained by competing pressures from countries in the region for the U.S. to stay or to leave quickly, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said yesterday.

"The U.S. has found itself in a position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave," he said at a press conference. "And if it has to leave, the timing has to be optimum and it has to be arranged in such a way that it does not lead to even greater disruption or violence."

Pressed by reporters, he declined to offer suggestions. But in his first extended remarks since returning from a two-week, 11-country trip through the Middle East, Mr. Annan said most regional leaders felt the U.S. occupation of Iraq had harmed their countries.

"Honestly, most of the leaders I spoke to felt invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them. They feel it has destabilized the region," Mr. Annan said.

"Actually, there were two schools," he added. "Many leaders who felt the Americans should stay until the situation improves, and that having created the problem, [they] cannot walk away.

"Then you have another school, particularly in Iran, [where authorities believe] the presence of the U.S. is a problem and the U.S. should leave."

The secretary-general said officials in Tehran told him that "if the U.S. were to decide to leave, they would help them leave." The Iranians did not explain the comment, he said, "but they made it quite clear that the U.S. presence is a problem that must be withdrawn."

The stay-or-go argument has been gathering steam in Washington, where lawmakers are grappling with whether or how to extricate more than 130,000 U.S. troops from an increasingly unpopular war. With November elections looming, politicians from both sides of the aisle are staking out positions for and against a withdrawal.

Iraqi authorities discovered 65 bodies in and around Baghdad yesterday, most of which had been bound and tortured. It was the latest evidence that organized death squads continue to operate in the capital, despite the redeployment of large numbers of American troops to the city.

Also yesterday, car bombings and mortar fire killed 32 persons and wounded 76, according to the Associated Press.

The United Nations has been asked by Iraqi and U.S. officials to take a larger role in the stabilization and rehabilitation of Iraq, a country that sits atop the second-largest oil reserve in the world.

At his press conference, Mr. Annan also praised donor nations and the often-divided U.N. Security Council for acting together to help bring peace and stability to Lebanon after Israel's July invasion, which was prompted by the abduction by Hezbollah militants of two Israeli soldiers.

He also acknowledged frustration with Sudan's refusal to permit an effective international peacekeeping force to enter the western Darfur region and stressed that Iran and the West must work quickly to restore some confidence before negotiations on nuclear uranium enrichment can go forward.

House Dems Review Call For Rumsfeld Resignation (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 14, 2006

Echoing moves in the Senate, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) is calling for the immediate resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Murtha's call comes just as he and Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee, released a new report on the state of U.S. Army readiness.

In his resolution Murtha lists a litany of reasons for Rumsfeld's immediate resignation, ranging from the secretary's insistence that there were weapons of mass in destruction in Iraq to his failure to anticipate the number of troops needed to secure Iraq and to address the flagging readiness of U.S ground troops.

DOJ_NMG_0062804

In recent weeks Democrats have intensified their criticism the GOP and Bush administration policies in Iraq and have stepped up their calls for Rumsfeld's resignation.

"The Defense Secretary should return to the private sector," Obey said at a press conference yesterday.

The newly released readiness report, which served in part as a basis for Murtha's resolution, said that the Army's preparedness has eroded to levels not seen since the Vietnam war, and that the service's readiness will continue to decline as troops continue to fight in Iraq and Afghanistan. The reduction in readiness levels will undermine the Pentagon's ability to respond to future conflicts, the report said.

Roughly one-half of the entire U.S. Army is reported to be at the lowest level of military readiness. The situation in the Army National Guard and Reserves is even worse, the report said.

The vast majority of the 16 active-duty, non-deployed combat brigades in the United States managed by the Army's Forces Command are rated at the lowest readiness ratings because of severe equipment shortages, according to the report.

"The lack of national attention paid to the Army's plight is unconscionable," Murtha told reporters yesterday.

The low readiness rates become a concern for the units scheduled for deployment later this year, particularly for the 1st Cavalry Division, which faces equipment shortfalls.

The new report emphasizes that the Army's major short-term challenge is repairing its battle-worn equipment.

The Army needs an additional $17.1 billion in 2007 to spruce up its equipment. The Senate has approved an additional $13.1 billion to the $50 billion emergency bridge fund in the 2007 defense appropriations bill to deal with both Army and Marine Corps equipment repair. House and Senate conferees on the spending bill will decide the final amount that will be added to that bridge fund.

Meanwhile, the chairmen of the House and Senate Armed Services committees agreed to authorize an additional $20 billion for equipment repair.

Why We Can't Send More Troops (WP)

By Lawrence J. Korb And Peter Ogden

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

In "Reinforce Baghdad" [op-ed, Sept. 12], William Kristol and Rich Lowry argue that the United States needs to deploy "substantially" more troops to Iraq to stabilize the country. Aside from the strategic dubiousness of their proposal -- Kristol and Lowry's piece might alternatively have been titled "Reinforcing Failure" -- there is a practical obstacle to it that they overlook: Sending more troops to Iraq would, at the moment, threaten to break our nation's all-volunteer Army and undermine our national security. This is not a risk our country can afford to take.

In their search for additional troops and equipment for Iraq, the first place that Kristol and Lowry would have to look is the active Army. But even at existing deployment levels, the signs of strain on the active Army are evident. In July an official report revealed that two-thirds of the active U.S. Army was classified as "not ready for combat." When one combines this news with the fact that roughly one-third of the active Army is deployed (and thus presumably ready for combat), the math is simple but the answer alarming: The active Army has close to zero combat-ready brigades in reserve.

The second place to seek new troops and equipment is the Army National Guard and Reserve. But the news here is, if anything, worse. When asked by reporters to comment on the strain that the active Army was under, the head of the National Guard said that his military branch was "in an even more dire situation than the active Army. We both have the same symptoms; I just have a higher fever."

Already, the stress of Iraq and Afghanistan on our soldiers has been significant: Every available active-duty combat brigade has served at least one tour in Iraq or Afghanistan, and many have served two or three. Likewise, the vast majority of Army National Guardsmen and Reservists have been mobilized since Sept. 11, 2001, some more than once.

Thus the simple fact is that the only way for Kristol and Lowry to put their new plan into action anytime soon without resorting to a draft -- and thereby dismantling the all-volunteer Army, which, as the authors themselves would certainly admit, could be strategically disastrous -- is by demanding even more from our soldiers by accelerating their training and rotation schedules. While there is no question that the soldiers would respond to more frequent calls to duty, it is doubtful that they would be supplied with proper equipment and training for their mission in the near term. Moreover, the long-term toll on the cost and quality of our troops would be threatened by the added strain.

First, the equipment shortage that the U.S. Army faces at the moment is making it difficult to train troops even at current levels. The service has been compensating for this $50 billion equipment shortfall by shipping to Iraq some of the equipment that it needs to train nondeployed and reserve units. Increasing the number of deployed troops would compound this readiness problem and leave the Army with little spare capacity to respond to other conflicts around the globe that might demand immediate and urgent action.

Second, the long-term costs of leaning even more heavily on our ground troops to fight what is an unpopular war will take its toll on the quality of our Army. At present the Army is compelled to offer promotions to an unprecedented number of its personnel to retain them. Some 98 percent of captains were promoted to major this year, and the quality of the next generation of military leaders will suffer if this process is not made more selective once again.

In addition, even the quadrupling of recruitment bonuses since 2003 has not been enough to attract adequate numbers of talented men and women to meet the Army's personnel goals. Although the Army has accepted more troops with lower aptitude scores and raised its maximum enlistment age, it still must grant waivers to about 1 out of 5 new recruits and has had to cut in half the number who "wash out" in basic training.

While we disagree with Kristol and Lowry's contention that sending more troops to Iraq would bring peace and stability to the country, the U.S. Army and National Guard and Reserve should nevertheless possess the capacity to respond to such a plan or other deployments without undue strain and long-term costs. The solution is to do two things that the Bush administration has not: permanently increase the number of troops in the active Army and fully fund its equipment needs. Let this, not the expenditure of more blood and treasure in Iraq, be the "courageous act of presidential leadership" that Kristol and Lowry desire.

Lawrence J. Korb was assistant secretary of defense for manpower, installations and logistics during the Reagan administration. He and Peter Ogden work on national security issues at the Center for American Progress.

50 Killed In Widespread Afghan Violence (AP)

By Paul Garwood

AP, September 13, 2006

NATO nations failed to agree on calls by military commanders for 2,500 extra troops to help crush the growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan, where at least 50 people were killed Wednesday in widespread violence.

NATO announced that 173 people — including 151 Afghan civilians — have been killed in suicide bombings across the country since the start of the year. The remaining victims include NATO and U.S.-led coalition forces and Afghan authorities.

It was the first time NATO released such figures and they indicate the dangerous change in tactics by militants, who have been following the lead of insurgent attacks in Iraq.

The ferocity of the Taliban resurgence since their 2001 ouster has taken U.S. and NATO commanders by surprise, particularly in southern provinces where NATO forces have been clashing daily with militants since taking control of the region on Aug. 1.

"Such blatant disregard for human life and potential undertaken by insurgents who callously ask to be called mujahedeen (holy warriors) cannot be more clear," NATO spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig said.

U.S. officials announced after a Kabul car bombing Friday that killed 16 — including two American troops — that a suicide bombing cell was hunting foreign troops in the capital.

Meanwhile, thousands of Canadian troops reclaimed more contested territory from Taliban fighters in the southern Kandahar province insurgent hotbeds of Panjwayi and Zhari. NATO forces claim to have killed at least 517 militants in both districts since launching a large-scale campaign on Sept. 2 dubbed Operation Medusa.

Purported Taliban spokesmen dispute the death toll and claim in videotapes that they are pushing NATO forces to the limit across the vast deserts and mountain ranges of Helmand and Kandahar provinces.

DOJ_NMG_0062806

Some 8,000 Canadian, British and Dutch soldiers — almost half of the 20,000-strong NATO force — are leading the anti-Taliban push in the south. But military chiefs say another 2,500 troops, plus greater air support, would help them crush the Taliban threat more quickly.

In Brussels, Belgium, allied military experts failed Wednesday to commit more troops, planes and helicopters to the NATO mission, despite a plea by the alliance's American commander, Gen. James L. Jones.

"No formal offers were made at the table," said NATO spokesman James Appathurai. He told a news conference some allies had given "positive indications" on the reinforcements, but suggested final decisions may have to wait until a Sept. 28-29 meeting of NATO defense ministers in Slovenia.

In Kabul, another NATO spokesman, Mark Laity, said NATO forces were only at "85 percent of the capabilities we were told we would have" to fight between 4,000 to 7,000 insurgents believed active in the country.

"These extra forces are needed because we are in a particularly intense environment," Laity told The Associated Press. "But Operation Medusa proves that we have considerable capabilities that we can do a considerable amount with."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said all NATO members had a responsibility to back the alliance's Afghan cause.

"NATO is looking at what further requirements there are and NATO and NATO countries have got a duty to respond," he told reporters in London.

In southern Helmand province, police killed 16 Taliban in a mountainous area outside the town of Garmser, which militants recently took over for the second time in two months, before Afghan and NATO forces claimed it again on Monday.

Garmser police chief Ghulam Rassoul said the militants were killed in a four-hour battle that began late Tuesday and continued into Wednesday.

Afghan and U.S.-led coalition forces also killed between 20 and 30 Taliban on Wednesday in raids on three villages in central Ghazni province, Afghan officials said.

In western Farah province, four police and four insurgents were killed after militants ambushed a police convoy, said Farah provincial chief of police, Gen. Sayed Agha Saqeb.

In other violence around Afghanistan:

• A U.N. aid worker was killed Tuesday when militants fired on his car in a remote Farah village.

• A suicide attacker was the sole victim when his bomb exploded inside a Sunni Muslim mosque in Kandahar, police said. The motive for the blast was unclear.

• A roadside bomb killed a border police guard chief and three other officers in eastern Kunar province Wednesday, police said.

• In the eastern Nangarhar province, where al-Qaida militants have long been active, two rockets were fired into the provincial capital of Jalalabad several hours before Afghan President Hamid Karzai and the Pakistani premier opened a new road. No casualties were reported.

NATO Allies Ignore Call For Troops (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

NATO allies failed to answer Washington's call to commit more troops to the escalating battle with Taliban and al Qaeda fighters in Afghanistan yesterday, prompting the Bush administration to rethink its diplomatic strategy ahead of two meetings of alliance ministers later this month.

U.S. officials said they still hoped that countries would come forward, noting that some interest in providing forces was expressed at the Brussels session, but they also indicated that they would target specific NATO members with capabilities to step up to the task.

"We have some thoughts in mind of countries that might contribute additional forces," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack. "We are going to be having those conversations, obviously, in coordination with the NATO leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0062807

Yesterday's urgent meeting at the alliance's headquarters in the Belgian capital was called after NATO commanders issued an appeal last week for up to 2,500 extra troops in southern Afghanistan in the face of surprisingly strong Taliban resistance.

However, "no formal offers were made at the table," said NATO spokesman James Appathurai, even though there were some "positive indications" from several members, which he did not name.

Victoria Nuland, the U.S. ambassador to NATO, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that Washington wants "to have more punch" in the Afghan mission "no later than the beginning of October, because this is an essential season before the cold comes in Afghanistan."

But NATO officials said it is not likely that a decision about an expanded force will be made before the end of September, when alliance defense ministers are scheduled to meet in Slovenia, one of the newest members.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to host a meeting of fellow foreign ministers in New York during the opening of the U.N. General Assembly session next week, and U.S. officials said they plan to use the occasion for aggressive diplomacy.

There are about 18,500 NATO troops currently in Afghanistan, but most of them operate in the capital, Kabul, and other regions, rather than in the troublesome south. The force there is led by Britain, which has about 4,500 troops in the entire country. The United States, Canada and the Netherlands have about 2,000 each, while Romania, Denmark and others have smaller contingents.

About 30 NATO soldiers have been killed since the alliance took over the force in Afghanistan earlier this summer.

"It is important that the whole of NATO regards this as their responsibility," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said yesterday. "NATO is looking at what further requirements there are, and NATO and NATO countries have got a duty to respond to that."

But many European governments have said that their forces are stretched too thin with their current deployments in Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon, Ivory Coast, Congo and the Balkans.

The German Defense Ministry on Tuesday ruled out sending troops to southern Afghanistan, saying that its existing deployment of 2,900 troops in the country's north has taken it close to a limit of 3,000 set by parliament.

Spain, France and Italy already have contingents in western Afghanistan and in Kabul, and recently committed troops to the expanded U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon. Turkey has ruled out sending any reinforcements.

NATO said yesterday that 173 persons, including 151 Afghan civilians, have been killed in suicide bombings across the country so far this year. At least 50 persons were killed yesterday in widespread violence.

Poland Is Best Hope For Afghan Force (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Stephen Fidler, And Jan Cienski

Financial Times, September 14, 2006

Poland emerged on Wednesday as Nato's best hope of more troops for Afghanistan, after a formal meeting of the alliance failed to meet an urgent military request for hundreds of extra soldiers.

The Polish defence ministry said Warsaw, which has announced plans to withdraw its 900 soldiers from Iraq, was in talks with its Nato allies about where and when they would be deployed in Afghanistan. Poland, which has about 100 troops in Afghanistan, has already announced it will send about 900 extra soldiers to the country from 2007.

Diplomats said it might be possible to speed up the Polish deployment. One Nato official said: "We are close to getting substantial contributions from at least two European countries not currently in the south [of Afghanistan]." He declined to name them. At present, the fight in the south is being led by troops from Canada, Britain and the Netherlands.

The push for reinforcements, preferably to arrive before the hard Afghan winter sets in, has put the spotlight both on Nato's struggle to help establish a stable government in Afghanistan and on its long-term prospects as a military alliance.

At an emergency meeting yesterday, Nato's 26 member countries came up with no commitments for any new soldiers – in spite of a call last week by General James Jones, Nato's supreme commander, for up to 2,500 troops. But officials believe that the likely offers from the two European countries should meet Gen Jones' most important demand – for a 800-1,000 strong reserve battalion to aid Nato's fight against the Taliban-led insurgency in south Afghanistan.

Nato said: “We have had indications in terms of force generation to fill the outstanding requirement . . . the operation commanders, including Gen Jones, are confident that they have sufficient forces in the theatre to be able to complete the operation successfully.” The alliance said it had managed to clear Taliban insurgents from 55 per cent of the area surrounding their former stronghold of Kandahar.

Lord Garden, a former senior air force officer who acts as a defence spokesman for Britain’s Liberal Democratic party, said: “Part of the problem . . . is Nato funding. If you volunteer, not only do you provide the troops, you have to provide the money to fund them.”

Diplomats sought to emphasise that the Nato mission was a long way from failure. Victoria Nuland, US ambassador to Nato, said: “One of the things that is getting lost here is that the operation against the Taliban is a huge success. The extra troops will allow us to win faster and more decisively and to continue reconstruction at the same time.”

However, casualties taken by British troops in the southern province of Helmand have increased controversy over the mission.

Military Will Meet '06 Recruiting Goals (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The U.S. Armed Forces will meet wartime recruiting goals for the fiscal year that ends in two weeks, military officials said yesterday.

Despite Washington's heated political debate on the worthiness of the Iraq war, frequent overseas war deployments and daily casualties, officials say a sufficient number of young men and women are signing up with the Army, Air Force, Navy and Marine Corps in fiscal 2006 to maintain an active-duty force of about 1.4 million.

The Army, which has suffered the largest death toll as the chief provider of troops in Afghanistan and Iraq, reports that it has exceeded a goal of 70,200 recruits by signing up 72,997 as of August. Officials say they expect to meet a Sept. 30 goal of 80,000 for the fiscal year.

The Army missed its goal two years ago for the first time since 1999, sparking fears that the stress of the global war on terrorism and daily reports of soldier deaths were discouraging high school graduates from joining.

Hitting the mark in a time of war has cost the Army more money -- and style. In June, it raised the maximum age for recruits from 38 to 42, and says it has attracted scores of veterans. And it relaxed tattoo rules. Now, body art can extend above the neck.

"We learned more and more teenagers have tattoos, so we relaxed the tattoo policy," said Maj. Nathan Banks, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon.

The Army also is offering increased college tuition reimbursement and sign-up bonuses up to $40,000.

Of exceeding the recruiting goal, Maj. Banks said, "It's always better to have more than less. We don't stop."

The Marine Corps, which has troops in the restive and deadly Anbar province in Iraq, also will meet its goal this fiscal year of 32,701 active-duty recruits and 5,930 reservists, said Maj. Wes Hayes, a spokesman for Marine Corps Recruiting Command. He said the Corps has not increased incentives.

"Our success is all attributed to those 2,650 Marine Corps recruiters, their tireless efforts, their professionalism at informing and educating young men and women about the Marine Corps," he said.

The Pentagon reports that the Navy and Air Force also are meeting recruitment goals.

The Army is still encountering shortfalls in Reserve recruiting. It stands at 94 percent of a targeted 33,124 by the end of August. The Army National Guard is a few tenths of a percent below its goal.

Gay Groups Renew Drive Against "Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell" (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

MADISON, Wis. —The three young men who tried to enlist at an Army recruiting station here appeared to be first-rate military material.

DOJ_NMG_0062809

Two were college students, and the other was a college graduate. They had no criminal records. They were fit and eager to serve at a time when wars on two fronts have put a strain on American troops and the need for qualified recruits is great.

But the recruiter was forced to turn them away, for one reason: they are gay and unwilling to conceal it.

"Don't judge me because of my sexuality," said one of the three, Justin Hager, 20, a self-described Republican from a military family who has "a driving desire to join" the armed forces. "Judge me because of my character and drive."

As the Pentagon's search for soldiers grows more urgent, gay rights groups are making the biggest push in nearly a decade to win repeal of a compromise policy, encoded in a 1993 law and dubbed "don't ask, don't tell," that bars openly gay people from serving in the military.

The policy, grounded in a belief that open homosexuality is damaging to unit morale and cohesion, stipulates that gay men and lesbians must serve in silence and refrain from homosexual activity, and that recruiters and commanders may not ask them about their sexual orientation in the absence of compelling evidence that homosexual acts have occurred.

The push for repeal follows years of legal setbacks, as well as discord among gay rights groups about how, or even whether, to address the issue. Now, rather than rely on the courts, advocates are focusing on drumming up support in towns across the nation, spotlighting the personal stories of gay former service members and pushing a Democratic bill in the House that would do away with the policy.

In August the gay rights group Soulforce opened a national campaign by recruiting openly gay people, including the three young men in Madison, who would have enlisted in the military if not for "don't ask, don't tell." [As part of that campaign, two young people who were rejected as applicants on Tuesday at a recruitment center in Chicago returned there on Wednesday and engaged in a sit-in. They were arrested but later released without charges.]

The move to change the policy faces stiff resistance from the Pentagon and Republicans in Congress, who, in a time of war during a tough election year, have no longing for another contentious debate about gay troops. The House bill, introduced last year by Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, has picked up 119 supporters, but only five of them Republicans.

"In the near term, it has zero chance," said Daniel Gouré, a vice president at the centrist Lexington Institute. "It's hard to see how anyone would want to give potential opponents any ammunition to knock them off."

A 2004 report by the Urban Institute concluded that at least 60,000 gay people were serving in the armed forces, including the Reserves and the National Guard. But since 1993, at least 11,000 members have been discharged for being openly gay, among them 800 in highly crucial jobs, according to the Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm.

For all of that, gay rights groups, gay veterans and some analysts say much has changed since the policy was adopted. A Gallup poll in 2004 found that 63 percent of respondents favored allowing gay troops to serve openly, and a similar survey, by the Pew Research Center this year, put the number at 60 percent; those majorities did not exist in 1993. Young people in particular now have more tolerant views about homosexuality.

In addition, 24 foreign armies, most notably those of Britain and Israel, have integrated openly gay people into their ranks with little impact on effectiveness and recruitment. In Britain, where the military was initially forced to accept gay troops by the European Court of Human Rights, gay partners are now afforded full benefits, and the Royal Navy has called on a gay rights group to help recruit gay sailors.

The new debate on "don't ask, don't tell" also coincides with multiple deployments that are being required of many American troops by a military that has lowered its standards to allow more high school dropouts and some convicted criminals to enlist.

"Would you rather have a felon than a gay soldier?" said Capt. Scott Stanford, a heterosexual National Guard commander of a headquarters company who returned from Iraq in June. "I wouldn't."

Lt. Gen. Daniel W. Christman, retired, former superintendent at West Point and onetime assistant to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said both the British experience and the shifts in attitudes at home would cause the American armed forces to change, though slowly.

DOJ_NMG_0062810

"It is clear that national attitudes toward this issue have evolved considerably in the last decade," said General Christman, now a senior vice president at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "This has been led by a new generation of service members who take a more relaxed and tolerant view toward homosexuality."

In fact, a growing number of gay service members have told advocacy groups that fewer heterosexual troops are making homosexuality an issue. In some cases, they say, commanders look the other way when someone is suspected of being gay or even avows it, especially if that service member is valuable. Since the war in Afghanistan began in 2001, discharges of openly gay members have fallen by 40 percent.

"People are really blasé about the issue," said Tim Smith, 24, a former marine who was discharged last year after a civilian chaplain, told of Mr. Smith's homosexuality by congregants, alerted his commander.

Mr. Smith, who was married when he entered the Marine Corps in 2001, hopes to dispel a stereotype of the "promiscuous, night-going, street-dancing" gay man by telling his story and sharing the reaction that disclosure of his orientation elicited. That reaction was largely favorable. At the end, he said, his commander even told the commanding general in a letter that Mr. Smith would be impossible to replace.

On the other side of the divide, Elaine Donnelly, president of the conservative Center for Military Readiness, said permitting gay men and lesbians to serve openly would prompt recruitment rates to drop and disrupt unit cohesion, a linchpin in the decision to allow gay troops to serve only in silence.

"People in the military live in conditions of little or no privacy," said Ms. Donnelly, who advocates a full ban on gay troops. "In conditions of forced intimacy, people should not have to expose themselves to other persons who are sexually attracted to them."

Further, the policy lets unhappy troops, straight or gay, ditch the military service to which they have committed. About 85 percent of those discharged under the policy had declared a homosexual orientation, according to the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, a gay rights watchdog; roughly half that number had volunteered the information simply to get out of the military.

"It lets people kind of get out of jail free," said Aaron Belkin, director of the Center for the Study of Sexual Minorities in the Military, a research group at the University of California, Santa Barbara, that has sided with the effort to eliminate "don't ask, don't tell."

Mr. Hager, the young man rejected at the recruiting center here in August along with John Alaniz, 25, and Derek House, 19, had expected that outcome. Joining the Soulforce campaign, he said, was about making a point.

He had tried to enlist in the Navy in high school, when his sexual orientation was still hidden, and had scored high in his aptitude test. His father had served in Vietnam, and his grandfather, a concentration camp survivor, had instilled in him a drive to safeguard America. But a broken ankle dashed his plans then.

This time it was his own words that sidelined him.

"I am openly homosexual," he said, "and that opportunity won't be there for me."

The President's Lawyer And Paradigm Change (SCRIPPS)

By Jose De La Isla

Scripps Howard, September 14, 2006

Commentary By JOSE DE LA ISLA

President Bush has finally announced that 14 terrorist suspects will go on trial. He has acknowledged the detainees have been in CIA hands and are now in military custody. Congress still has to authorize court procedures for the trials. This is a pivotal moment. It is a "paradigm change," a time when one conceptual way of understanding could give way to another.

Alberto Gonzales, as Bush's legal counselor in the White House before becoming U.S. attorney general, will continue as a central character. He is without peer in putting the policies together.

Not since Robert F. Kennedy was working for his brother JFK have the White House and Justice Department driven such fundamental change. The enigmatic, secretive Gonzales will have a lasting effect on future presidencies.

Before going to the White House, Gonzales had been Gov. George W. Bush's legal advisor, Texas' secretary of state, and then chief justice on the state Supreme Court.

He was from the beginning a close, trusted member of the Bush team. Although Washington hands did not immediately peg him as intimately associated as Karl Rove, Karen Hughes and Harriet Miers, he was.

According to a new book by Bill Minutaglio, "The President's Counselor: The Rise to Power of Alberto Gonzales" (Rayo Books, 2006), he was the closest, the keeper of family secrets, and the one who understood what Bush wanted to accomplish. Minutaglio's tome is strongest in summarizing mountains of news accounts, providing context and connecting the dots, showing how decisions were made. The account is weakest when he tries to interpret Gonzales' Hispanic and family background. What emerges is Gonzales and Bush virtually joined at the hip.

What Karl Rove has been to Bush's political planning, Gonzales has been to legal strategy. Before 9/11, Gonzales had assembled a group of lawyers, mainly members of the Federalist Society, in the White House's Office of Legal Counsel. The conservative organization holds that the Constitution has a fixed and knowable meaning and they oppose interpretations that cast it as having an evolving significance.

He and his group were leaders on legal policy issues, even over the Justice Department, national security advisor Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell at the State Department, mostly because Gonzales had the president's ear.

From the White House, Timothy Flanigan, Bradford Berenson and Brett Kavanaugh, among others, sought to fast-track, streamline and broaden presidential authority.

The attacks of 9/11 only accelerated that approach, called "forward leaning," to anticipate, detect, detain and prosecute suspects and those who maintained ties to or supported suspected terrorist activities.

These White House lawyers understood that in order for the United States to have the upper hand on the enemy, it needed an ability to get information and take preemptive measures.

Much of what happened next is widely known. The definition of torture was tweaked to make it not torture. The Geneva Convention was considered confining, "quaint," and ignored. Suspects have been held and transported to secret prisons, called "extraordinary rendition." Domestic wiretapping occurred without court authorization and it circumvented oversight.

The fast-tracking, streamlining, and broadening of presidential powers rolled over Congress, which granted broad authority in its resolution of Sept. 14 and the Patriot Act. Otherwise, Congress was not a full partner in granting and overseeing war powers. Now it has to decide whether to go along with the Bush administration's proposal for trying terrorists.

Through it all, Gonzales was there, in the middle of the legal justifications for the hallmarks of this administration. He had a hand in or he could have intervened before ideas reached the president on paper. But to the legal team that worked for him, the assumption all along was Alberto Gonzales represented the direction the president wanted.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

AG Office Says Criminal Charges Possible Within Week As HP Reshuffles Board (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-Criminal charges could come within a week in the boardroom spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co., the state Attorney General's Office said Wednesday.

Spokesman Tom Dresslar did not say who would be charged or what the charges would be. He also emphasized that it may take longer for the detailed investigation to produce charges.

"We're not going to confine ourselves to any particular timetable," Dresslar said. "We'll go when we're ready to go, and not a minute before that."

DOJ_NMG_0062812

On Tuesday, Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he already had enough evidence to charge HP insiders and the private investigators who impersonated board members and journalists in order to access logs of their personal phone calls.

"We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside," Lockyer told PBS' "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer."

He has said HP's internal probe of media leaks violated two California laws governing identity theft and illegal access to computer records.

The FBI and the U.S. attorney for Northern California are also investigating HP for illegal computer intrusion and wiretapping. The company also faces inquiries by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission and the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee.

On Tuesday, the company announced that Chairwoman Patricia Dunn would step down in January and be replaced by chief executive Mark Hurd.

Dunn has admitted authorizing the investigation into who was leaking boardroom secrets to reporters, but said she was appalled that private investigators hired by the company used Social Security numbers to impersonate HP directors and reporters, then persuaded phone companies to turn over detailed logs of their home phone calls.

The ruse - known as "pretexting" - is commonly used by private investigators but is against the law, according to Lockyer.

Dunn would appear to be the most likely HP insider to be charged in the criminal probe, but legal experts said investigators must prove that she knew the investigators would be engaging in illegal activity.

"If she had no idea that anyone was going to be involved in this type of conduct, then under our system of justice she shouldn't be prosecuted," said Ken Sukhia, a former U.S. attorney in Tallahassee, Florida.

It's unclear who did know that personal phone records were being compromised by the investigators.

One of the firms HP hired to conduct the probe is Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., according to The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal, citing people familiar with authorities' probes.

That business' address and phone number match those of a law firm with an office in downtown Boston, Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata. One staff member who would not identify herself Wednesday told The Associated Press she had never heard of Security Outsourcing Solutions. Another woman referred inquiries to partner John Kiernan, who was not immediately available for comment.

Two other board members who became ensnared in the leaks investigation are unlikely to be charged.

At a board meeting in May, Dunn identified director George Keyworth III as the source of a January article on CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com. The board asked Keyworth, 66, to resign, but he refused. HP then barred him from seeking re-election.

Keyworth, HP's longest serving board members, resigned Tuesday. He acknowledged speaking to reporters but said he did so with the company's approval.

The attempt to oust Keyworth last spring riled another board member, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, 74, who stormed out of the May 18 meeting. His lawyer later pressed HP to reveal the reason for his resignation, which led to the SEC filing last week in which the company revealed its leaks investigation.

Two lawyers also were allegedly involved in the pretexting scandal.

Larry Sonsini, a noted Silicon Valley legal mind, served as an outside adviser to the HP board during the investigation. In an e-mail exchange with Perkins in June, obtained by The Wall Street Journal, Sonsini said he was not involved in "the design or conduct of the investigation," but that it appeared to be legal.

Sonsini also warned Perkins not to talk to outsiders about confidential board processes and deliberations because that would be a breach of his responsibilities as an HP board member.

In his e-mail, Sonsini says Ann Baskins, HP's general counsel, vetted the leak investigation and believed it to be legal.

California Attorney General Takes H-P Spotlight (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Now that Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board has taken steps to address its investigation of boardroom leaks, attention is firmly fixed on Bill Lockyer, the California attorney general who has made high-profile pledges to bring any lawbreakers to justice.

On Tuesday, Mr. Lockyer said he had enough evidence to indict people inside and outside H-P on charges related to obtaining personal phone records of directors and journalists without authorization. A spokesman for the attorney general said the first criminal charges could be filed within a week.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Lockyer added that he is looking beyond a Boston-area investigation firm linked to the H-P probe to a "complicated chain" of parties in multiple states that may have taken part in a practice called "pretexting," in which private phone records were obtained under false pretenses. (See related article1.) He said he has spoken about the case with Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly, whose office is cooperating.

Mr. Lockyer's remarks indicate that his investigation has expanded well beyond the borders of California. They also raise the profile of a man who many people outside the state have never heard of, a veteran brawler who has shown little hesitation in going after legal scofflaws and political foes.

Since first elected as California's top law-enforcement officer in 1998, Mr. Lockyer has taken on energy companies for price-gouging in California, turned up the heat on sex offenders and launched a high-profile crackdown on abusive nursing homes.

At the same time, he has sued the Bush administration repeatedly to try to block a range of initiatives he considers detrimental to the environment, including increased logging. In 2003, the Democratic Mr. Lockyer locked horns with California's Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, when he suggested the Hollywood action hero submit to a third-party investigation into allegations he had groped a series of women. Mr. Schwarzenegger's staff angrily criticized the attorney general for making public a private conversation with the then governor-elect.

Now, the 65-year-old Mr. Lockyer has thrust himself into once-private matters at H-P that have suddenly become very public.

H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, who pushed for the investigation of board leaks, this week agreed to relinquish her chairmanship to Chief Executive Mark Hurd. George Keyworth, a director whose phone records were improperly obtained and was accused of leaking information, agreed to resign.

New details of the probe continue to emerge. In addition to scrutinizing phone records, people familiar with the matter say human and possibly video surveillance was involved; private investigators attended speeches by at least one of the company's directors and followed this person to see if the board member met any journalists, they say. Ms. Dunn, in an e-mail to employees Tuesday, disclosed that two H-P employees had been investigated, as well as certain directors and "a number of individuals outside the company, including journalists." An H-P spokesman declined to comment on the possible use of human and video surveillance, or to identify any people cited in Ms. Dunn's email.

In May, H-P director Thomas Perkins resigned in anger after the board was presented with results of the investigation. He subsequently complained to Mr. Lockyer's office as well as the Justice Department. The Federal Bureau of Investigation confirmed this week that it is investigating the matter.

Mr. Lockyer said yesterday that three state criminal statutes were involved in the investigation: illegally accessing and using computer data; accessing personal-identification information and using it for illegal purposes; and using deceit to obtain records from a utility, such as a phone company. Any of those crimes could be charged as a misdemeanor or a felony, he said. A misdemeanor would carry a one-year maximum prison sentence, and a felony a three-year maximum term.

Making charges in the case stick could prove fairly straightforward, some lawyers say. Erwin Shustak, managing partner of Shustak & Partners in San Diego, said prosecutors can prove a felony by showing a defendant deliberately obtained someone's phone records or other personal information, used it for an unlawful purpose and did so without the owner's permission.

Such a charge most likely would be filed against the contractor who actually did the pretexting, Mr. Shustak added. Any charges filed against anyone inside H-P more likely would involve the state felonies of aiding and abetting or conspiracy, he said.

"Prosecutors would have to show H-P knew or should have known the contractor acted with malicious intent to get what they wanted," he said.

The company's probe was overseen by the office of H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins, which relied on outside private investigators. Ms. Baskins hasn't been available to comment, and H-P spokesmen have declined to comment on her role in the affair.

Few prosecutors routinely make public comments about charges before they are filed. FBI officials, by contrast, have declined to comment beyond confirming their inquiry. But Mr. Lockyer, in the interview, said he doesn't expect conflicts with federal investigators.

"We try to cooperate and work together," he said. "Sometimes that's effective and sometimes not."

Politics are one reason to keep a high profile: Forced to give up his attorney general's job because he has served a two-term maximum in the post, Mr. Lockyer is running for election in November to be California treasurer. Polls show Mr. Lockyer holding a double-digit lead over his Republican opponent.

But Mr. Lockyer's supporters say he is motivated more by passion for a job they say he is leaving only because he has no choice. "Bill Lockyer is not afraid of taking on a sacred cow, it's in his nature," said Jim Brulte, a political consultant who until 2004 was head of the California Senate's Republican minority.

During the 2000-01 California electricity crisis, Mr. Lockyer sparked a controversy when he told The Wall Street Journal that "I would love to personally escort [Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay] to an 8x10 cell that he could share with a tattooed dude who says 'Hi my name is Spike, honey.'" Earlier this year, Mr. Lay was convicted on federal fraud and conspiracy charges arising from the energy giant's collapse. He subsequently died of heart problems.

Calif. Attorney General May Be HP's Biggest Scandal Hurdle (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard's attempt to quell its boardroom scandal may be stymied by an unexpected source: California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

Lockyer is gathering evidence against employees of Hewlett-Packard and its contractors, his office confirmed Wednesday. His office is being helped by Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly.

Lockyer has repeatedly said HP committed a crime when it used subterfuge to obtain the phone records of nine journalists and at least two board members. His office says it's too soon to say when indictments might be handed out.

The Department of Justice, FBI, House Energy and Commerce Committee, and Securities and Exchange Commission also have launched inquiries.

But outspoken Lockyer may be HP's biggest threat. The life-long politician is often “greatly underestimated,” says Los Angeles defense attorney Mark Geragos, who is both Lockyer's friend and rival.

Lockyer has held state office since 1973 without ever losing an election. He earned his law degree while simultaneously serving as a state senator. As attorney general, he has taken on energy giants and the Bush administration. He once left his own wedding reception to appear on television about the Laci Peterson murder trial.

But the HP case will be a challenge, legal experts say. In an attempt to stop leaks to the press, HP hired a detective firm, which hired a subcontractor. Employees of the subcontractor pretended to be HP board members and journalists to get their phone records.

There's no one California law against the practice, called “pretexting.” But Lockyer's staff is considering prosecuting under fraud laws, including those that prohibit identity theft and unauthorized use of computer data.

To do so, they will have to prove that HP staffers knew about the lies, says law professor Jill Fisch at the Fordham University School of Law. That can be difficult, but Fisch says Lockyer wouldn't have been so vocal about the case if he didn't have strong evidence.

Lockyer began examining pretexting long ago. In March, he filed a lawsuit against Data Trace, a company accused of stealing cellphone records and selling the data. The case is pending.

DOJ_NMG_0062815

But independent tech analyst Rob Enderle says Lockyer may be going after HP mainly for publicity in an election year.

Lockyer is being forced out of his job by term limits. He considered a run for governor, and raised $10 million. But, in the face of stiff opposition in the form of incumbent Arnold Schwarzenegger, he decided to run for treasurer instead.

Robert Stern, head of the Center for Governmental Studies, says family may be one reason Lockyer changed his mind. (Lockyer, 65, is married to 35-year-old attorney Nadia Davis Lockyer, and has a young son in addition to an adult daughter.)

But Stern says Lockyer still has plenty to prove. "He's very bright, and very ambitious," he says.

Tiny Firm's H.P. Link Scrutinized (NYT)

By Matt Richtel And Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 13 — California prosecutors looking into the Hewlett-Packard spying case are focusing in part on a small private investigation firm in suburban Boston, operating out of a yellow house with black shutters in a quiet neighborhood.

How such a tiny firm ended up handling work for H.P., one of the largest technology companies in the world, as it tried to find out who had leaked company secrets is not clear. But other private investigators said on Wednesday that the situation was not surprising, because corporations in need of such services often end up relying on a chain of subcontractors.

Prosecutors will have to follow that chain as they pursue those responsible for gaining access to the phone records of journalists and company board members.

It is common practice for a company's head of security, its general counsel or its outside law firm to hire a security consulting firm, which often hires smaller firms, like the one prosecutors say was involved in this case, Security Outsourcing Solutions in Needham, Mass.

Those firms then hire freelance investigators to do work like surveillance or the acquisition of phone records.

The H.P. investigation involved the use of a technique known as pretexting — in this case, pretending to be a customer to obtain that customer's records from the phone company.

The small firms provide skills that larger firms may not have, but they also offer another benefit. Using middlemen can insulate the company that has ordered the investigation from any shadowy activities, private investigators said.

"I'd be dumfounded if you could find a corporation the size of H.P. that turned directly to the pretexter," said Rob Douglas, an information security consultant who has testified to Congress about illicit tactics used to obtain telephone records. He added that these investigations "have middlemen and are layered."

Mr. Douglas said it was not clear whether the layering in this case was intended as a way to shield company executives, or was just the way the process worked, with one step leading to another until a specialist in obtaining phone records was needed.

Federal and state prosecutors are continuing to investigate what laws, if any, were broken in Hewlett-Packard's hunt for directors who leaked information to the news media.

Hewlett-Packard has said the investigators it hired, whom it refuses to identify, did succeed in identifying a director as a source of leaks. That director, George A. Keyworth II, resigned Tuesday after the company accused him of giving details of a management meeting to a reporter.

The investigation into the leak resulted earlier this year in the resignation of another director, Thomas J. Perkins, an ally of Mr. Keyworth, over a dispute with Patricia C. Dunn, the board chairwoman who ordered the investigation. The company said on Tuesday that Ms. Dunn would give up her position in January.

"It's a remarkable story because it is such an obvious inappropriate thing to do," said Daniel E. Karson, an executive managing director and counsel at Kroll, the nation's largest investigation and security firm.

People who were briefed on details of the company's internal investigation have said that Security Outsourcing Solutions, which is run by Ronald R. DeLia, was one company involved.

But others who are investigating the company's actions said Wednesday that there were most likely other firms involved. Security Outsourcing acts as a kind of temporary employment agency and rounds up people who can do a particular job, so it is likely that those who got access to the phone records were subcontractors. Legal filings in the California attorney general's investigation show that one of the pretexters gained access to a phone company Web site using Internet service from Cox Communications, a cable company that does not operate in Boston.

State investigators have not said if there were any other middlemen involved. Several private investigators said one reason to think Security Outsourcing had help was that whoever did the actual work of obtaining the phone records of the H.P. board members and journalists had their Social Security numbers.

Attempts to contact Security Outsourcing on Wednesday by phone and e-mail and in person failed. No one answered the door at Mr. DeLia's residence in Needham, a large home on a tree-lined street.

In addition to listing the Needham home as an address, Security Outsourcing Solutions shares a Boston phone number and address with the law firm of Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, although its name does not appear on a lobby directory. Calls to the firm were referred to a partner, John A. Kiernan, who said he had "a relationship that involves attorney-client privilege" with Mr. DeLia and could not talk about the matter.

Mr. DeLia, 56, is a licensed private detective in Massachusetts who, according to state police, has had no disciplinary actions against him. James Atkinson, a Boston-area private detective who specializes in preventing electronic surveillance and has worked with Mr. DeLia, described him as a "stand-up guy," adding: "I'd be astonished if this involved Ron. This is not the kind of work he does."

At the top of the hierarchy in the corporate investigations industry are firms like Kroll or Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu that work with large corporations. Firms like Secure Source, specializing in security risk assessments, or SafirRosetti, which focuses on financial fraud and computer breaches, offer narrower services. Both are units of the GlobalOptions Group, which has been consolidating a number of small firms to gain influence with corporations.

At the very bottom, investigators say, are the shadowy information brokers, the so-called pretexters, who promote their ability to get phone and credit records.

"There is a huge subdivision of investigative skills," said James Cawood, who runs a corporate investigations firm called Factor One in Oakland, Calif.

Terry Lenzner, the head of the Investigative Group International, a well-known Washington investigations firm, said that for a large company like Hewlett-Packard to contact a small firm directly would be unusual. "I would think it would be unheard-of," he said.

Mr. Lenzner said he had never heard of Security Outsourcing.

Mr. Karson said a company's decision on whom to hire for an internal investigation could sometimes be as casual as the head of security saying, "I know a guy." He added: "That's how a large company can end up working with a small firm."

Mass. Security Firm Part Of Probe Of HP (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

A small security company in suburban Boston has emerged as a subject in the investigation of Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying scandal, according to a source familiar with the matter.

Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. was hired as part of a Hewlett-Packard investigation of its board of directors to discover who was leaking information to the news media, the source said on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the investigation.

Hewlett-Packard has come under fire for the methods used to identify the board member who was leaking information. Since the scandal surfaced last week, the director behind the leak has resigned and the board chairman has agreed to step down early next year. Another director resigned in May.

HP's investigation involved people posing as directors and journalists in order to gain access to private phone records. It also appeared to include surveillance of directors and review of videotapes to see if any directors were meeting with reporters, the source said.

DOJ_NMG_0062817

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer opened a criminal investigation of HP, which is based in Palo Alto, outside San Francisco. Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly is assisting Lockyer, Meredith Baumann, a spokeswoman for Reilly, said yesterday.

According to the Web site for Security Outsourcing Solutions, it provides support services to in-house security departments and evaluates and addresses corporate security risks.

It caters to small- and medium-size companies and those that do not have full-time security departments. The Web site says the company has a "global network of over 40 affiliated professional investigative firms."

The firm, founded in 1998, has 10 employees and reports annual sales of $990,000, according to Dun & Bradstreet Inc.

Calls to the number listed as the firm's Needham, Mass., office were not answered yesterday. Managing Director Ronald R. DeLia could not be reached for comment.

HP Faces Criminal Investigations With Help Of Morgan, Lewis & Bockius (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 14, 2006

It only looks like Larry Sonsini is doing all of Hewlett-Packard's legal work.

In fact, the troubled tech company has hired Morgan, Lewis & Bockius as it tries to fend off various criminal investigations into whether its board of directors broke the law by having an investigator lie to gain access to board member phone records.

On Monday, Morgan Lewis lawyers sat down with San Francisco federal prosecutors in hopes of forestalling federal criminal charges.

The Monday meeting involved a "proffer" -- a normal step these days in white-collar investigations, in which a company under scrutiny offers up information to the government with certain conditions, as a means of showing good-faith cooperation with investigators.

John Hemann, a Morgan Lewis partner who was at the meeting -- and who was until last year a white-collar prosecutor with the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office -- didn't want to talk about HP on Tuesday.

"I have no comment," he said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Krotoski, the chief of the office's criminal division, is the lead prosecutor handling the investigation. He referred questions to a spokesman, Luke Macaulay, who confirmed the investigation but would not discuss its details.

On Tuesday afternoon, meanwhile, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer told PBS' "NewsHour" anchor Jim Lehrer that "we currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as outside."

According to a search warrant, Lockyer's office has been looking into the matter since at least Aug. 16, when a state prosecutor met with investigators for AT&T, the phone company that was duped into handing phone records over to the board's investigator. Sources familiar with the federal investigation said the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office has known for at least as long about the allegations that board members' phone records were accessed through suspect means.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for AT&T had little to say. "We really can't talk about it," said Walt Sharp.

However, he did point to a suit that the company filed in August in San Francisco federal court seeking to find out the identities of several people who improperly accessed phone records, but would not say whether it was directly related to the HP case.

The focus of the federal query remains unclear, but the fast-multiplying probes into the matter have Silicon Valley lawyers abuzz with the possibility that attorneys, either at HP or at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, could be ensnared.

Spokespersons for the firm and HP did not return calls by press time. On Tuesday, the Wall Street Journal reported that Sonsini, who played a role in both the board's initial leak investigation and its attempt to contain the crisis, ran emergency meetings of HP's board this week. The firm has denied it was involved in the portion of the investigation that involved pretexting.

On Tuesday, HP announced that director Patricia Dunn, who had initiated the leak investigation, would step down as chair at the end of the year.

A week ago, it was publicly revealed that ex-director Thomas Perkins had quit the board in May to protest the leak investigation. Since then, what started as a boardroom disagreement has careened into chaos.

It isn't clear when, or how, the various investigations will culminate. Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar wouldn't comment on when the state might file charges, or whether it is working with the U.S. attorney's office.

"We are focused on completing our investigation into crimes we believe were committed," he said.

Silicon Valley's Golden Past Tarnished By Latest Probes (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Silicon Valley has long been the stuff of dreams, a place where gawky entrepreneurs create billion-dollar companies in their garages, their innovations sometimes bending the rules but forever changing the way we listen to music or chat with friends.

But lately, it seems, the valley has shifted from a shiny beacon of capitalism's promise into a shadowy target for investigators.

Last week Securities and Exchange Commission officials told Congress that they were investigating 100 companies for possibly rigging their compensation systems to guarantee lucrative payments to executives and favored employees. That figure includes many technology firms whose volatile stock prices sweetened the incentive to engage in improprieties.

Even Hewlett-Packard Co., the standard bearer for ethics among Silicon Valley's home-grown technology community, is hustling to move forward after the resignation Monday of its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, amid investigations by prosecutors and federal lawmakers over whether directors' phone records were illegally accessed. Prompted by concerns that a board member leaked information to the press, the HP debacle is shedding light on the valley's insular culture, where secrets are prized and key players have multiple and sometimes conflicting obligations.

No industry has been immune to executive greed or governance lapses in recent years. The era's most disastrous collapses, of Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., occurred far from Silicon Valley. But the same mind-set that inspired so many technology entrepreneurs probably contributed to a breakdown in sound business practices, regulators said.

"You have industries where their whole thought process is to think outside the box," said Charles D. Niemeier, a former top accountant in the SEC's enforcement division who now oversees the accounting industry. "That works really well -- except when it comes to compliance with the securities laws."

A generation ago, Silicon Valley was a backwater, thousands of miles from the nation's financial center on Wall Street and serviced by a few investment banks, law firms and private investors with enough cash to fuel start-up ventures. But the technology boom of the 1990s changed everything. It drew billions of dollars west and made millionaires of young inventors and salespeople, many of whom had virtually no experience running a business.

Regulators later uncovered financial improprieties from that period, including "round-trip" deals where technology firms entered into agreements with each other to give investors the appearance that they were winning customers and gaining traction in the market. What mattered at the time was not reality, but the illusion of success, which often triggered a rise in the stock price, Niemeier said.

This year, investigators have focused anew on the technology sector and the apparently common practice of backdating stock options. A popular method of attracting employees, options give workers the chance to buy stock at a set price and within a specific time frame. Employees profit from the difference between the share price at the time of the grant and the price on the day the stock is sold. In backdating cases, executives have selected award dates after the fact that marked low points in the company's stock price, increasing the likelihood of a windfall. Backdating violates the law if it is not properly disclosed to investors and tax authorities, prosecutors and securities regulators have said.

Cnet Networks Inc., VeriSign Inc. and Macrovision Corp. are among the Silicon Valley businesses that have announced that they received subpoenas from Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, over their options practices, according to securities filings. Apple Computer Inc. also has disclosed irregularities in its option grants.

"I don't think greed has any special place in Silicon Valley," said Bill Burnham, a former investment analyst who founded Inductive Capital L.P. in Menlo Park, Calif. "There're greedy people everywhere. . . . I've seen a lot of people take very principled stands here where a lot of money is at stake."

Yet the latest round of investigations underscores how Silicon Valley's freewheeling culture is, sometimes painfully, making way for a more mature and formal system, where companies now public are required to abide by their obligations to investors, business and legal analysts said.

"Ten years ago, a lot of these companies were private," Burnham said. "That kind of culture and ethos remains. Some people may have lost sight of, hey, you're public, you have to change the rules now."

Moreover, the rapidly growing businesses often lacked in-house accounting and legal expertise, said Matthew J. Jacobs, a former prosecutor who leads the white collar defense practice at McDermott Will & Emery LLP in Northern California. "You're dealing with young companies that . . . do not necessarily have a long tradition of corporate governance," he said, "and part of it is learning on the job."

For advice and financing, companies often turned to the same core group of professionals, including lawyer Larry W. Sonsini and investment banker Frank P. Quattrone, who guided them at the beginning of the era. Sonsini and Quattrone spent years cultivating important relationships and achieved unusual prominence in a subculture that makes celebrities out of businessmen.

After Quattrone struck a deal last month with federal prosecutors, who agreed to dismiss criminal obstruction of justice charges against him after an appeals court threw out his conviction, Silicon Valley executives warmly applauded his return. During the technology boom, Quattrone earned $100 million in a single year and spread more wealth to his friends and associates, who through a program known as "Friends of Frank" got the opportunity to buy stock at low prices before hotly anticipated public offerings.

Sonsini founded a Palo Alto law firm, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, and has advised numerous chief executives, shepherded such companies as Google Inc. and Netscape Communications through lucrative stock offerings, and often persuaded clients to pay their bills not in cash but by giving up even more valuable stock in their companies. Ethics experts say the practice is acceptable but can raise questions about a lawyer's incentive to protect management interests.

In a nod to its ubiquity in Silicon Valley, Sonsini's firm has advised both HP and its former board member Thomas J. Perkins, a venture capitalist who pushed the company to disclose questionable methods used by a subcontractor to monitor directors' phone calls. Sonsini, who did not employ or supervise the subcontractor, apparently contacted HP lawyers and ultimately assured Perkins that it appeared that the process was "well done and within legal limits" in a June 28 e-mail message. Yesterday a spokesman for California Attorney General Bill Lockyer told reporters that the office might bring criminal charges over the call monitoring within a week, but the spokesman declined to name targets of the probe.

The HP board again turned to Sonsini to lead a Sunday conference call to discuss the fate of Dunn, the board's chairman, even though, legal analysts said, Sonsini will be an important witness in federal and state investigations.

"Boy, this turns into a mess," said Wayne State University law professor Peter J. Henning, who co-founded a popular Internet blog on white-collar crime issues, as he contemplated Sonsini's role at HP and how it affected the issue of attorney-client privilege.

Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University, said that he lacked enough information about Sonsini's role to determine whether he may have run afoul of conflict of interest rules. But Gillers said that simultaneously comforting a former board member and protecting HP's interests do not in and of themselves sound alarms. State ethics boards rarely police conflict violations and clients themselves have the power to waive conflicts, he said.

Lockyer's 'Crimes' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Let's stipulate that Hewlett-Packard's wild leaker chase was one of the dumber corporate decisions of recent times. But that hardly justifies California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's decision to go on national TV and publicly allege that crimes were committed before any charges have been filed. Mr. Lockyer went on PBS's "NewsHour" Tuesday to claim that "crimes have been committed" and that his office has "sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard, as well as contractors on the outside."

Even assuming crimes were committed, it is irresponsible for any prosecutor to make such bald criminal assertions in public before he makes them in court. Mr. Lockyer is taking a page from Eliot Spitzer's method here, using the airwaves to poison public opinion against future defendants and make it easier to intimidate them into settling. Along the way, he also gets more headlines that make him look like a prosecutor willing to take down the rich and famous. Even rich corporate defendants deserve due process, however, and someone at the California bar should call Mr. Lockyer on his prosecutorial misconduct.

Hurd Instinct (WSJ)

By Michael S. Malone

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

When the story broke about the crisis in the boardroom at Hewlett-Packard last week, the almost universal reaction here in Silicon Valley was: What would Bill and Dave have done?

The answer is: What Mark Hurd just did.

The spirit of Bill Hewlett and Dave Packard still haunts high tech, especially the Valley. A quarter-century after the two men stepped down from the day-to-day management of the company they founded, their business philosophy still stands as the ultimate example of enlightened management -- and as a perpetual rebuke to executives who fall short of their lofty standards.

Nowhere is this more true than at Hewlett-Packard itself. It's one thing to run some semiconductor company on paranoia, or an enterprise software firm on fear. You can always rationalize your abusive management as necessary to succeed in a uniquely competitive market. But violate the precepts of the HP Way -- management by objective, pushing decision-making down through the organization, deep trust in your employees -- at HP and you have to convince the world that your results will outperform what was perhaps the most successful corporate stewardship in U.S. business history.

That's what Carly Fiorina learned during her controversial tenure at HP. Had she tried her superstar CEO/top-down management/big merger style most anywhere else, she might have succeeded. But at Hewlett-Packard all she managed to do was set off an employee mutiny. The company that had once rewritten every known measure of employee loyalty, still found within itself the capacity to pull itself together and repudiate its new leader. By violating the trust of HPers, Ms. Fiorina utterly lost the proxy vote with her own employees and was saved only by institutional investors. In the end, she lost her job when she couldn't put up HP-like numbers to match her radical plans, and Wall Street abandoned her.

This is the clever time bomb that Bill and Dave left as their legacy to high tech, and to HP in particular. It isn't enough to be enlightened, innovative or successful -- you have to be all three, or you will fail by comparison. From beyond the grave, H and P are always saying: Go ahead and break the social contract with your employees, indulge in mass lay-offs and stick with aging but profitable products . . . but if you can't maintain three decades of continuous growth, enjoy the highest employee morale in the industry and create a half-dozen major new industries, don't even think about leaving a legacy as a great manager.

From the beginning, Ms. Fiorina's successor, Mark Hurd, has seemed to understand this. Word from inside the company is that he is low-key, self-effacing and a bread-and-butter business guy. Best of all, he listens. In other words, he is a classic HP kind of manager. He may not have the culture of trust all the way down, but he is close enough. And the results have been apparent: HP profits and stock are up, its products are improving in quality, and employee morale is the strongest in years. The company is even beginning to win again the old-fashioned way: by remaining consistently strong and waiting for competitors -- in this case Dell Computer -- to stumble.

And then, just when it seemed that the dark days at Hewlett-Packard were finally in the past, along came this body blow of a scandal at the very top of the company.

In case you haven't been following the story closely, it goes like this: In early 2005, troubled by leaks in the media that appeared to have come from the boardroom itself, HP Chairman Patricia Dunn set out to trace and expose their source. She hired private investigators, who then proceeded to contract another company to help with the investigation. This second company gathered phone records not only from HP board members, but also from nine reporters from The Wall Street Journal, CNet, Business Week and the New York Times, among others -- all without the subjects' knowledge. To do so, these investigators engaged in "pretexting": representing themselves as those directors and reporters in order to obtain personal information.

Ms. Dunn claimed that she didn't understand the concept of pretexting until this June. Moreover, she seems to have been supported in this dangerous project by Valley uber-lawyer Larry Sonsini. What is certain is that at the May 13 meeting, Ms. Dunn announced the results of her investigation and "outed" retiring director and former Reagan science adviser George Keyworth II as the leaker. And that was just the beginning. Fellow director Tom Perkins, a legendary venture capitalist and one of the Valley's most powerful people, resigned from the HP board in disgust at Ms. Dunn's tactics.

It was downhill from there. Mr. Perkins publicly stated that he and the rest of the board were kept in the dark about the precise nature of Ms. Dunn's investigation, while she all-but accused him of lying about his involvement. Mr. Hurd, who may or may not have known about the investigation, went before HP's employees last Friday to underscore his support for the search for leakers, but also to promise to investigate the investigation. On Monday, both Congress and the Justice Department announced that they were also looking into the matter. California State California State Attorney General Bill Lockyer stated on Tuesday that there was "sufficient evidence to bring criminal charges against individuals inside Hewlett-Packard as well as outside."

Meanwhile, HP's stock was falling, reversing the gains of the previous months. And HPers everywhere were appalled, disgusted and once more feeling betrayed.

Almost lost in the coverage is that this all began during the tumultuous last days of Ms. Fiorina at HP, when the board was deeply divided over the future of the company and the fate of its high-profile CEO. Indeed, it was a board member, Walter Hewlett, Bill's son, who led the shareholder revolt. He lost his directorship as a result (but not the admiration of HPers). That proxy battle fractured HP's board, creating a schism that apparently never fully healed, and which re-opened over the leak matter.

Tuesday, after two days of emergency board meetings, HP announced that Ms. Dunn would step down, to be replaced by Mr. Hurd, though she herself would remain on the board. "I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again," Mr. Hurd announced. "They have no place in HP."

Is this what Bill and Dave would have done?

Hewlett and Packard are no longer in a position to answer for themselves. But we do know that the two men always operated on trust and openness, but also with a strong hand. They would never have allowed the board to sink into civil war. We can also assume that they would have skipped the skullduggery and presented the leak problem to the assembled board at the beginning, and requested a full buy-in on any investigation. That alone would likely have plugged the leak. Given that HP under their leadership was never allowed to speak ill of a competitor to the media, we can also guess that Bill and Dave never, ever would have approved any investigation against reporters. And as men who had grown a company from a garage to a billion-dollar multinational corporation, they were wise enough to know that you can't buy the cloak without getting the dagger.

Finally, Hewlett and Packard firmly believed that you don't fire loyal employees for being beyond their competence; rather, you move them to where they can make the best contribution. In demoting Ms. Dunn, but still keeping her on the board, Mr. Hurd did the right thing. He did what Bill and Dave would have done.

Look next for deep and sincere apologies to everyone involved. That's the HP Way. Mark Hurd is learning fast.

Mr. Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, is author of "Bill and Dave: How Hewlett and Packard Built the World's Greatest Company," to be published in Spring 2007.

DOJ Reviewing Guidelines For Corporate Investigations (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 14, 2006

During a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Tuesday, a top U.S. Department of Justice official acknowledged that the so-called Thompson Memo on the attorney-client privilege in corporate investigations has ignited complaints across the legal and business landscapes, but he vigorously defended the current policy as a sound one.

"I've got the [Senate Judiciary] chairman and ranking chairman upset; former department attorneys general and other officials complaining. Everyone is complaining," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. "But I believe the perception of how this works is different from the reality.

"I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice that is being described by groups."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and ranking minority leader Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both former prosecutors, questioned McNulty and a panel of critics of the Thompson Memo on how that memorandum -- the department's internal policy guideline on charging corporations -- affects the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in corporate investigations.

The Thompson Memo tells a prosecutor to consider nine factors in determining whether to charge a corporation for criminal wrongdoing. One of those factors is whether the corporation has cooperated in the investigation. In assessing cooperation, the memo says, one consideration is whether the corporation waived attorney-client and work-product protections.

A 'CULTURE OF WAIVER'

A coalition of business and legal organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Bar Association, Association of Corporate Counsel and National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, contends that the memo has created a "culture of waiver" in which federal prosecutors now routinely demand waiver of attorney-client and work-product protections even where there are less intrusive means of getting information.

"It's just one part of one factor," insisted McNulty. "It's not an investigative issue; it's a charging issue. If [the corporation] has cooperated, which they almost always do, that's when the issue -- do you have an internal investigation report? -- comes up. The text of the memo itself says this is one factor to be considered. We're giving [prosecutors] the option to consider it."

But Specter countered, "As I read this policy, I think it is coercive and may even rise to the level of being a bludgeon. I would ask you to reconsider the policy."

Former Reagan Attorney General Edwin Meese III told the senators that the Thompson Memo should be amended to eliminate any reference to waiver of attorney-client privilege and work-product protections in a charging decision.

"In the same manner and same context, all references in the memorandum to a company's payment of its employee's legal fees should be eliminated," he said.

Meese also recommended that the department's written policies should explicitly state that requests for waiver will only be approved in exceptional circumstances. These requests should be approved only at the national level, and the department should publish its procedures on waivers, as well as collect and publish statistics on how often waivers are requested, how often businesses agree to such requests and how often businesses waive even without a request from prosecutors.

ENRON PROSECUTOR SPEAKS

Former Enron Corp. prosecutor Andrew Weissmann, now a partner at Chicago's Jenner & Block, also urged the committee to consider revising the standard for indictment of a corporation for the acts of its employees. He suggested a more stringent criminal standard tying the acts of the employee more closely to the corporation than is currently used.

Specter said that his committee has the several options before it: making a recommendation for changes in the Thompson Memo to the Justice Department, waiting for the outcome of litigation over the waiver/attorney fees issue in the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the KPMG prosecution or enacting legislation to address concerns with the department's policy. He asked Meese what would be his preference.

"I would hope this hearing would have a salutary effect on the department, including, perhaps, a recommendation from the committee," said Meese. "I would hope legislation would be a last resort."

Ex-SEC Head To Run Adelphia Victims Comp (AP-YBIZ)

By Chad Bray, Dow Jones Newswires

AP, September 14, 2006

Ex-SEC Head to Oversee Adelphia Victims Compensation

NEW YORK (AP) -- Former Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Richard C. Breeden will administer the compensation process for victims of a massive accounting scandal at Adelphia Communications Corp., prosecutors said Wednesday.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan said Breeden, chairman of Richard C. Breeden & Co., has been retained to serve as a special master overseeing the compensation process.

DOJ_NMG_0062823

Last year, Adelphia agreed to pay $715 million in cash and stock to settle Justice Department and SEC charges stemming from an accounting scandal that plunged it into bankruptcy. Prosecutors have called it one of the most extensive financial frauds on record.

In 2004, Adelphia founder John Rigas and his son Timothy Rigas, the company's one-time chief financial officer, were convicted of pocketing more than $2 billion from Adelphia for their own personal use and misleading investors about the company's finances and performance.

Last year, John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison, while Timothy Rigas was sentenced to 20 years. Both men, who remain free on bail, have appealed their sentences.

In March, Michael Rigas, another son and former Adelphia executive, was sentenced to 10 months of home confinement after admitting last November that he filed a Form 13D with the SEC that falsely stated he had conducted an inquiry into the source of funds used for a purchase of Adelphia shares in late 1999. The certification was kept in Adelphia's records.

Michael Rigas was acquitted in 2004 of conspiracy and wire fraud charges, but the jury deadlocked on charges of bank fraud and securities fraud. The bank fraud charges against him were later dismissed by prosecutors.

The Rigas family also has agreed to forfeit assets totaling more than $720 million for victims' compensation.

Adelphia, which is under bankruptcy protection, completed the sale of its cable properties to Time Warner Inc. and Comcast Corp. for cash and stock in July.

Breeden previously has served as a corporate monitor for WorldCom Inc. following an $11 billion accounting fraud at the one-time telecommunications giant.

Individuals Involved In Enron Trial Receive Top Award (LAWWC)

Law Week Colorado, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON – More than 230 Justice Department employees – along with 42 other individuals, many of whom are federal employees and law enforcement officers – were honored today at the Department's 54th Annual Awards Ceremony at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. The Attorney General's Annual Awards Ceremony provides an opportunity to recognize the extraordinary accomplishments of a number of U.S. Department of Justice employees as well as individuals from outside the Department.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty joined the Attorney General in presenting the Department's highest award, the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, to the outstanding members of the investigative and trial team of the Enron Task Force, who were recognized for their exceptional service to the American public and the Department in the investigation and successful prosecution of the individuals who were most responsible for the Enron fraud. This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions. The team's unparalleled dedication and teamwork over a period of years has made a significant contribution to restoring confidence in the nation's securities markets.

"Today's award recipients make me proud to be their colleague. They make me proud to be an American," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. "Their dedication and achievements remind me why it is an honor to serve at the Department of Justice."

The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service from this team include:

Monaco, Assistant U.S. Attorneys; from the Central District of California, John C. Hueston, Supervisory Assistant U.S. Attorney, Robb C. Adkins and Andrew D. The Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Heroism is given to recognize an extraordinary act of courage and voluntary risk of life during the performance of official duties. William "Buddy" A. Sentner, Special Agent of the Office of Inspector General's Miami Field Office is honored posthumously for the exceptional courage he displayed by saving the lives of several fellow officers. Special Agent Sentner, 44, was shot and killed in the line of duty on June 21, 2006, as he was working as part of a team executing arrest warrants on six correctional officers at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee, Florida. These correctional officers were indicted the previous day on charges of conspiracy to sexually abuse female inmates and introduction of contraband into the correctional facility. During the execution of the arrest warrant, one of the correctional officers, who was a subject of the warrant, opened fire on the arrest team. Acting with extraordinary courage, Special Agent Sentner rushed to aid his fellow agents and returned fire, killing the correctional officer. Tragically, Mr. Sentner was killed and a Federal Bureau of Prisons lieutenant was wounded. Special Agent Sentner's brave actions and quick response under fire saved the lives of others while sacrificing his own life.

The Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award recognizes employees who have served at least 20 years in the Department and have demonstrated high standards of excellence and dedication throughout their careers. This year's Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award went to David Margolis, Associate Deputy Attorney General in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General. Mr. Margolis has been a federal prosecutor for over 40 years and has brought decades of experience in the Department to the wide array of responsibilities in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General. His impact on the Department's policy and practices, his integrity and reliability and his dedication to the cause of justice are hallmarks of his character.

The Attorney General's Award for Meritorious Public Service recognizes the most significant contributions of citizens who have assisted the Department in the accomplishment of its mission and objectives. Phillip Nicholas Chapman, Christopher M. Donlan, Amber Marie Deahn, and Linda C. Olson were honored today for their heroic and selfless efforts which led to the rescue of Shasta Groene and the arrest of her abductor, Joseph Edward Duncan, III, in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho on July 2, 2005. At approximately 1:53 A.M. PT, Joseph Duncan and Shasta Groene walked into a Denny's restaurant in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. Duncan had brutally killed members of Groene's family a few months before. Working for Denny's at the time were manager Linda C. Olson and waitress Amber M. Deahn. Ms. Deahn identified the girl from the extensive media coverage the case had received and directed her manager to call 911. Ms. Deahn offered Ms. Groene a milkshake as a delaying tactic. At the same time, Phillip N. Chapman and Christopher M. Donlan, who were patrons seated nearby, also recognized Ms. Groene from media reports and walked outside the restaurant to observe Duncan, who had gone outside to smoke. They identified his vehicle and recorded the license plate number. Responding officers soon arrived and arrested Duncan. As a result of their efforts, a violent killer and child sexual predator was arrested and an abducted child was recovered.

Feds May Sue Former Fannie Mae Execs (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

Federal Regulator Says Litigation Likely Against Former Fannie Mae Executives

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The two executives who led Fannie Mae to an $11 billion accounting scandal can expect federal regulators to file lawsuits against them, the head of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said Wednesday.

"We will more than likely be filing litigation against them," OFHEO director James Lockhart said during a speech at the American Enterprise Institute.

When later asked by reporters if legal action was likely against Fannie Mae's former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and the mortgage finance giant's former chairman and chief executive Franklin Raines -- who was White House budget director under President Clinton -- Lockhart did not name names but did say "they are the top two."

Last month Fannie Mae announced -- and the Justice Department confirmed -- that the criminal investigation against it had ended after two years. Fannie Mae, whose accounting scandal came to light in September 2004, has been ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission to restate its earnings back to 2001 -- a correction expected to reach around $11 billion.

Fannie Mae reached a civil settlement in May with the SEC and the OFHEO, agreeing to pay a record $400 million fine after OFHEO found serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation by the company.

Earlier this week, Freddie Mac -- Fannie Mae's smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market -- said it would not face criminal charges in connection with its own multibillion-dollar accounting scandal.

The Justice Department began investigating the accounting of Freddie Mac, which is the second-largest financer of home loans in the country, after it disclosed in June 2003 that it had misstated earnings by some $5 billion -- mostly underreported -- for 2000-2002.

Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae were created by Congress to pump money into the home-mortgage market by buying home loans from banks and other lenders, to keep interest rates low and make home ownership affordable for low- and moderate-income people. They bundle the mortgages into securities for sale on Wall Street.
